'Slumdog' director has knack for revealing the good in people

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Danny Boyle, who won the Academy Award for best director for his helming of the multiple-Oscar-winning "Slumdog Millionaire," has a knack for revealing to audiences the good in his movies' lead characters.

Not that it has been easy to get his films to audiences.

The original U.S. distributor for "Slumdog" closed up shop before the movie was originally set to hit U.S. screens. There was talk about a direct-to-video release of the movie, but Fox Searchlight and Warner Bros. teamed up to distribute the film.

As of Feb. 23 it had been in the top 10 of domestic box office receipts 15 weeks in a row, and its eight Oscar wins, including best picture, were sure to shoot it past $100 million in U.S. gross ticket sales before the end of February.

Four years ago Boyle did a film called "Millions," and he had a similarly hard time getting a distributor.

Set at Christmas, it was supposed to premiere in December 2004 in Boyle's native England — until exhibitors chose the same date to debut three American movies, all with Christmas themes: "The Polar Express," "Christmas With the Kranks" and "Surviving Christmas."

So "Millions" debuted in the States in March 2005 and in England that June.

"Millions" was a fable about a Catholic boy with a precocious fascination about the saints who finds a suitcase full of money and tries to make sense of this apparent great gift to him.

While the boy's older brother would prefer making some prudent investments along with the occasional splurge, the boy wants to give it to poor people since he believes the cash was a gift from God.

"Slumdog Millionaire" tells the story of a slum-dwelling Indian lad who is suspected of cheating once he hits it big on Indian television's version of "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire."

"As the portrait of a man who encounters evil in many forms yet remains fundamentally innocent, and who gains wisdom from all he endures, 'Slumdog Millionaire' is an exhilarating celebration of humane values," wrote John Mulderig, of the U.S. bishops' Office for Film & Broadcasting, in a review in November.

"Slumdog" received a classification of A-III — adults — for "beating and torture, fleeting rear nudity, crime and prostitution themes, underage drinking, brief scatological humor and occasional rough and crude language."

Boyle, in a 2005 interview with Catholic News Service, said even in his films with more severe themes there are moments of tenderness.

His last film before "Slumdog" was the 2007 movie "Sunshine," in which his characters are on a mission to the sun and meet, as Boyle called it, "the source of all being" before the closing credits.

In the harrowing 1996 drug drama "Trainspotting," the main character, once a heroin addict, has escaped the drug subculture, and the dying junkie friend to whom he loans money understands his transformation.

In 2002's "28 Days Later," Brendan Gleeson's character knows he's got only 10 seconds to say goodbye to his daughter and manages to do so despite the gravity of the situation.

"So I feel the films are full of tenderness in a way," Boyle said.

Boyle was educated by the Salesians in England. Although he called himself a nonpracticing Catholic in the CNS interview, he acknowledged what was positive in his Catholic upbringing.

"What my mum brought me up to believe, and I still believe and I've carried with me, ... is that you have to have faith in people," he said.

"And that often takes a leap of the imagination, because it's often a gulf that you have to jump, especially in the modern world where people are so careful and so cynical, and when you have faith, goodness comes from that," he continued.

"That's my spiritual network. ... I've always tried to behave like that," he said.

Boyle told CNS he had no patience with directors who act like "monsters" on the film set, "and the films come out and they have humanist themes, and I can't stand that. They're hypocrites, really."

David Schaefer, a film professor at the Franciscan University of Steubenville in Ohio, said in a Feb. 23 telephone interview with CNS from Singapore that there are Catholic themes in "Slumdog" an audience would detect.

"The whole element of social justice is what the film focuses on all the way through thematically — the effect of poverty," he said. "In some ways, the game show, the outsourcing job Jamal (the main character) is working on is possibly a way of getting out of that (poverty)."

It also illustrates "the horrors that the children have to endure — and, clearly, the exploitation, the brutal interrogation that Jamal undergoes at the hands of his police interrogators. All of these are very social justice-oriented themes. If you would see it (the situation), you would want to change it," Schaefer said.

Boyle in the 2005 interview noted that "Millions" contained humor, "but it's a generous humor. It's not a nasty, cynical kind of humor. We tried to depict everybody in a generous way."

"So much modern humor is based on savagery, actually, and I'm guilty of plenty of it myself in some of the movies I've made," he said. "But there's a life spirit in this which I love and makes me really proud of the film."

He told CNS he wants his movies to be "honest and vivid ... I don't want people to look at them objectively from a distance."

"I want people to feel drawn into the (film's) world, and the color of the world, so that they feel hot when they're watching the film, so that they feel the film pulsing through them," he said.

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

For the month of March, here is a look at the first cloistered community in North Carolina: Carmel of St. Joseph and the Holy Child.

In 1956, six Carmelite nuns of the Strict Observance and one postulant arrived in Asheville to establish the first cloistered community in North Carolina. The Carmelite nuns took solemn vows of obedience, chastity and poverty, and they observed strict papal enclosure. Spending their time in prayer, work and penance, the nuns lived austere lives sleeping on mattresses made of straw and fasting frequently. They had also a strong devotion to perpetual adoration — 24 hours a day, one or two nuns prayed before the Blessed Sacrament in their chapel. They modeled their lives of contemplation on the example of Mary the Blessed Virgin, who "... kept all these words, pondering them in her heart" (Luke 2:19).

March 15, 1956: The nuns arrived in Asheville from the Carmelite cloistered convent (also known as the Carmel) of the Little Flower in Coopersburg, Pa., at the request of Raleigh Bishop Vincent S. Waters. The new Carmel of St. Joseph and the Holy Child consisted of 40 acres and a 60-room frame structure formerly a hospital. The Sisters of Mercy novices helped prepare the building for their arrival.

March 19, 1956: Bishop Waters celebrated the first Mass at the Carmel on St. Joseph's feast day.

March 1967: Carmelite nuns from Asheville and Coopersburg established a new Carmel of the Ancient Observance in Durham at the Carmel of the Most Holy Incarnation. The event followed the withdrawal of the Discalced Carmelite nuns who once occupied the Carmel but left due to a lack of vocations.

1970: The Carmelites of the Ancient Observance withdrew from the Carmel in Durham, with two of the nuns returning to the Carmel of St. Joseph and the Holy Child in Asheville.

Summer 1978: With only six nuns and two postulants remaining, the Carmel of St. Joseph and the Holy Child was suppressed due to the infirm and aging nuns. Some returned to Coopersburg, while others transferred to the Carmel in Whapeton, N.D.

1979: The property of the Carmel of St. Joseph and the Holy Child officially transferred to the Carmel in Coopersburg. At this time, the Carmelites decided to sell the property.

Oct. 17, 1984: Fire destroyed the Asheville Carmel.

Aug. 3, 1987: The Carmel property was sold, with the proceeds being divided equally between the Carmels in Coopersburg and Whapeton.

Catechists explore social teaching, Jesus' call at bilingual workshop

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — "Tell me, in one word, what you got out of today's workshop," Jesuit Father William Ameche asked the workshop attendees.

It was part of the concluding prayer service of "Come and See as We Walk Together II," a bilingual workshop held at St. Eugene Church in Asheville Feb. 21.

From the church pews came the responses in English and Spanish: respect, joy, love, communion and compassion, among others. Father Ameche, a Hispanic minister in the Asheville Vicariate, translated the responses.

Although the program was open to anyone, most of the 47 attendees were parish catechists. Participants received certificates of attendance toward the diocesan Catechist Recognition/Certification Process. The workshop is one in a series in the Asheville and Smoky Mountain vicariates.

Participants attended sessions on topics including Catholic social teaching, catechesis, history of the Mass and the Lord's Prayer.

During the opening prayer service, Father Ameche said the workshop's attendance is a reflection of the Catholic Church in the Diocese of Charlotte: 50 percent or more are Spanish-speaking.

He asked everyone to change places and sit beside someone who didn't speak his or her language.

At Mass, he added, it's "one body of Christ, eating the Body of Christ."

In her presentation, Ann Stowe, pastoral associate at St. Andrew the Apostle Church in Mars Hill, used Scripture passages and papal encyclicals to discuss Catholic social teaching.

Amos 2:6b-7a was quoted: "Because they sell the just man for silver and the poor man for a pair of sandals. They trample the heads of the weak into the dust and force the lowly out of the way."

"Whatever separates me from God, separates me from my neighbor," said Myriam Gonzalez, a catechist at Sacred Heart Church in Brevard, after hearing this passage.

Micah 2:1-3, which speaks of "those who plan iniquity ... covet fields and seize them; houses, and they take them," was also read.

Stowe commented that this Scripture, written 2,006 years ago, "sounds like today's evening news."

"This affects everyone," she said. "What should motivate us to do justice?

We're called to respond with justice because of what God has done for us.

"When I realize what God has done for me, I realize what a blessed person I am," Gonzalez said.

"We need to look into our faith and see what God is calling us to," Stowe said. "When we teach about that, we need to ask people to do some discernment about that."

Renee Pierce, catechist at St. Mary, Mother of God Church in Sylva, recalled a recent news story about a man who froze to death in his home after his electric service was turned off because of unpaid bills.

"How could people let that 93-year-old man freeze to death, for no one in that neighborhood to notice?" she asked, her voice breaking.

"That he had $600,000 and didn't pay his bills means his mind was not right," Gonzalez said, "but nobody was interacting with him to notice that."

"I think you hit the nail on the head — we have to look," Stowe said.

In "Jesus: Heart of Catechesis" in the afternoon, Elizabeth Girton, faith formation director at the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville, pointed out that the Gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke emphasize Jesus' humanity; John and the letters of Paul emphasize his divinity.

"You need the whole picture," Girton said. "The divine became human so that the human might become divine (by adoption)."

Knowing who Jesus is involves understanding that he is both human and divine. Girton spoke of various heresies that challenged this understanding and of church councils that condemned those heresies. For example, Gnosticism, in the first century, said that Jesus was only divine: he looked human but couldn't be truly human.

"We still see that," Girton said. "People don't believe Jesus went through the same things we do."

St. Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons, refuted Gnosticism.

"Everything you do should be Christ-centered," Girton said. "All of us are called to be catechists."

"The documents of the Second Vatican Council call us all to evangelize, to take Christ into every part of our lives, wherever life takes us. If you don't see the immensity of that call, you're missing an important part of that call," she said.

In his morning presentation, Father Ameche discussed the roots of the Mass. Speaking about the presentation after the program ended, he said that Vatican II returned to some originals, such as using the vernacular language.

Attendees exchange farewells at the conclusion of "Come and See As We Walk Together II," a bilingual workshop held at St. Eugene Church in Asheville Feb. 21.

"Jesus spoke the language people knew," he said.

The Last Supper, he explained, was a seder (a Passover meal and prayer service), with salt water representing the tears the Jews had shed in slavery and bitter herbs recalling the bitterness of slavery. The bread was unleavened; so the hosts used at Mass are unleavened bread to remind us of that seder.

However, Father Ameche said, Jesus broke with Jewish tradition by taking the bread and saying, "This is my body." Even Judas received it as a sign of how much God loved him. That's very important."

Those at the Last Supper ate lamb. "Then, after the lamb, the wine — a sign of liberation," Father Ameche said. "Again, Jesus breaks with tradition, saying, 'This is my blood of the new covenant.'"

In the old covenant, Father Ameche added, "the Jews sacrificed animals to receive blessings from God; it was what they did. Jesus sacrificed himself, which saves. The word 'sacrifice' means 'to make holy.'"

"We have the cross," Father Ameche said, "to remind us that God is always loving."

In the afternoon, the Hispanic attendees gathered in St. Eugene Church's day chapel for a stress reduction and relaxation exercise that Father Ameche learned from a nun while he was working in Mexico. "It's helping them manage their lives and be healthier," he said.

A response to Nancy Pelosi

Pro-choice Catholic legislators give scandal to faithful, set dangerous precedence

In a recent article in The Catholic News & Herald, U.S. Rep. Nancy Pelosi is quoted as saying, "I have a sort of serenity" about receiving Communion even though her position on abortion differs from that of the church.

"The church sees it another way, and I respect that," she said, adding, however, that she hoped the U.S. bishops would not use the refusal of holy Communion as a way of punishing Catholic politicians who don't heed church teachings on abortion.

"Think of that word Communion, that which brings us all together as Christians, as Catholics," Pelosi said.

Denying a Catholic the Eucharist "would be something that would shatter that union," she said.

Assuming these words accurately reflect her understanding of church teaching and practice, I am deeply concerned and moved with paternal and pastoral charity to help her and others with the same misconceptions to correct these false notions, beginning with the church's teaching on abortion.

The Catechism of the Catholic Church clearly teaches in paragraph 2271:

"Since the first century the church has affirmed the moral evil of every procured abortion. This teaching has not changed and is unchangeable."

In a television interview on "Meet the Press" in August 2008, Pelosi said that church leaders for centuries had not been able to agree on when life begins.

However, the catechism admits no such ambiguity.

Throughout history, individual members of the Catholic Church may have been confused over this issue; individuals who claim to be "Catholic" have even defended abortion.

But the church has never been confused, nor has she vacillated from the clear and simple truth.

In fact, the catechism readily admits that "this teaching has not changed and is unchangeable."

Abortion is always evil and can never be morally legitimate. And "because abortion is intrinsically evil, the church continues to promote the truth and defend the innocent.

Clearly, then, there is no confusion in the church's teaching. Pelosi's words, however, raise the relevant questions:

"Can a person still claim to be an 'ardent, practicing Catholic' while defending abortion? Can one maintain his or her identity as a practicing Catholic while holding positions contrary to the teaching of that church?"

In other words, "Is there really such a thing as a 'pro-choice Catholic'?"

No. It seems there is a fallacy that one can hold positions contrary to the clear and unchanging teaching of the church and, at the same time, maintain unity with the Catholic Church.

Nancy Pelosi is correct when she states in her interview with Tom Brokaw on "Meet the Press" that it is "true that God has given us, each of us, a free will and a responsibility to answer for our actions."

We are indeed free to practice the Catholic faith. No one is under any obligation to remain a Catholic.

Yet, by definition, a Catholic is one who holds what the church teaches by adhering to it "with religious assent" (Cf. CCC 891-892).

To depart from the teachings of the church is to depart from the church; to break communion with the clear and unchanging doctrine of the church is to break communion with the church.

And to break communion with the church is to break communion not merely with her teaching, but also with her sacraments.

Consequently, when one breaks communion with the church, one forfeits the right to receive holy Communion.

Thankfully, Archbishop Raymond L. Burke, head of the Vatican's highest court, Supreme Court of the Apostolic Signature, has recently clarified and reiterated this truth.

He said in an interview with LifeSiteNews.com, "There's not a question that a Catholic who publicly, and after admonition, supports pro-abortion legislation is not to receive holy Communion and is not to be given holy Communion."

He then added, "The church's law is very clear. The person who persists publicly in grave sin is to be denied holy Communion, and it [canon law] doesn't say that the bishop shall decide this. It's an absolute."

Why?

The archbishop stated, "The holy Eucharist, the most sacred reality of our life in the church, has to be protected against sacrilege.

At the same time, individuals have to be protected for the sake of their own salvation from committing one of the gravest sins, namely to receive holy Communion unworthily."

Archbishop Burke, therefore, mentions two principal reasons for Extreme compromise

Unless all life is protected, all life is in danger

Newly-elected abortion advocates often try to paint their support for Roe v. Wade and its companion case, Doe v. Bolton, as mainstream. Some even think that the decisions constitute a "compromise" position on the divisive issue of abortion.

After all, they say, our current national policy on abortion allows a woman to have a child if she wants, and to abort the child if she wants.

But Roe and Doe are about as far away from a "compromise" as you can find. The decisions allow for abortion throughout the entire nine months of pregnancy, and do not recognize any right of the unborn child to be spared death by abortion.

With a nation divided about abortion, one might think that under a "compromise" solution one could find some reason to protect at least some unborn children.

But in Roe and Doe, one searches in vain for any situation in which an unborn child is protected.

As the University of Detroit Law Review pointed out, "The Supreme Court's decisions ... allowed abortion on demand throughout the entire nine months of pregnancy" (Paul B. Linton, Enforcement of State Abortion Statutes after Roe: A State-by-State Analysis, Vol. 67, Issue 2, Winter 1990).

In this framework, every unborn baby is disposable. Every. That's hardly a "compromise" position.

"Leave it up to the woman to decide" sounds to many like a fair compromise. But this position completely destroys equality before the law, because it constitutes a complete removal of protection from the child.

The lives of unborn children who are wanted and carried to term do not have any more protection from the law than the lives of unborn children who are unwanted and carried to the abortionist.

The lives of the wanted are protected only by their "wantedness," which, of course, can be subject to change at any time. As far as the law is concerned, they are all non-persons, regardless of circumstance. That's hardly a "compromise."

A "compromise" usually, and by definition, allows some accommodation to both sides in the dispute. But current abortion policy allows no accommodation to the claims that innocent human life makes upon us.

The more you know about the Roe and Doe decisions, the clearer this becomes. In fact, the Gallup polling company, in an extensive analysis of the opinions of Americans on abortion, admits that the level of support in surveys for Roe v. Wade is lower if more information about the decision itself is offered in the question, and higher if less information is offered.

These are important points to bring up in communicating with pro-abortion elected officials.

In the film "Judgment at Nuremberg," one of those responsible for the Holocaust says that he "never thought it would go that far," and was told that it "went that far" as soon as a single innocent life was taken.

There is no room for compromising about human life. Permitting one life to be destroyed is already extreme.

Unless we're all protected, we're all in danger.

pro-abortion legislators to abstain from holy Communion.

First, since they persist publicly in grave sin, they give scandal to the faithful.

They set a dangerous precedence that can lead others to assume that they too can hold positions contrary to church teaching and remain in communion with the church.

Secondly, the archbishop reminds us of St. Paul's own words found in his first epistle to the Corinthians:

"Whoever, therefore, eats the bread or drinks the cup of the Lord in an unworthy manner will be guilty of profaning the body and blood of the Lord ... For any one who eats and drinks without discerning the body eats and drinks judgment upon himself" (I Cor. 11:27,29).

In light of these two serious realities, I, as a fellow Catholic and a pastor, urge Pelosi and others who share her perspective to:

1) abstain from holy Communion for the sake of their salvation, as well as for those who may follow their example; 2) reconsider their support for abortion; 3) make a good integral confession by receiving the sacrament of reconciliation; and 4) publicly renounce their current position of support for abortion.

In this holy season of Lent, we are encouraged to take bold advantage of the divine mercy our Lord offers us without hesitation or reservation.

Let us pray that Nancy Pelosi, as well as other public servants who claim to be Catholic yet hold dissonant positions, may one day share true communion with the Catholic Church.

Evangelization's total commitment

Effort is a witness to a relationship with Christ

I'm standing at the bank counter on Friday afternoon waiting for the clerk to process my deposit. Oh, no, here it comes, that annoying question: "So, have any plans for the weekend?"

Perhaps this sounds like a fairly innocuous question to you, but think about it. Why every Friday afternoon does a kid half my age, often a different kid every week, who has absolutely no interest in what I'm doing this weekend ask me that question?

How do you answer a question like that? It seems a little personal. Well, I amazed myself the other day as I took a deep breath, groaned inwardly and prepared to say, "Not really," when I suddenly smiled and blurted out, "I'm going to Mass."

"Oh, that's nice," responded the clerk politely.

And I, deciding my statement needed an encore, said, "and to a movie."

He then proceeded to tell me he was taking his two little ones to see "The Tale of Despereaux," and all in all the conversation wasn't so annoying after all.

What prompted my revelation? A sudden visitation by the Holy Spirit? A desire to stump my young clerk?

Actually, it was a three-day mission my parish offered during the week. The topic was "evangelization," a word we Catholics hear fairly often but sometimes shy away from, thinking evangelization has something to do with taking leaflets door to door to convert our neighbors.

No, fear not, Catholic evangelization is much different — and much better — than proselytizing. It's a total commitment — it's called witness, and you do it with your life. You live it.

So one of the first questions our mission director, Deacon Tom Gornick from the Archdiocese of Portland, Ore., asked was, "What do you say when people ask you what you're doing this weekend?"

You may tell your friends about your kid's Little League game or the flower bed you're putting in. How often do you add "and I'm going to Mass"?

Here's another: When people visit your home, do they see religious images, maybe a crucifix? Any Catholic periodicals on the coffee table?

How about Ash Wednesday? Do you go to the morning Mass and promptly wipe your ashes off so that you don't have to explain to your co-worker, no, that's not dirt?

One year our parish moms' group adopted crucifixes, not little pieces of jewelry but large crosses, each with an image of a crucified man, hanging from a leather strap, and they wore them each day of Lent — to work, shopping, everywhere. That's witness.

One man at the mission remarked that he often says the rosary on an airplane but never takes his beads out of his pocket. Now maybe he will.

Here's how Pope Paul VI described it in "On Evangelization in the Modern World": "Modern people listen more willingly to witnesses than to teachers."

Of course, a commitment to witnessing negates being a curmudgeon, I remind myself. St. Francis of Assisi said it this way, "Preach the Gospel always. If necessary, use words."

In "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love"), Pope Benedict XVI spoke of an encounter that changes our lives: "Being Christian is not the result of an ethical choice or a lofty idea, but the encounter with an event, a person."

That person, of course, is Jesus, and if you've met him, people will notice. You won't have to say a thing.

Blessings in disguise

The Human Side

Had it not been for brave firemen who crawled along a narrow catwalk in the attic of Holy Name Cathedral in Chicago and fought the blaze despite blinding smoke, the cathedral would have burned to the ground.

A fairly recent renovation closed the cathedral for some time, but the hearts of those involved in the fire and its aftermath were anything but closed.

During the fire, an associate pastor was courageous in rescuing the Blessed Sacrament from the tabernacle.

When the firemen who fought the fire returned for inspection, the pastor asked who was the one primarily responsible for saving the cathedral. They all pointed away from themselves to each other.

As they left, one fireman paused in front of the altar and made the sign of the cross.

When the congregation of Kenwood United Church of Christ sent a donation to the cathedral, some wondered why a Protestant church would contribute.

The pastor replied, "It's God house. ... We're serving the same God."

A news columnist critical of the church wrote that although he may sound like an atheist, he believes the cathedral is a sacred home to its parishioners. As a result of his column, donations poured in.

These stories teach us that hidden blessings often accompany catastrophic events.

The word "profane" means to be outside the temple. In today's world many people are not only outside the temple but have no respect for it.

For them a church is nothing more than another building. Sunday worship is seen as the religion of the weak.

Stories surrounding the fire at Holy Name Cathedral are beautiful reminders of the deep respect for the sacred that lurks in our hearts: a priest risking his life for the Eucharist; a fireman blessing himself; a columnist lauding the respect of churchgoers; other Christian communities contributing out of respect for each other.

The word "respect" means to be in awe of another and also to maintain a respectful distance from him or her. For those firemen, the cathedral wasn't just another building; it was an awesome temple of God.

The fireman's sign of the cross was a sign of respectful distance in the presence of an awesome God. The columnist reflected awe for those who have awe for God, and Christian communities helping each other is the utmost in mutual respect.

The Holy Name Cathedral fire may have been catastrophic, but a closer look reveals many blessings in disguise.

Two interesting signs of the times

Church often impeded in its spiritual, liturgical, apostolic outreach

Two news stories crossed my desk on the same day recently. Their headlines proclaim interesting signs of the times in the life of the Catholic Church in the United States.

First, this headline on a Catholic News Service story: "Former Pittsburgh Catholic church being converted into mausoleum." Then I saw a New York Times headline: "Plan to Turn Catholic Schools to Charters," and that story was accompanied by this inset header: "Bloomberg is described as Noah with a life preserver."

Mausoleum? Life preserver?

Death and rescues from death make interesting news at any time but applied to institutions of the church they raise signs that should be read carefully by religious believers who should know that although they cannot predict the future, they can choose the future they want to have.

Become the change you want to see occur, said Gandhi. Become the leaders you say your country needs, I tell my students in a leadership course I'm teaching this semester at St. Joseph's University in Philadelphia.

I'm intrigued by the mausoleum image. It is so heavy, grim, gray and immobile. It is just the opposite of the image Jesus conveyed to those who would follow him.

He launched a movement. Sadly, many who think of themselves as his followers have permitted it to become a monument.

Institutional immobility, unmarketable real estate, obsolete rectories, empty convents, excess classroom capacity, not to mention ceremonial trappings and honorific titles, are making us irrelevant in cities and towns that desperately need what the church has to offer.

Weighed down with the physical, we are impeded in our spiritual, liturgical and apostolic outreach.

The Pittsburgh mausoleum, the former St. Mary Church in Lawrenceville, is serving an admirable purpose — providing "880 crypts and 712 niches for cremated remains along the interior walls, plus a commitment chapel in the former sanctuary with seating for up to 200 people."

It is also providing, for those who have eyes to see, an image that serves to remind that there is need for creative, imaginative, pastoral leadership to guide the "movement" of word and sacrament toward those who need it, especially the young.

Then we have the image of "Noah with a life preserver." He is Mayor Michael Bloomberg of New York City.

He can, according to the Times,

Looking Around

"convert four Roman Catholic schools singled out for closing into public charter schools, an 11th-hour lifeline meant to preserve the education provided in the buildings and stave off potential overcrowding in city schools."

It was Brooklyn Bishop Nicholas A. DiMarzio who, in unveiling the plan with Mayor Bloomberg at a city hall news conference, recalled the story of Noah's ark.

He referred to the "flood situation" facing the church financially. He compared the mayor to Noah, and said: "He's throwing out a life preserver and I'm going to grab it."

The city would lease the buildings from the diocese. There would be no religious instruction or religious symbols in the newly constituted charter schools.

There are legal, political and educational hurdles to be cleared as the negotiations between the diocese and the city proceed.

There is also a lot of planning to be done by the diocese as it looks ahead. A generous supporter of Catholic education in Baltimore once remarked to me, "It wasn't raining when Noah built the ark."

More rain will surely fall over Catholic institutions. More thought has to be given to the design and construction of new arks to keep us afloat.

CHARLOTTE — In Luke 18:16, Jesus said to his disciples, "Let the children come to me, and do not hinder them, for to such belongs the kingdom of God."

This Bible passage illustrates the importance of encouraging the development of an intimate relationship with Christ from an early age.

In response to that call, one Charlotte parish has started a unique catechetical service for children to encourage devotion to Christ in the presence of the Blessed Sacrament.

For the past year-and-a-half, Father Timothy Reid, pastor of St. Ann Church, has been holding eucharistic adoration services for children.

TO JOIN A FAMILY OF FAITH

Heidi and Dan Sierras are shown with their four children, Logan, 3, 5-week-old Eleanor, Kayla, 8, and Ethan, 11, in their home in Ceres, Calif., Feb. 12. Heidi Sierras will be in a group of five — representing different areas of the world — who will be baptized by Pope Benedict XVI April 11 during the Easter Vigil at St. Peter's Basilica.

California woman to be baptized by pope at Easter vigil

WASHINGTON (CNS) — This year, parishioners at St. Joseph Church in Modesto, Calif., are more excited than usual about Easter.

That's because 40 of them, along with their pastor, Father Joseph Illo, will be in Rome during Holy Week, and one person in their group, Heidi Sierras, will be baptized by the pope during the Easter Vigil at St. Peter's Basilica.

Sierras will be in a group of five — representing different areas of the world — who will be baptized by Pope Benedict XVI April 11. The 29-year-old mother of four will represent North America.

"It's hard to put into words how I feel," Sierras said March 2. "I feel honored. It's an amazing opportunity."

Father Illo said the whole parish was caught up in the excitement.

"If she were a different type of person, they might be envious," he added, but because she is so nice they are glad for her.

Getting picked for an event of this magnitude falls somewhat in the "it's all about who you know" category, because each year, just in the United States alone, tens of thousands of people are baptized during the Easter Vigil.

Sierras learned of the possibility of the papal baptism more than a year ago after a St. Joseph Church parishioner who frequently visits Rome found out from a friend of a friend of a Vatican official that there was an open slot for a North American representative to be baptized by the pope in 2009.

The parishioner gave this news to Father Illo, who in turn asked the director of the parish's Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults program to choose someone. The participant would have to stay in RCIA for an additional year.

After several letters were exchanged between the parish and the Vatican, Sierras was told it was official.

Sierras, who had no religious upbringing, began attending Mass with her husband, who is Catholic, about three years ago. When she started asking him questions about the Catholic faith, he advised her to take part in RCIA at St. Joseph Church. Now, after more than two years in the program, her questions have been more than answered.

"I have no doubts this is what I want to do," she said.

This year's Easter Vigil at St. Peter's Basilica would be, said Father Illo, "an affirmation of my priesthood" in which he will have the opportunity to "almost be a collaborator with the pope and the RCIA process — working together to bring people to the sacraments."

Sierras plans to leave for Rome April 2 with her husband and two of their children. The group of parishioners joining them has obtained tickets to many of the papal liturgies during Holy Week. Sierras, along with others to be baptized at the Easter Vigil, will attend morning catechesis sessions and afternoon tours of churches.

In the meantime, she has already talked a fair amount about her faith to friends, family members and co-workers.

"It's incredible," she said. "My weakness is that I tend to be shy but now I have a good opportunity to evangelize."

Bishops join call for U.S. to support long-term development in Iraq

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops has joined a broad group of religious, justice, and relief and development organizations in calling upon President Barack Obama to assist and protect vulnerable Iraqis and pursue efforts that lead to long-term development in war-torn Iraq.

In a March 4 letter to the White House, 44 organizations asked the president to mandate that "civilian agencies take the lead in formulating and implementing an effective humanitarian and development strategy."

Stephen Colecchi, director of the U.S. bishops' Office of International Justice and Peace, said the letter's call parallels one aspect of the U.S. bishops' 2006 statement seeking a responsible transition in Iraq and the eventual withdrawal of American military forces from the country.

A key to Iraq's development is creating a stable country where all Iraqis are safe and refugees — both Christian and non-Christian — can return to their communities, Colecchi said March 9.

The two-page letter urged Obama to ask Secretary of State Hillary Clinton to lead an interagency effort within the federal government to develop a strategy that includes goals for humanitarian efforts and human development as well as ways to measure how those goals are being met.

The organizations placed particular emphasis on establishing programs that would allow Iraq's 2.5 million refugees and another 2 million internally displaced people to return to their communities and live in safety.

The letter also sought aid for Iraq's neighboring countries where refugees have fled and a commitment to resettle the most vulnerable Iraqi refugees in the United States.

FROM THE VATICAN

Home-care workers need support, protection, says Vatican nuncio

UNITED NATIONS (CNS) — Women and immigrants who provide home care to the sick and elderly need support and protection from exploitation, said the Vatican's apostolic nuncio to the United Nations.

Archbishop Celestino Migliore said very little of the funding spent on medical research and providing assistance to the weak and ill goes to supporting home-care workers.

"Studies have shown that community and home-based caregivers actually experience more stress than medical personnel; so better support must be provided for these persons, particularly women and older persons who are caregivers," he said.

The archbishop made his remarks in a March 9 address to a meeting of the U.N. Economic and Social Council's Commission on the Status of Women. Commission members gathered March 2-13 at the United Nations to consider how to promote an equal sharing of the responsibilities between men and women in offering supportive care, including the context of HIV and AIDS.

Archbishop Migliore said the Vatican was particularly concerned about poor and immigrant women who have been responding to the market demands of providing home-based care for children, the sick, the elderly and severely disabled people.

In some parts of the world, he said, increasing demands for supportive care have meant many caregivers, especially women, "are found in situations of vulnerability due to nonregularization, social isolation, difficult working conditions and at times exploitation of every kind."

Governments should recognize that family-based and privately funded in-home care saves them money and takes some of the pressure off in providing public facilities, he said.

GREENSBORO VICARIATE

STONEVILLE — The Franciscan Friars of Holy Name Province will host a discernment retreat at St. Francis Springs Prayer Center, 477 Grogan Rd., March 20-22. The retreat is free and open to all men who are interested in a weekend of reflection and peaceful recreation. Come and discern where God is calling you, pray and celebrate the Eucharist, and enjoy the beauty of a 140-acre wooded reserve. For more information, call Father Brian Smail at (800) 677-7788.

GREENSBORO — A screening of the documentary, "Love Lived on Death Row," will be shown in the Fellowship Hall at St. Paul the Apostle Church, 2715 Horse Pen Creek Rd., March 26, 7-9 p.m. The documentary tells the true story of the Syrian sibling's journey from hate and anger to love and forgiveness for their father who was sentenced to death for the 1990 murder of their mother. A panel discussion will follow the screening. For more information, call Jeannine Martin (336) 294-4696 ext. 225.

Vatican considering document on communications in age of 'new media'

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican is considering the preparation of a major document on new media and their implications for the church's communications strategy.

Bishops from 82 countries began a five-day meeting in Rome March 9 to discuss modern media and the new culture of communications that has arisen in recent years. The seminar was sponsored by the Pontifical Council for Social Communications.

Archbishop Claudio Celli, president of the pontifical council, said the purpose of the seminar was to review with bishops the changing communications scene and see how the church should respond to the challenges and opportunities.

The pontifical council, in a plenary meeting in late October, will then decide whether to go ahead with a new document on the subject, he said.

The modern church's communications strategy has been based primarily on the Second Vatican Council's 1963 decree "Inter Mirifica" on the instruments of social communications, and on the pontifical council's 1991 pastoral instruction, "Aetatis Novae" ("At the Dawn of a New Era").

Archbishop Celli said that since 1991 "a lot of water has gone under the bridge. New media are posing new questions, new interests and new pastoral necessities."

He said it was important for the church to understand that it's not just new technological tools that have arisen, but a whole new attitude toward communication based largely on interactivity and dialogue.

He said his council has been pushing bishops around the world not only to have their own Web sites, but also to make sure these sites are interactive.

Archbishop George H. Niederauer of San Francisco, chairman of the U.S. bishops' communications committee and a participant at the Vatican seminar, said effective use of new media is vital in reaching younger generations.

"You go where they are. And where are they? They're on programs like Twitter and Facebook and others," he said. "We need to be present, and we need the young people to help us be present."

He said young people have seized on the communications opportunities of new media, and the church should welcome their talents and expertise.

Roman visit

Pope Benedict XVI waves to the crowd from the Campidoglio balcony during his visit to Rome's City Hall March 9. During the visit, the pope addressed a special session of the city council. He told city officials that eradicating God and his moral guidance from their lives has not brought people greater happiness and freedom; rather it has deprived people of the strength and hope needed to overcome pressing difficulties.

A moral code is incomplete "if it does not hinge upon the inspiration of and submission to God, who is the source and judge of all good," he said.

In his address, Pope Benedict also deplored a recent spate of violence in the city, saying it revealed a deeper social ill that exists within society.

Bill giving laity control of parish finances killed in Connecticut

HARTFORD, Conn. (CNS) — At the request of its proponents, a bill that would have given laypeople financial control of their parishes in Connecticut has been withdrawn and is dead for this legislative session.

In a joint statement March 10, the co-chairmen of the Connecticut Legislature's Judiciary Committee announced the cancellation of a scheduled March 11 hearing on the controversial bill.

There was no immediate comment on the bill's demise from the Catholic bishops of Connecticut, who had strongly opposed the legislation and urged Catholics to turn out at the hearing.

"It would serve no useful purpose to have a conversation about changing the laws that govern existing Roman Catholic corporations until we know if any of these existing laws are constitutional," the co-chairman said.

Going hungry, raising hope

Famine gives teens a taste of hunger

MOORESVILLE — "I'm hungry!" said Deanna Rizzo, 15. "But, this makes me appreciate that I have so much more!"

Deanna, a parishioner of St. Therese Church in Mooresville, and 14 of her fellow youth group members participated in the 30 Hour Famine Feb. 27-28.

This year, half a million U.S. teenagers are participating in World Vision's 18th annual famine by fasting on water or juice and forsaking food for 30 hours.

The program helps young people learn about global hunger and poverty while they raise funds to fight hunger. Through sponsor pledges by family and friends, the youths raise funds for World Vision, a Christian relief and development agency that works in nearly 100 countries around the world.

The youth group at St. Therese Church is one of eight Catholic groups — seven youth groups and one Catholic school — in the Diocese of Charlotte registered to participate in this year's famine.

The youth group at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte incorporated a spiritual approach into its famine, according to Ruben Tamayo, parish youth ministry director.

The famine began with eucharistic adoration, during which time the sacrament of reconciliation was available. A vespers service was held at the conclusion of adoration.

"The fundraising component was secondary," said Tamayo. "I wanted the focus to be on their spiritual growth, to take advantage of the fasting. The teens were very reverent."

Tamayo reinforced the importance of adapting the program to meet the goals of the parish youth group: for the sanctity of the teens; for developing a strong, personal Catholic identity; and for fostering openness to religious or priestly vocation.

Throughout the weekend, the 20 teens at St. Vincent de Paul Church also spent time in service to the community. A few of the young women assisted the Missionaries of Charity sisters with their new home in Charlotte, while the rest of the youths volunteered with the Salvation Army.

They listened also to Father Ho Lung's Missionaries of the Poor tell their vocation stories and speak of service to the poor.

"The youths respond very well to our faith if you present it right," said Tamayo.

During their famine, the teens from St. Therese Church learned about church teachings on solidarity and human dignity, prayed the Stations of the Cross and discussed the theme of sacrifice, according to Liz Manser, parish youth ministry director.

The group's outreach project involved gathering canned goods door-to-door from nearby neighborhoods and visiting the local Christian mission.

Both groups concluded the famine by attending Mass, followed by breaking the fast together in a meal shared with their families.

"I am able to relate with the hungry now," said Emily Mertes, 17, a parishioner of St. Therese Church. "Though their (the poor's) hunger is ongoing, and ours ends tonight."

The teens spoke about physical pain and numbness, throbbing headaches and mood swings due to the lack of nutrition.

World Vision reports that nearly 850 million people worldwide go to bed hungry every night.

Its programs work with 100 million people annually — mostly children in conflict-ridden areas — to alleviate that hunger, using funds such as those raised by the 30 Hour Famine.

A recent report commissioned by World Vision showed that nearly 70 percent of parents "say their teens are now more aware of the needs of others because of the current economic climate."

Time for prayer, reflection

Youth Lenten Pilgrimage ties into theme of upcoming Eucharistic Congress

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

BELMONT — Middle-, high school- and college-aged youths from across the diocese are invited to participate in the upcoming Diocesan Youth Lenten Pilgrimage to Belmont Abbey March 29.

The pilgrimage, a day of prayer and reflection, is part of the preparation for the fifth diocesan Eucharistic Congress, themed "And The Word Became Flesh and Made His Dwelling Among Us," to be held at the Charlotte Convention Center Sept. 25-26.

It's about "getting students excited about the Eucharist," said Jenny Ryan, campus ministry director at Belmont Abbey College.

"Hopefully that will make the congress that much more fruitful for them in the fall," she said.

Last year approximately 300 youths as well as youth ministers, other adults, diocesan priests and deacons, women religious and monks from Belmont Abbey participated in the pilgrimage.

"It is wonderful to have this opportunity with the Lord," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis to participants at last year's pilgrimage.

"The world of today teaches us to adore ourselves, our own egos, what we want to be fulfilled," said Bishop Jugis.

"But we know by faith that we are to adore Jesus. In eucharistic adoration, we are adoring Jesus, and adoration of Jesus is healthy for the soul," he said.

This year's pilgrimage will include a eucharistic procession, exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, adoration, praise and worship music, witness talks by Belmont Abbey students, vespers and Benediction.

"In today's busy world, it (the pilgrimage) is a moment for young people to reflect on what Lent is really about," said Dr. William Thierfelder, president of Belmont Abbey College.

"It's a time to reflect on, 'Are we doing as much as we're capable of doing?'" he said.

The pilgrimage offers an opportunity for "renewal and getting ready for Christ to come into our lives in the spirit of Easter," said Ryan.

It is an opportunity to "let the Eucharist transform you so that you can be a tabernacle of Jesus," she said.

Priest shares conversion to Catholicism began attending the Baptist church with his father after they married.

"I didn't even know what a Catholic was until I was in sixth grade," said Father Putnam.

His first real exposure to Catholicism occurred in 1978 — "the year of the three popes."

During that year, "there was a great deal of 'Catholic' coverage because of the deaths of Paul VI and John Paul I and the election of John Paul II," said Father Putnam.

"I remember being almost mesmerized by everything I was seeing," he said.

A spiritual quest

"When I was in high school I began a spiritual quest," he said, a journey which led him to the Catholic Church.

"For some time there had been something missing inside me," said Father Putnam, who began visiting different churches with friends.

During that time, "I remembered my attraction to things Catholic," he said.

He wrote a letter to the pastor of St. Aloysius Church in Hickory. That "Everything inside me said 'this is where you are supposed to be.'" letter was lost in the mail; after not getting a response he wrote again.

"With the second letter I received a response and the pastor, Msgr. Eugene Livelsberger, invited me to come see him at St. Aloysius Church," said Father Putnam.

He "was the first priest who I had ever met."

At Msgr. Livelsberger's request, he attended Mass for the first time. It was there that he felt a profound sense of belonging.

"Everything inside me said 'this is where you are supposed to be,'" said Father Putnam.

Looking back on that experience he attributes that feeling to the presence

Father John Putnam, pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury, gives Communion to transitional Deacon (then-seminarian) Ben Roberts during the annual chrism Mass at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte April 3, 2007. of the Lord in the Blessed Sacrament.

"The Catholic liturgy was very foreign to me since the Baptist worship service is so simple; yet, there was something that attracted me a great deal," said Father Putnam, who soon began meeting with Msgr. Livelsberger for individual instruction in the faith.

His parents were not initially pleased with his decision to become Catholic.

"They had many misconceptions about Catholics," he said, but it was a human experience that eventually won them over.

"During the course of that time, my parents had a crisis in their lives and no one to talk to," said Father Putnam.

When he suggested that they meet with Msgr. Livelsberger, they reluctantly agreed.

"He was the only person who would take time to talk to them," Father Putnam said.

After that, "they began to develop a very different view of Catholics and the church," he said.

Father Putnam's parents were present when he was baptized in the Catholic Church on his 16th birthday in 1981.

"They have been supportive ever since," he said.

A deeper calling

"My parents always wanted me to pursue medicine," said Father Putnam, who studied pre-medicine and biology at Lenoir-Rhyne College in Hickory.

"The priesthood was always on my mind," he said, and "by sophomore year it became more and more pressing."

At that time, he began looking into the possibility of becoming a priest. During his senior year of college, he began the formal application process.

Remarkably, his parents were peaceful with his decision.

"When I decided to pursue the priesthood, my mother said that she really was not that surprised," he said.

One thing about Catholicism that Baptists tend to be skeptical about is the devotion to Mary. But that wasn't an issue for Father Putnam, who said he has always had a natural comfort level with Our Lady.

"The rosary and devotion to her were very natural," he said, "very comforting."

In fact, Father Putnam credits Mary with his vocation.

After his first year of seminary he struggled with his call to the priesthood. That summer, he went on a pilgrimage to Fatima, Portugal, where Mary appeared over a six-month period starting May 13, 1917, to three shepherd children. After that, he felt at peace about continuing his formation.

Today Father Putnam serves as pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury, where he has been since July 2000. He is also vicar forane of the Salisbury Vicariate and judicial vicar for the Diocese of Charlotte.

He said his conversion has helped him in his ministry as a priest, particularly when it comes to working with participants in the Right of Christian Initiation for Adults (RCIA).

It is also helpful when he is working on cases for the diocesan marriage tribunal, especially when dealing with Catholics wishing to marry non-Catholics.

"It's helpful to understand where they are coming from," said Father Putnam. Being a convert allows him to "talk their language," he said.

But even to this day, Father Putnam is an oddity in his family. My extended family still "doesn't know what to make of me," he joked.

But through it all, he has never looked back.

He feels confident in his decision to convert and become a priest.

"I'm convinced that it's what God wanted," he said.

'An example to be imitated'

Women reflect on Mary through own vocations

BY MARY B. WORTHINGTON
CORRESPONDENT

WINSTON-SALEM — "Women who have Christ-centered friends are able to handle the stress of family life much better than before they developed Christ-centered friends," said Benedictine Sister Paula Hagen.

Sister Hagen, from St. Paul, Minn., led a retreat attended by 150 women from across the Triad-area at St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem Feb. 21.

The retreat, entitled "Strong Women, Strong Friendship, Strong Faith," introduced participants to the life of Mary as seen in Pope Paul VI's apostolic exhortation, "Marialis Cultus" ("To Honor Mary").

For example, the women were encouraged to see Mary as one whose human need for friendship brought her to closeness with her cousin Elizabeth.

Sister Hagen is the national director of the Ministry of Mothers Sharing, or M.O.M.S., a ministry developed in 1992 by the Sisters of St. Benedict of St. Paul's Monastery in St. Paul.

Sister Hagen travels nationwide to share the M.O.M.S. program through lectures, workshops and retreats. She said the program answers a need because mothers are "just hungry for the spiritual nourishment that comes from the support group within their own church."

In a handout at the retreat, Marian devotion was explained as biblical, liturgical, ecumenical, anthropological and theological.

These themes are echoed in Pope Paul's document when he said, "The Virgin Mary has always been proposed to the faithful by the church as an example to be imitated ... She is held up as an example to the faithful rather for the way in which, in her own particular life, she fully and responsibly accepted the will of God, because she heard the word of God and acted on it, and because charity and a spirit of service were the driving force of her actions. She is worthy of imitation because she was the first and the most perfect of Christ's disciples. All of this has a permanent and universal exemplary value."

A unique aspect of the document is the exhortations given to modern women who may see Mary as a "passive and subservient woman," said Sister Hagen.

"Faith is best taught through faith traditions ... in the home."

— Benedictine Sister
Paula Hagen

These aspects include meditation with the assistance of Scriptures on the assertiveness of Mary in the moments of her life, including the Incarnation.

In "Marialis Cultus," Mary "will appear not as a mother exclusively concerned with her own divine Son, but rather as a woman whose action helped to strengthen the apostolic community's faith in Christ, and whose maternal role was extended and became universal on Calvary."

Sister Hagen's passion for leading women to a deeper understanding of the personality and role of Mary stems from her experience with couples and individuals during various ministry responsibilities she has held throughout her religious life.

She noticed that some mothers, at baptismal preparation classes for their infants, did not know how to bless themselves nor know the basic prayers of the Catholic Church; as such, Sister Hagen felt called to educate women on the importance of their influence over their children's faith.

"Faith is not-taught. It is caught by the example of parents," said Sister Hagen. "Faith is best taught through faith traditions ... in the home."

"Many parents think that it is the role of sisters and priests to teach the faith in school," she said. "They do not realize that parents are the primary educators of their children."

Sister Hagen called motherhood and fatherhood vocations that parents are called to, even from the moment of their own baptisms.

"Parents live out their commitment to Christ through parenting," she said.

Sister Hagen said this is a fulfillment of her vocation as a sister, which is to be a spiritual mother to the whole world.

"It seemed like I was making a big sacrifice to give up children and a family of my own, but as Scripture says, God gives in return one hundred fold."

She said she now feels like a "grandmother who is concerned with how the church is passing the faith to the next generation."

RESPECT LIFE

Cardinal: new stem cell policy favors politics over ethnics of the White House, Obama said the stem cell policy of former President George W. Bush, in effect since Aug. 9, 2001, had forced "a false choice between sound science and moral values."

Obama also urged Congress to consider further expansion of funding for such research.

Since 1995, the Dickey/Wicker amendment to the annual appropriations bills for federal health programs has barred federal funding of research involving the creation or destruction of human embryos.

But the president had strong words against human cloning, which he said is "dangerous, profoundly wrong and has no place in our society, or any society."

He said he would work to ensure that "our government never opens the door to the use of cloning for human reproduction."

Among the several dozen people present at the White House for the signing were members of Congress, scientists, families whose members had been or could be affected by stem cell breakthroughs, and representatives of the Episcopal and United Methodist churches, several Jewish bodies and the Interfaith Alliance.

Obama said a "majority of Americans — from across the political spectrum, and of all backgrounds and beliefs — have come to a consensus that we should pursue" embryonic stem cell research.

But Cardinal Rigali said the executive order "disregards the values of millions of American taxpayers who oppose research that requires taking human life" and "ignores the fact that ethically sound means for advancing stem cell science and medical treatments are readily available and in need of increased support."

He reiterated points raised by Cardinal Francis E. George of Chicago,

USCCB president, who said in a Jan. 16 letter to Obama that a change in the policy on funding of embryonic stem cell research "could be a terrible mistake — morally, politically and in terms of advancing the solidarity and well-being of our nation's people."

Bishop Elio Sgreccia, former president of the Pontifical Academy for Life, said allowing the use of public funds for embryonic stem cell research was "without ethical or scientific justification."

The decision to reverse the ban on federal funding was based on "utilitarian logic" that failed to take into account the fact that embryos are human beings, he told the Italian news agency ANSA March 9.

"It's about the destruction of human beings in order to turn them into material for experimentation," he said.

The Italian bishop said it was unclear why research on embryonic stem cells would need to be pursued now that new discoveries have been made with other kinds of stem cells.

He referred to the work of a Japanese biologist who found in 2007 that adult stem cells could easily be reprogrammed to an embryonic state.

At the White House, Obama said he "cannot guarantee that we will find the treatments and cures we seek. No president can promise that."

"But I can promise that we will seek them — actively, responsibly and with the urgency required to make up for lost ground," he added.

Politics over life

The Bush policy had allowed funding of embryonic stem cell research only when the stem cell line had been created before Aug. 9, 2001.

The executive order Obama signed permits federal funding of stem cell lines created since then, but would not allow funding of the creation of new lines, leaving that decision to Congress.

Obama also signed a "presidential memorandum on scientific integrity"

Isolating Embryonic Stem Cells

Scientists believe stem cells could repair diseased or injured tissues. The Catholic Church opposes stem-cell research that involves the destruction of human embryos.

An egg is cloned or fertilized in vitro to create a human embryo.

The embryo begins to form and the inner cell mass is isolated.

Stem cells, present 5-7 days after fertilization, are removed and grown in a petri dish. The rest of the embryo is discarded.

Cells are manipulated to create specific human tissue such as nerve cells, muscle cells or blood cells.

March 9, ordering the director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy to develop a strategy for ensuring that "the administration's decisions about public policy be guided by the most accurate and objective scientific advice available."

He said scientific advisers should be appointed "based on their credentials and experience, not their politics or ideology."

But Paul Long, vice president for public policy at the Michigan Catholic Conference, said the order "regrettably places ideology and political posturing ahead of proven scientific therapeutic advancements."

"There are endless studies and stories of patients who have been treated, even cured of their debilitating condition following stem-cell therapies that do not necessitate the destruction of human embryos, yet the ... executive order makes every tax-paying American citizen unwittingly complicit in the destruction of human embryos for experimental research."

Bishop Robert W. Finn of Kansas City-St. Joseph, Mo., called Obama's action the "newest step by the president to eventually remove all legal protections for innocent, nascent human life."

"The president boldly proclaimed that he was taking the politics out of science," Bishop Finn added. "Rather, it seems clear that he is only asserting 'his politics' over life itself."

Kristen Day, executive director of Democrats for Life of America, said the president's decision — which the organization "is against, ... period" — surprised the group and signaled "a cooling of our relations" with the Obama administration.

"While we have zero confidence that a call for a reversal of this executive order will prevail, we are hopeful that the president will heed our call for common-ground solutions in dealing with pro-life Democrats," Day added, citing in particular the Pregnant Women's Support Act.

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., the author of a 2005 law authorizing $265 million in federal research funds for adult stem cells from cord blood and bone marrow, asked in a statement: "Why does the president persist in the dehumanizing of nascent human life when better alternatives exist?"

"On both ethics grounds and efficacy grounds nonembryonic-destroying stem cell research is the present and future of regenerative medicine — and the only responsible way forward," Smith added.

Catholics urged to make prayer against abortion part of Lenten ritual

INDIANAPOLIS (CNS) — Shawn Carney, national director of the "40 Days for Life" spring prayer campaign, is urging Catholics to pray in front of abortion centers as part of their Lenten commitment of prayer, fasting and almsgiving.

Carney, a 26-year-old Catholic from the Diocese of Austin, Texas, is the national coordinator of the "40 Days for Life" spring campaign of prayer, vigil and fasting.

More than 130 communities in the United States, Canada, Australia and Northern Ireland are hosting "40 Days for Life" events through April 5.

Three of those communities are within the Diocese of Charlotte — Charlotte, Franklin and Winston-Salem.

Carney said abortion providers want to convince each woman who is experiencing a crisis pregnancy that she does not have the capacity to love her baby because of her difficult life circumstances.

"This is the lie that is sold to 4,000 women every single day in our nation," said Carney, a member of St. Thomas Aquinas Church in College Station.

"No matter how many abortions are done," he said, "the most basic, fundamental bond — the most beautiful bond in our humanity — between a mother and a child can never be ripped apart, and called 'freedom' and called 'liberty' and called 'rights,' no matter what laws we have, no matter who is in the White House."

People who support abortion can only do that by dehumanizing the life of the unborn baby, he said, and becoming numb about the killing of a human life.

National pro-life postcard campaign to be supplemented by e-mails

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. bishops have launched a campaign to send e-mails with a pro-life message to members of Congress.

The campaign supplements the national postcard campaign begun in dioceses — including the Diocese of Charlotte — throughout the country in late January. Both efforts are being coordinated through the Washington-based National Committee for a Human Life Amendment.

"Tens of millions of cards have been distributed in parishes, schools, non-Catholic churches and civic organizations across the country," said Deirdre McQuade, assistant director for policy and communications at the USCCB Secretariat of Pro-Life Activities, in a news release. "The e-mail campaign will give even more citizens the chance to participate."

The e-mails, which can be sent from the USCCB's Web site at www.usccb.org/postcard, contain the same message as the postcards.

"At this time of serious national challenges, Americans should unite to serve the good of all, born and unborn," they say, urging members of Congress to oppose the Freedom of Choice Act "or any similar measure" and to "retain existing laws against funding and promotion of abortion. It is especially important that Congress retain these laws in the various appropriations bills, e.g., the Hyde amendment in the Labor/Health and Human Services appropriations bill."

McQuade said "our voice is needed now more than ever" in order to "guard against the erosion of current pro-life measures and to keep abortion from becoming a federal entitlement."

Bishop Begley's legacy, spirit endure in diocese

Bishop Michael J. Begley, the first bishop of the Diocese of Charlotte.

Bishop Begley, born in 1909 in West Springfield, Mass., was ordained bishop of the newly-established diocese on Jan. 12, 1972. He served as bishop until his retirement on May 29, 1984.

"I realize I am among the chosen few to be graced with answering the call to serve through the priestly ministry and again serve as a bishop," wrote Bishop Begley in a late-1980s series of columns.

"I have never taken either role for granted nor have I assumed I was worthy to have them," he said.

But the foundations he laid, the impressions he made and the friendships he forged have survived and flourished long after his death in High Point on Feb. 9, 2002, at the age of 92.

"I would describe him as a man of God, who had zeal for the salvation of souls, and whose enthusiasm for his ministry was catching — you were drawn into that enthusiasm and that zeal for his work," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis in a 2002 reflection of Bishop Begley.

Bishop Jugis is one of the many priests in the dioceses of both Charlotte and Raleigh who have been inspired by this "good and holy man of God," as Bishop Begley was described by one of his successors, Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin.

A shepherd's mission

Bishop Begley was ordained a priest of the Diocese of Raleigh on May 26, 1934. He knew years prior that he would become a priest.

"It was not unusual for Catholic boys to consider a life in the priesthood and to enter seminary upon graduation from high school," wrote Bishop Begley. "I was one of those young men."

His priestly career carried him throughout the state, where he served in parishes in both the Diocese of Raleigh and what would later become the Diocese of Charlotte.

His first assignment was as pastor of St. Mary Church in Wilmington. Next he was sent to serve as assistant pastor of St. Edward Church in High Point.

He served as pastor of St. Therese Church in Wrightsville Beach, Immaculate Conception Church in Carolina Beach and St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem.

In 1955 he became the founding pastor of St. Ann Church in Charlotte, where, as a monsignor, he would baptize in 1957 a baby who would later become the fourth bishop of Charlotte.

"I had the honor of being baptized by the future bishop of the diocese," said Bishop Jugis.

"When I was growing up, I had always heard about Msgr. Begley and what a wonderful pastor he was — and what a wonderful person he was," he said.

Bishop Begley served also as superintendent of the Diocese of Raleigh's Catholic orphanage and was serving as pastor of Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro when he was appointed by Pope Paul VI as the first bishop of Charlotte in 1971.

By coincidence, Bishop Begley was a cousin of Bishop William J. Hafey, first bishop of Raleigh.

"I was challenged to begin a new role in leadership and set up the newly-established Diocese of Charlotte," recalled Bishop Begley.

"But the details of being a bishop were not nearly as challenging as the transformation of my attitudes," he said. "Where once I was a peer among my priests, now I was their leader. Where once I was charged with caring for the spiritual lives of my parishioners, now I must care for the entire diocese ..."

Fruitful journey

During his tenure as bishop, he quickly earned a widespread reputation as a kind-hearted champion of the poor, an enthusiastic bridge-builder in the ecumenical community and a humble administrator who counted on the blessings and contributions of many.

As chairman of the Catholic Committee on Appalachia (CCA), he led 26 bishops from 13 states in issuing a joint pastoral letter on the state of the powerless in the mountain region in 1975. "This Land is Home to Me" attracted national attention for its forthright approach to the problems of the people in the economically-depressed area.

"Through the work I did on CCA, I came to know the Appalachian families and the struggles they faced. I was moved by their spirit and humbled by their poor existence," wrote Bishop Begley.

"I had a clearer understanding of the need for the church to reach out to all people, but especially the poor," he said.

"He was really a man of prayer," said Msgr. John McSweeney in his homily during Bishop Begley's Mass of Christian burial at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte Feb. 15, 2002.

"With strength from his divine office, his daily Mass, his rosary and devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, he worked hard and long hours," said Msgr. McSweeney, pastor of St. Matthew Church in Charlotte and the first priest ordained for the Diocese of Charlotte in 1974.

"He was focused on his work, but always as the shepherd of the diocese," said Msgr. McSweeney. "He was a bridge who brought unity to his priests and much happiness to his new diocese and its people."

Bishop Begley wrote upon his retirement that he was satisfied with his career and life.

"I accepted the plans God laid before me," he said. "Though the road was sometimes twisting and covered in fog, the journey has been exciting and fruitful. And what more could I ask?"

As chairman of the Catholic Committee on Appalachia, Bishop Begley was at the mine to mediate during a strike. His visit was prompted by articles in a Charlotte newspaper depicting the distress of many people over the strike.

Bishop Begley later initiated a joint pastoral letter, "This Land is Home to Me," on the state of the poor in Appalachia in 1975.

Editor's note: This is part of a series in anticipation of Pope Benedict XVI's March 17-23 trip to Africa and the October Synod of Bishops on Africa.

LUSAKA, Zambia — Extreme poverty and cultural practices are contributing to the AIDS pandemic in sub-Saharan Africa, despite efforts to control HIV, said church officials.

Dr. Gilbert Buckle, executive secretary of the health department at the National Catholic Secretariat of Ghana, said although Africans have seen their peers die from AIDS, many — especially women — still indulge in desperate acts in order to earn a living, hence exposing themselves to infection.

"Sub-Saharan Africa has about 30 million people living with HIV/AIDS; this figure is likely to rise due to cultural, social and economic factors, particularly in West Africa," he told Catholic News Service.

Sister Matildah Mubanga, a member of the Daughters of the Redeemer and national health coordinator for the Zambian bishops' conference, said the fight against HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, will remain difficult as long as poverty levels continue to rise.

"Lack of money and poor living standards have greatly contributed to the rise in HIV/AIDS infections in Africa," she said.

"In Zambia, for instance, where about 70 percent of the people live in poverty, most young women and girls resort to earning a living through prostitution," she said. "This exposes them to HIV."

She explained that the continued migration of people from rural to urban areas in search of jobs and a better life and the increase in cross-border trade have created new challenges to the continental fight against HIV.

She and other church workers said in most parts of rural Africa the HIV situation is compounded by inadequate stocks of essential drugs, insufficient medical personnel and the long distances between health facilities.

"In some rural areas, persons infected with AIDS are neglected and abandoned by their families; some die right in their homes because of lack of food and because they cannot manage to walk to health centers, which are usually situated miles away, to access treatment," Sister Mubanga said.

Cultural attitudes

In South Africa, Dominican Sister Alison Munro, director of the AIDS office of the Southern African Catholic Bishops' Conference, said the church's involvement in the fight against AIDS has brought about a tremendous change.

She said church programs have emphasized education, because officials believe that "understanding will lead to change of behavior and attitudes."

"So far, not much has been achieved in terms of changing of people's attitudes and sexual behavior because statistics indicate HIV/AIDS is still on the rise," she added.

Sister Munro said some people still do not believe they can get AIDS through sexual intercourse while others "just don't care" and tend to pin their hopes on antiretroviral medicine, which suppresses HIV, and condoms.

"Some rural people think AIDS is a white man's disease and therefore cannot affect them, while others still believe it has to do with witchcraft," said Sister Munro, who also put part of the blame on what she called bad cultural practices.

Church workers and health care personnel in Africa say sexual practices emphasize the desires of the man over the life of a woman. One priest told CNS that it has been ingrained into African women that "they have no right to refuse their husbands sexually, under any circumstances."

"The traditional attitudes produce fatal results," said another priest.

In many African countries, polygamy and large families are the norm, so one infected man might pass on the disease to several wives, who in turn pass on HIV to the children. In many parts of Africa, if a man dies, by tradition his brother is honor-bound to help the widows produce children. In some countries, partly because of the stigma, people still refuse to discuss AIDS.

"The subject of AIDS is largely taboo here, frustrating health workers' efforts to promote AIDS awareness," said Irish Salesian Father Larry McDonnell, who works with AIDS orphans in Swaziland.

Support and success

Sister Munro said that, since 2000, church-supported HIV programs in Swaziland, South Africa and Botswana have placed more than 600,000 patients on antiretroviral treatment and provided better care and support to people affected by the pandemic.

"I think the Catholic Church way outshines all other faiths and denominations when it comes to investing in responses to the pandemic," she said.

"The church has been on the forefront of providing quality care and support," said Sister Munro. "As Christians our concern for people goes beyond basic material needs such as food and shelter to the emotional welfare of people."

"We often struggle as a church to get money and material resources for our work, especially among the poor," she said. "We must never forget, however, that we have a treasury of spiritual riches which doesn't diminish as it is used: the Bible, prayer and the sacraments, especially the Eucharist and the sacrament of the sick."

In Kenya, U.S. Maryknoll Father Edward Phillips, coordinator of the church-run Eastern Deanery AIDS Relief Program based in Nairobi, agreed that antiretroviral treatment and education have changed the African situation.

Antiretrovirals "are definitely improving the lives of people," he said. Such treatment "keeps families intact," he said.

"The difference between today and the 1990s is that, in the past, people simply died of AIDS without any access to real treatment. People did not know much about AIDS. But today the question is not about death but ongoing life," he said.

The Eastern Deanery program is one of Kenya's leading providers of antiretrovirals and tuberculosis treatment, especially to slum dwellers.

Father Phillips said that his program is also involved in the development of the country's AIDS testing and TB services and is spearheading the integration of TB services into HIV care in the country.

A way to go

Elizabeth Mataka, the U.N. secretary-general's special envoy for AIDS in Africa, told CNS that, while Africa may have some successes to celebrate, much of the continent is still failing to make progress in the areas of HIV prevention, treatment and care.

"There could be lots of reasons for the situation ... but mostly it is because of failure by governments to prioritize their HIV strategies and programs," she said.

"Botswana, for instance, has managed to reduce the rate at which children born to HIV-infected mothers contract HIV because the country decided to prioritize the prevention of mother-to-child transmission," she said.

Mataka also said African countries must design cross-border strategies and programs that ensure access to displaced and mobile populations.

"Regional institutions, like the Southern African Development Community and civil society organizations, require further strengthening" so they can effectively participate in the fight against the pandemic, she said.

Media failures in covering religion highlighted in new book

REVIEWED BY BOB ZYSKOWSKI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

In "Blind Spot," six analysts — syndicated columnists, editors, academics, media sources and authors — point out flaws in journalistic techniques and systems that prevent the media from accurately covering religion and that contribute to mainstream media missing some of the biggest stories of our time.

Chapters focus on topics such as biased reporting on the religious right in U.S. politics; major media missing the importance of religion in international terrorism; and the tendency to simplify and stereotype complex religious identity, among others.

It may be that stereotyping people of faith leads to the biggest sin by media professionals.

Allen Hertzke, a University of Oklahoma professor, says "secular blinders" keep reporters and their editors from seeing religious people in anything other than their preconceived stereotypes.

The bias of journalists leads to "a reluctance to feature evangelicals in a favorable light," Hertzke notes.

Even when religious groups or alliances are involved in human rights actions that journalists tend to approve of, mainstream media tend to dismiss the story or see it as an ideological one rather than a human story.

For example, The New York Times referred to the tragic plight of Sudanese refugees as a "pet cause of many American religious conservatives."

Hertzke counters: "It is hard to imagine the Times describing the plight of Soviet Jewry as a 'pet cause' of American Jews, or opposition to apartheid as a 'pet cause' of African-Americans."

Authors and political scientists C. Danielle Vinson and James L. Guth show the extent to which journalists misunderstand religious voters in the United States, attesting that "the most significant problem is not media bias but media ignorance."

The Christian right was seen as particularly suspect by mainstream media; in contrast, some reporters and editorial writers saw a broader agenda for some religious voters than just the "culture war" issues of abortion, same-sex marriage and stem cell research.

This was particularly true in coverage of Catholics, who on occasion were seen as wrestling with a number of "moral" issues, Vinson and Guth note.

Catholic readers in particular may enjoy the chapter that tackles how the media treated Mel Gibson and his film, "The Passion of the Christ."

Jeremy Lott, an editor as well as a press critic, writes, "News coverage of the movie was bad, the opinion writing was cliched, and the movie criticism was worse," yet the movie was a huge success.

The reasons? Perhaps, Lott says, because of "the press' failure to honestly grapple with the broader questions of religion," but also because of "the estrangement of American journalists from their audience."

The editors and contributors of "Blind Spot" offer a handful of examples of the press doing it right when covering religion.

They also offer a number of ways the media can begin to correct what's wrong with stories about religion, urging them to understand that religion is a motivator of human behavior; realize that religion is important to people; and disregard pack and "tribal" journalism, where journalists as a group tend to report the same stories and agree on what is good and right.

The editors of "Blind Spot" recommend that mainstream media hire people who practice their faith, who go to church, who know details about religion.

They urge reporters to take religion seriously and know about it to properly cover all the news, not just religious news, because they are missing the religious factors in much of the news.

Not to put too fine a point on it, but "Blind Spot" has a blind spot or two of its own.

In complaining how popes shouldn't be described in terms of liberal or conservative, press critics shouldn't pigeonhole Catholic bishops into those same camps.

And much of the analysis offered is about only the press giants — The New York Times and The Washington Post.

Pack journalism admittedly leads to many other newspapers and media outlets taking their cues from the coverage from those big boys, but there are a lot of other newspapers and media across this country, and coverage may very well be different in newsrooms and locales where religion is more understood and appreciated.

That would be an interesting study.

Acting on our faith lets us walk with Jesus

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The coffee is brewed, hot chocolate is marshmallowy and the sweets are scrumptious.

It is once again time for Paradox Cafe, an event where the youth group at our parish sips coffee and ponders the big ideas of our faith.

Tonight's topic centers on this question: Is faith a gift from God, or is it a human act?

Of course, as with most paradoxes, the answer is "both." But we take our time getting to that conclusion.

First we talk about how faith is a gift from God. The youths say things such as we cannot make faith or invent it, so it has to come from somewhere. We do not earn it, so it must be a gift.

After awhile the conversation turns to faith being something that we do. The youths use the example of a Christmas present.

The gift becomes truly yours only after you do something — open it.

As the evening comes to a close, we all agree that faith is both a gift we receive from a loving God and an action we take.

We see this truth come to life in this Sunday's readings. St. Paul says to the Ephesians, "For by grace you have been saved through faith, and this is not from you; it is the gift of God."

Here it is clear that faith is something given. In the Gospel, Jesus tells us that "everyone who believes in him may have eternal life." To believe is an action that we take of our own free will.

In the next verse, the whole formula is wrapped up in a nice neat package. "For God so loved the world that he gave his only Son, so that everyone who believes in him might not perish but might have eternal life."

God gives and we believe, gift and action united to bring about faith.

We are in the middle of Lent, looking ahead to Easter. Our Lenten fasts and activities are things we do to increase the faith that we have been given.

By taking action on our faith, we walk with Jesus through the desert to the cross and into the resurrection where faith and action merge into one, and we are completely one with the triune God.

Questions:

How would you explain faith as a gift from God?

What actions have you taken to receive and/or increase your faith?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"For God so loved the world that he gave his only Son, so that everyone who believes in him might not perish but might have eternal life." (John 3:16)

Canadian Catholic poet finds new venues, sources for creative voices

BY MIKE MASTROMATTEO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

TORONTO — A Toronto poet is using her creative gifts in new venues to inspire a new generation to the simple pleasures of poetry and creative use of language.

Desi Di Nardo, a product of Toronto's Catholic school system, is a rising star in Toronto's literary community.

Her poetry has been featured in a number of literary journals, and her poem "Rainbird in the Annex" was featured on the Poetry on the Way displays on Toronto's public transit system. The poem was composed when Di Nardo was just 8 years old.

Di Nardo's work now is coming to the attention of audiences outside Toronto. Her eight-line poem, "Cup 253," was recently published on coffee cups in Starbucks throughout the United States.

The text of the poem was crafted specially to fit the curved surface of the coffee cup, allowing patrons easy readability.

"When I learned that the Starbucks company was interested in my poetry, I decided to tailor my work so it would fit the cup specs with a slant to it so that it might appeal to the masses and not just to a literate or specified audience," Di Nardo said in a recent interview. She said the Starbucks poem has generated positive response from throughout the United States and beyond.

"I've received a fair bit of positive feedback from people across the world who have reached out to express thanks and to relay how it affected them," she said. "Regardless of whether you share the same sentiments, the important thing is individuals speaking up, speaking out and sharing ideas."

For Di Nardo, a parishioner at Toronto's downtown St. Peter Church, poetry and creative writing are a means to stay attuned to one's spirituality.

Di Nardo, who studied literature at the University of Toronto, caught the attention of Father Giorgio Di Cicco, a priest of the Toronto Archdiocese and the poet laureate for the city of Toronto.

Father Di Cicco describes Di Nardo's work as poetry to be "thankful for."

In the preface of Di Nardo's latest work of poems, "The Plural of Some Things," Father Di Cicco outlined his own impressions of the young creator. "How refreshing to find a writer so unabashedly poetic as Desi Di Nardo," he said.

"In a world of politicized screeching and lament, one is reminded of Pablo Neruda's definition of art as that which 'gives people hope.' By that definition Di Nardo stands head and shoulders above the mob of academic sirens and macho wailers," he said.

Di Nardo uses words, language and artifice to see everyday realities in a new way, drawing inspiration from nature, urban life and plain geography.

Her work "Canadian Moose" is a seemingly simple poem about homelessness that on nuanced reading takes on a more troubling message about suffering and society's tendency to ignore social problems.

"I believe poetry is universal and is something that everyone can relate to," Di Nardo said. "As an advocate for poetry, I get satisfaction from seeing people get excited about poetry, whether it has to do with reading it or even attempting to write it."

Di Nardo also mentors young people looking for outlets for their own creative expression. She conducts poetry and writing workshops in Toronto high schools, and she is about to begin a 10-week internship as a writer in residence with Loretto College Catholic secondary school.

Known as Student Writers and Teachers, the program is sponsored by the Toronto Catholic District School Board and Descant literary journal.

Lenora Rissin, a teacher at Jarvis Collegiate, a Toronto public high school, has invited Di Nardo to conduct a number of writing workshops, which would include "huge classes of students who were not academically inclined."

"Desi approached them with such enthusiasm, such warmth, such a contagious love for her subject, such insight which was communicated so clearly, gently and interactively," that the students responded quite well, Rissin said.

'Kings' based on biblical account

NEW YORK (CNS) — "Kings" is a new drama series based loosely on the biblical account of the life of King David in which the pious but scheming monarch of an imaginary land called Gilboa, King Silas Benjamin (Ian McShane), attempts to capitalize on the sudden fame of farm boy turned warrior David Shepherd (Chris Egan), who becomes a hero after rescuing the sovereign's son, Jack (Sebastian Stan), taken prisoner by the forces of Gilboa's neighbor and enemy, the land of Gath.

David falls for Silas' daughter, Michelle (Allison Miller), while preacher Ephram Samuels (Eamonn Walker), General Linus Abner (Wes Studi) and financier William Cross (Dylan Baker) all jockey for influence.

Though lavishly mounted and ably acted, especially by McShane, this tale of courtly romance and political intrigue is essentially a prime-time soap opera with religious overtones.

And a few mature plotlines turning on adultery and homosexuality, while discreetly handled, make it best for adults.

Kings premieres Sunday, March 15, 8-10 p.m. EDT on NBC.

Children's adoration teaches reverence for Eucharist

parishioner, got the idea from a friend in her hometown of Nashville, Tenn.

"I thought it was particularly appropriate for this diocese because we have the Eucharistic Congress," Kennedy said.

When she approached Father Reid with the idea, he agreed to host the service.

"It's a way to educate kids about the Eucharist and what we believe as Catholics," said Father Reid.

"Once a month we invite the kids to come," he said, and each time, "we teach them a little bit more."

The services, which are open to all families of the diocese, are typically held on the second Wednesday of each month during the school year.

When they began in October 2007, approximately 75 children came to the first one.

"Parents want to be able to bring their children to adoration," said Father Reid, but "a lot of kids don't know how to behave in front of the Eucharist."

That's where he steps in.

"If you teach them, they can be quiet in front of the Blessed Sacrament for 15 or 20 minutes," he said.

"Father Reid is really good with the kids," said Molly Beckert, a parishioner at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte who brings her three young children to adoration each month.

"I want to teach my children that the center of their lives has to be the Eucharist."

— Margaret Kennedy

"He coaches them all along as he's going," she said.

"He talks about his vestments and the way we are supposed to be in front of the holy Eucharist," said Kennedy.

Most of the kids who come on a regular basis can follow along with the prayers in the missal.

"They know the 'O Salutaris' and 'Tantum Ergo' and they can recite the Divine Praises," said Father Reid.

"Exposing them at such a young age, I think, has an impact on them that we don't even realize," said Beckert.

"In a way the little kids grasp it easier," she said, referring to her children's comprehension of the true presence of Christ in the Eucharist. "They just believe innocently."

Kennedy agreed, "Even my 2-year-old knows to prostrate in front of the holy Eucharist," she said.

"I want to teach my children that the center of their lives has to be the Eucharist," Kennedy said. "And this has only reinforced that."

Eucharistic adoration "is a part of our faith," said Father Reid. "It's a great gift that we can share with our kids."

The gathering of souls for the Divine Shepherd

Bishop Begley's missionary spirit continues to guide, inspire throughout the Diocese of Charlotte

This month we celebrate the centennial of the birth of Bishop Michael J. Begley, the first bishop of Charlotte, who was born March 12, 1909.

As we celebrate 100 years since the birth of our founding bishop, we thank God that he provided us with such a good shepherd to bring the Diocese of Charlotte into existence.

After having served as a priest in North Carolina for 37 years, Bishop Begley was ordained the first bishop of Charlotte at St. Patrick Cathedral Jan. 12, 1972.

Bishop Michael J. Begley

Bishop Begley's words

The following words from Bishop Begley's address to the congregation at the end of his ordination Mass in St. Patrick Cathedral remind us of the humility with which he exercised his ministry as bishop.

He acknowledged that he bore a "burden of servitude" under the Lord, and that not only he, but everyone in the diocese, bore the burden of servitude to further Christ's mission.

Here are Bishop Begley's words from his ordination Mass:

"It is with a sense of deep humility that I acknowledge the responsibility vested in me here in what is now St. Patrick's Cathedral in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"I am grateful to His Holiness, Pope Paul VI, for his confidence entrusted to me. I am also grateful to His Excellency, the Most Reverend Apostolic Delegate, for this expression of his kindness to us in coming here; to Bishop Waters, and for all of you in expressing your kindness in being with us for the erection of this Diocese of Charlotte.

Cursillo movement, I should like to say to you as to the others that I refer to this not as a new day, but the beginning of a fourth day in my priestly life.

"I ask all of you to pray that the Holy Spirit will guide all of us in the gathering of souls for the Divine Shepherd. This is a challenge that lies ahead.

"We are all aware of the circumstances and environment of the day. We need not exaggerate nor underestimate therefore. However, as the people of God we shall pray and work together that his will be accomplished.

"We are all one in Christ, and we all bear an equal burden of servitude under our Lord."

Missionary spirit

Besides his humility and his spirit of devoted service to the Lord, Bishop Begley's missionary spirit was also evident in the address he gave that day at his ordination.

This spirit already had guided him for 37 years of priestly ministry in North Carolina. As he now moved forward with the new diocese, he asked everyone to pray with him that the Holy Spirit would guide the entire diocese "in the gathering of souls for the Divine Shepherd."

To this day, the gathering of souls for the Lord remains the mission of the diocese. The salvation of souls is the mission of the entire Catholic Church. The desire to share the Gospel of Christ and to bring Christ's salvation to everyone continues to motivate the Diocese of Charlotte and all its ministries.

Several tributes to Bishop Begley remain part of the life of our diocese even to this day.

The most important tribute is the vibrant and growing Diocese of Charlotte itself, which is now 37 years old, and which continues to be impelled by the apostolic zeal of our founding bishop to proclaim the Gospel of Christ and to work for the gathering of souls for the Divine Shepherd.

Another tribute to him is the Bishop Begley Conference on Appalachia, which is convened bi-annually to study justice and peace issues as they relate to ministry to the people of Appalachia.

Three Bishop Begley Conferences have been held over the last five years, and a fourth conference is planned for this fall.

The legacy of Bishop Begley's concern for social justice is also honored by the Bishop Begley Award which is given each year by the Diocese of Charlotte's Office of Youth Ministry.

This award is given to a high school-aged youth who excels as a Catholic leader in social justice and community service. This honor has been bestowed on a young person in our diocese every year since 1989.

The Foundation of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte has a Bishop Michael J. Begley Endowment Fund to provide for the general needs of charitable ministries throughout the Diocese of Charlotte.

This endowment reminds us of the many years that Msgr. Begley served as director of Catholic Charities for the Diocese of Raleigh before becoming the bishop of Charlotte. His attention to the needs of the poor continued to be foremost in his mind throughout his ministry as bishop.

The strength of the Cursillo movement in the Diocese of Charlotte is another lasting tribute to the bishop.

Having served for many years as the director of the Cursillo movement in the Diocese of Raleigh, he continued to carry on his interest in helping the laity understand their call to holiness by means of Cursillo and other movements, even when serving as bishop of Charlotte. Cursillo was so dear to the bishop that he referred to it in his talk at his ordination Mass.

The Bishop Begley Parish Center at St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem honors the memory of the good bishop who had served as the pastor of the parish for two different terms, 1942-1946 and 1966-1971, before his appointment as bishop.

The memory of Bishop Begley is also honored in the Knights of Columbus council which bears his name: Bishop Michael J. Begley Council 770 in Charlotte. This is the first Knights council in North Carolina.

We love the brethren

At Bishop Begley's ordination Mass, St. John's Gospel was read, which contains Our Lord's command: "This is my commandment: love one another as I have loved you."

The Lord's command to love one another took root in the heart of Bishop Begley, and through his ministry as bishop it also took lasting root in the life of the Diocese of Charlotte. His service as bishop was guided by his motto: We love the brethren.

May the Holy Spirit, who inspired a spirit of humble service in our founding bishop, continue to guide every one of us throughout the Diocese of Charlotte in the missionary work of the gathering of souls for the Divine Shepherd.

The suffering servant

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

The word around the country is that Washington has become the epicenter of the nation. Daily we are hearing of billions of dollars being doled out to bolster the economy.

Models aimed at bailing out businesses, home owners and families are being redesigned behind congressional doors, and President Barack Obama is on the airwaves continuously trying to guide the U.S. through its woes.

These strategies are laudable. New models are always helpful when business as usual isn't helping. And it is heartening to experience the country's leader working feverishly to reverse our major problems.

If these efforts are to succeed, however, the model of Christ, the suffering servant, must be at the epicenter. During his ministry, Christ asked the apostles, "Who do people say that I am?"

They replied, "John the Baptist." Still others said one of the prophets. Then Peter spoke up and said Jesus is the Christ.

What followed next is ironic. Christ said he must go up to Jerusalem to suffer and die. Peter then took Christ aside and rebuked him.

Christ turned to Peter and said, "Get behind me, Satan. You are not thinking as God does, but as human beings do."

One moment there is accord, and the next moment there is discord; but why?

In the minds of the Jews, the Messiah was to come as a triumphal conqueror and bring lasting peace and prosperity to Israel. Christians embrace Christ as the Messiah who has come to suffer and die for us, and not wallow in self-serving triumphalism.

Selfless sacrifice and suffering for another is the divine model for true living. It is the ultimate means for achieving peace, harmony and joy.

Many of our financial problems are the result of immoral people whose selfishness has brought suffering to families, retirees, businesses, schools, charitable institutions and a host of others.

Prominent people thought to be respectful and reliable succumbed to the "get it now, don't deny yourself what is in it for you" way of life.

The antithesis of this is the suffering servant model that teaches us we were not created for ourselves, but for others. It is the opposite of narcissism, vanity and self-indulgence.

And it advocates the common good over personal preservation, citizen sacrificing and suffering for others as the highest principles of life. If we are to overcome our present crisis, thinking the way God thinks must be preferred to thinking as human beings do.

Every day has moments of pure joy

God wants YOU to be happy, even during Lent

How do I know that God wants me to be happy, even during Lent?

Jesus came precisely to teach us that God is our Father in heaven.

Doesn't every father want his children to be happy?

At the Last Supper Jesus summed up his mission on earth: "I have told you this so that my joy may be in you and your joy may be complete" (Jn 15:11).

Believing this is a matter of faith, not feelings. But isn't Lent supposed to focus on the cross? Yes, but the joy of Easter is the theme of the entire season of Lent. Christ commanded us to love one another, which is both a joy and a cross.

Wherever there is love, there is service; wherever there is service, there is sacrifice; and wherever there is sacrifice, there is suffering.

We are called to the cross, but there is nothing contradictory between joy and the cross.

Jesus told us that he wants his joy to be in us. He knows very well that the only way to find real joy is to put aside self-pity. By serving others we tend to forget ourselves.

Gratifying our senses is good, but it can only bring temporary happiness, like quenching one's thirst on a hot day. We can only drink so much water.

Supernatural joy, on the other hand, is being aware that God truly dwells within us. That awareness is what brings true human fulfillment.

We all need to love and be loved, and we all need to strive to fulfill our purpose in life. Finding one's purpose is a thrilling adventure.

Psalm 9:3 sings of supernatural joy: "I will delight and rejoice in you."

St. Paul repeats the theme: "Eye has not seen ... what God has prepared for those who love him" (1 Cor 2:9).

Jesus said, "Be not afraid." He implied that there is no true danger in life because your heavenly Father is always close by, protecting you.

We've all had days when feelings get in the way of living joyfully. We get down on ourselves and forget to hold on to the knowledge of God's love.

However, the ascetical discipline of controlling our thoughts can liberate us! And as such, why not put on the indomitable will to count your blessings?

In the book "War Within and Without: Diaries and Letters of Anne Morrow Lindbergh," Lindbergh tells how she dealt with times when her joy seemed to evaporate.

Spirituality for Today

She resolved to think about the moments of inner satisfaction. These came her way each day, and were times of laughter and kindness provided by her family and friends.

"Every day has these moments of pure joy," she told herself, "even on the dullest and saddest day."

When we make a point of appreciating the daily little joys of life, we can begin to relax more, taking pleasure in them.

"Some blessings are so subtle," she continued, that "we can easily miss them if we are not watchful; like the memory of a special smile, or a beautiful flower in full bloom, or a welcome letter from a friend. All the little joys of life can contribute to a brighter mood. The experiences that lift the spirit can be savored for hours, even days, and the list is limitless. Keeping a gratitude journal."

Take responsibility for your own happiness. It pleases the Lord when you do.

Christianity promotes human progress, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Because Christianity promotes a culture of values, it aids in human development and progress, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Early Christian monastic women and men began this essential role by proclaiming the Gospel and spreading knowledge about the arts and sciences to the general population, he said March 11 during his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square.

Promoting the Gospel "must also entail promoting a true human culture," he said.

The pope continued his catechesis on early Christian writers of the East and West by focusing his talk on St. Boniface, the eighth-century martyr and missionary of the Germanic peoples.

The Apostle of Germany tirelessly spread the faith, promoted Christian morality and established dioceses and monasteries throughout northern Europe, the pope said.

He said St. Boniface was so ardently in love with the word of God that he zealously followed its call and his duty to bring it to others even though it meant risking his own life.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In our catechesis on the early Christian writers of East and West, we now turn to St. Boniface, the apostle of the Germans.

Born in England and baptized with the name Winfrid, he embraced the monastic life and was ordained a priest. Despite his promise as a scholar, he sensed the call to proclaim the Gospel to the pagans of the continent.

After an initial setback, he visited Rome and was charged by Pope Gregory II with the mission to evangelize the Germanic peoples.

Taking the name Boniface, he worked tirelessly for the spread of the faith and the promotion of Christian morality, established bishoprics and monasteries throughout northern Europe, and contributed in no small way to the growth of a Christian culture.

He crowned his witness to Christ by a martyr's death, and was buried in the great monastery of Fulda.

St. Boniface continues to inspire us by his example of missionary zeal, his complete fidelity to the word of God and the integrity of the Catholic faith, his strong sense of communion with the Apostolic See, and his efforts to promote the fruitful encounter of Germanic culture with the Roman-Christian heritage.

A double standard on conscience rights

The Obama administration wasted little time in working toward revoking a regulation protecting the conscience rights of health care professionals.

The regulation took effect only two days before the inauguration. Issued by the Department of Health and Human Services, the regulation implements three statutes passed by Congress in the past 35 years prohibiting discrimination against health professionals who decline to participate in medical procedures — including abortion — because of religious beliefs or moral objections.

The rules apply to institutions receiving government money and would require as many as 584,000 employers ranging from major hospitals to doctors' offices and nursing homes to certify that they are complying with several existing federal laws that protect the conscience rights of health care workers.

The regulation was approved last summer and took effect after a required waiting period. During that period, the attorneys general of eight states, Planned Parenthood of America and the National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Association filed suit to block its implementation.

There is an obvious double standard at work here.

The repeated claim of those who want to keep abortion legal is that abortion is a decision involving a woman and her physician, not appropriate for government involvement. This implies that conscience trumps law.

If that is the case, why such reaction to a rule that merely implements statutes that protect the same primacy of conscience?

The notion that a court can demand health care professionals perform actions they believe to be evil "is getting lost in the heated rhetoric" surrounding the abortion issue, said John Brehany, executive director of the Catholic Medical Association.

Abortion is not the only issue. The premise that the government can supersede the conscience of a doctor or nurse can be extended.

States with physician-assisted suicide laws, such as Washington and Oregon, could demand participation by physicians for the same reason. In some states, physicians have refused to participate in capital punishment.

For the same reason, that conscience clause could be overridden.

"By eliminating conscience rights for health care providers who adhere to traditional medical ethics, we will effectively eliminate future as well as present health care providers from the health care system," wrote Nancy Valko, president of Missouri Nurses for Life.

"Will the health care system be populated with health care professionals who are comfortable with ending life?" she asked.

The hypocritical double standard was predicted by Cardinal Justin Rigali, chair of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Pro-Life Activities, in a letter to Congress last July. He said the issue "provides self-described 'pro-choice' advocates with an opportunity to demonstrate their true convictions. ...

Consider This

"Do they at least hold that 'freedom of choice' must belong to everyone, including those who have deep moral concerns in this area? Or is the 'pro-choice' label a misleading mask for an agenda of actively promoting and even imposing morally controversial procedures on those who conscientiously hold different views?"

The revocation proposal will undergo review by the Office of Management and Budget and then be published in the Federal Register, which begins a 30-day period for public comment.

"Physicians must defend their right to practice medicine in accordance with their conscience," said Brehany.

It is oppression to force people to compromise their conscience in order to practice their profession.

Let's accept as fact that the rights of patients would be limited by the rule. The result would be no more than inconvenience as patients would have to seek another physician whose views are in concert with theirs.

But inconvenience resulting from limiting a right is a lesser evil than denial of a right of conscience.

Being forced to do something against conscience is a serious deprivation of freedom.

INDULGING IN FORGIVENESS

Italian young people listen to a guide describing the central doors into the Basilica of St. Paul Outside the Walls in Rome March 10. A plenary indulgence is offered for Catholics who visit the basilica during the year of St. Paul, which ends June 29. To receive the indulgence a person must confess sins, receive the Eucharist and offer specific prayers.

Splendidly pure: Receiving indulgences in the year of St. Paul

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Many of the pilgrims recently coming out of the Basilica of St. Paul Outside the Walls were glowing — and not just because the sun was shining brightly.

Crossing the threshold of the “Pauline Doors,” praying at St. Paul’s tomb, confessing their sins, receiving the Eucharist and offering specific prayers, they came away with a plenary indulgence.

Sister Palmagnese Rossini, a member of the Sisters of Mary Reparatrix, made her pilgrimage March 10.

Asked why she wanted an indulgence, she said: “We are all children of Adam and Eve and despite the sacraments and the sacrifice of Jesus, we have a residue of sin. We want to be splendidly pure like the Blessed Mother,” and an indulgence gives repentant Christians that extra shine.

The Catechism of the Catholic Church defines an indulgence as “the remission before God of the temporal punishment due to sin whose guilt has already been forgiven.”

Especially for the Pauline year — marking the 2,000th anniversary of the apostle Paul’s birth — the Catholic Church is offering an indulgence to pilgrims who visit his tomb at the Basilica of St. Paul’s Outside the Walls.

Cardinal Andrea Cordero Lanza di Montezemolo, archpriest of the basilica, said that with the Pauline year, which began last June, “the number of pilgrims from around the world is increasing.”

“They come to visit the tomb of the apostle,” he said, and the indulgence is an extra grace available to those who have the right attitude of faith.

In an article for the Vatican newspaper, L’Osservatore Romano, the pope’s chief ecumenist said the Pauline year reminds Christians — both Catholics and Protestants — of St. Paul’s central teaching that we receive justification and salvation from Jesus Christ through no merit of our own.

Writing in the March 7 edition of the newspaper, Cardinal Walter Kasper, president of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, said Catholics must understand that the church changed the way indulgences were handled in order to make their meaning and their relationship to salvation in Christ clear.

“When we speak of the church’s treasure of grace, we are not talking about any material reality or a kind of depository from which the church can make withdrawals when needed,” he wrote. “The treasure of grace is, in the end, Jesus Christ” and his immeasurable mercy, which the church — the body of Christ — shares.

Even after a person’s sins are forgiven, the cardinal said, it is obvious he or she “still lives in this world marked by the consequences and structures of sin.”

An indulgence helps attenuate those consequences and gives each Christian added strength to continue the daily battle against sin, he said.

While Catholics are under no obligation to seek an indulgence, he said, “it is a useful and beneficial pastoral gift for facing ... the struggle against the power and violence of evil.”

Obama, president of U.S. bishops hold private meeting

WASHINGTON (CNS) — President Barack Obama met for half an hour March 17 with Chicago Cardinal Francis E. George, president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, the White House and the USCCB announced.

Brief statements issued by the White House and the USCCB said little more than that the two presidents had met for a private, 30-minute afternoon session in the Oval Office.

The meeting was not included in Obama’s daily schedule released to the press and no mention was made of it by either organization until it was over.

“The president and Cardinal George discussed a wide range of issues, including important opportunities for the government and the Catholic Church to continue their long-standing partnership to tackle some of the nation’s most pressing challenges,” said the White House statement.

“The president thanked Cardinal George for his leadership and for the contributions of the Catholic Church in America and around the world,” said the statement.

The statement from the USCCB said:

“The meeting was private. Cardinal George and President Obama discussed the Catholic Church in the United States and its relation to the new administration.

“The meeting lasted approximately 30 minutes.”

“At the conclusion, Cardinal George expressed his gratitude for the meeting and his hopes that it will foster fruitful dialogue for the sake of the common good,” the USCCB statement added.

Mercy Sister Mary Ann Walsh, director of media relations for the USCCB, said she expected no further information about the meeting to be released.

FROM THE VATICAN

Papal preacher says intelligent design is truth of faith, not science

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Affirming the reality of an intelligent design for the creation and development of the universe is not a scientific theory, but a statement of faith, said the preacher of the papal household.

Capuchin Father Raniero Cantalamessa, offering a Lenten meditation to Pope Benedict XVI and top Vatican officials March 13, said the controversy that has arisen between scientists supporting evolution and religious believers promoting creationism or intelligent design is due mainly to a confusion between scientific theory and the truths of faith.

The intelligent design theory asserts that the development and evolution of life is such a hugely complex process that a supreme being, God, must be directly involved in it. While some proponents of intelligent design claim that it is a scientifically valid theory, most scientists dismiss it as pseudoscience.

The arguments, Father Cantalamessa said, are due to the fact that, "in my opinion, there is not a clear enough distinction between intelligent design as a scientific theory and intelligent design as a truth of faith."

While science and evolution can explain part of the history of creation and how life exists, they cannot explain why, he said.

"Even those who eliminate the idea of God from the horizon don't eliminate the mystery," the preacher said.

"We know everything about the world, except how it started. The believer is convinced that the Bible furnishes precisely this missing first page. There, as on the title page of every book, is the name of the author and the title of the work," he said.

for those suffering from cancer or other incurable diseases will take place March 26 at 7:30 p.m. at St. Matthew Church, 8015 Ballantyne Commons Pkwy. Pope declares year of the priest to inspire spiritual perfection

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI declared a year of the priest in an effort to encourage "spiritual perfection" in priests.

The pope will open the special year with a vespers service at the Vatican June 19 — the feast of the Sacred Heart of Jesus and the day for the sanctification of priests. He will close the celebrations during a World Meeting of Priests in St. Peter's Square June 19, 2010.

The pope made the announcement during an audience March 16 with members of the Vatican Congregation for Clergy.

He met with some 70 participants of the congregation's March 16-18 plenary assembly, which focused on the missionary identity of the priest and his mission to sanctify, teach and govern.

During this jubilee year, the pope will also proclaim St. John Vianney to be patron saint of all the world's priests. At present he is considered the patron saint of parish priests.

This year marks the 150th anniversary of the death of this 19th-century saint who represents a "true example of a priest at the service of the flock of Christ," the pope said.

In his address, Pope Benedict said the priestly ministry consists of total adherence to the ecclesial tradition of participating "in a spiritually intense new life and a new lifestyle which was inaugurated by the Lord Jesus and which the apostles made their own."

Priestly ordination creates new men who are bestowed with the gift and office of sanctifying, teaching and governing, he said.

The pope underlined the necessary and "indispensable struggle for moral perfection which must dwell in every authentically priestly heart."

The pope said he was calling for the special year for priests in an effort to foster the priest's yearning "for spiritual perfection, upon which the effectiveness of their ministry principally depends."

Priests also must be "present, identifiable and recognizable — for their judgment of faith, their personal virtues and their attire — in the fields of culture and charity which have always been at the heart of the church's mission," he said.

Missionaries of Charity re-elect Sister Nirmala as superior general

CALCUTTA, India (CNS) — The Missionaries of Charity, the congregation founded by Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta, re-elected Sister Nirmala Joshi as superior general March 13.

But because the order's religious superior general can be elected for only two consecutive terms, her third term in office will require papal approval, reported the Asian church news agency UCA News.

More than 160 electors from around the world cast their votes in a secluded Missionaries of Charity house during the last phase of the congregation's 10th general chapter, which began Feb. 1.

Archbishop Lucas Sirkar of Calcutta presided over the election of the superior general and four councilors.

According to the constitution of the Missionaries of Charity, the congregation holds its general chapter every six years to address major congregational issues and other matters. It requires that the successful candidate for superior general receive an absolute majority of votes after three rounds of secret ballots.

Irish Catholics pay tribute to immigrants on St. Patrick's Day

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY

MOUNT HOLLY — Irish-American Catholics gathered on St. Patrick's Day to pay tribute to those who helped plant Catholicism's roots in the Diocese of Charlotte.

The Ancient Order of Hibernians (AOH) and Ladies Ancient Order of Hibernians (LAOH) held a ceremony and Mass at St. Joseph Church in Mount Holly March 17.

In the church cemetery, the Hibernians placed a wreath on the grave of Father T. J. Cronin, the church's first pastor, and U.S. and Irish flags on the graves of the Irish immigrants who built the church in 1843.

"We're here to pay tribute to those who came before us," said Janice Donahue of the LAOH.

"They came from Ireland with nothing, but they were strong in their faith," she said of the immigrants, who mined for gold along the Catawba River.

"This church was their place to come and talk about their home, their families and their faith," said Donahue.

The small, white clapboard church accommodates nearly 100 people. It has no electricity, no bathrooms; six big windows were used to light and heat the church.

St. Joseph Church is the fourth Catholic church built in the state. In 1979, it was designated as a National Historical Site by the U.S. Department of Interior.

Oratorian Father Joseph Pearce, AOH and LAOH state chaplain, celebrated Mass after the ceremony.

The Hibernians hoped the Mass would put faith at the forefront of some local St. Patrick's Day activities.

"In Ireland, St. Patrick's Day is a religious holiday, and it needs to be here in the United States," said Joe Dougherty of the AOH.

The Ancient Order of Hibernians, founded in New York in 1836, describes itself as the oldest lay Catholic organization in the United States.

Take the whole to heal a part?

Belmont Abbey professor to clarify stem cell debate

CORRESPONDENT

Dr. Grattan Brown

BELMONT — "As faithful citizens, Catholics should form their consciences on this issue so that they can effectively cut through false rhetoric and oppose all killing of embryonic human life," said Dr. Grattan Brown.

Brown, assistant professor of theology at Belmont Abbey College, was speaking about the issue of stem cell research. He will present "Obtaining Stem Cells: Should We Take the Whole to Heal a Part?" at Belmont Abbey College March 25.

"Some think sacrificing embryos is no big deal, but think about it: we all began that way," Brown said in an interview with The Catholic News & Herald.

"In contrast to other types of stem cell research, embryonic stem cell research systematically destroys human life and should not be accepted by any humane society," he said.

The debate about the morality of different types of stem cell research came to the forefront with President Barack Obama's March 9 signing of an executive order reversing the ban on federal funding of embryonic stem cell research.

Calling the research "immoral," the National Catholic Bioethics Center recently explained how embryonic stem cell research has failed to yield positive results and how patients treated with these methods have reported tumors and tissue rejection.

"Recent advances have obviated the need for destroying human embryos to access pluripotent stem cells," the center said in a March 9 statement.

"Scientists have demonstrated that they can reprogram ordinary human skin cells into pluripotent stems cells which will not cause tumors or rejection. There are several ethical stem cell research alternatives that already have successfully treated thousands of patients," the statement said.

Some recent successes in ethical stem cell research include treatments for cardiac disease, pediatric brain tumors, cerebral palsy and blood diseases.

Misunderstanding of the research is not limited to Catholics, Brown said.

"There is a lot of false rhetoric and emotional manipulation out there," he said. "Most of the time, evaluating research involves balancing benefits and risks. This method works pretty well until you consider means of research that automatically offend dignity in some way, like killing."

"This issue will impact both our lives and our faithfulness because practices like embryo destructive research greatly influence our society and culture," Brown said.

Man's quest for meaning leads to monastic life popular religions," said Odom, who is now a parishioner at Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte.

After looking into other world religions, he found that he was being drawn back to his Christian roots.

He began reading books about Catholic saints — John of the Cross, Padre Pio, Teresa of Avila and Francis of Assisi.

"I could feel or understand what they were saying," said Odom. "I thought, 'I want to follow these people to Jesus.'"

He also began reading books about Mary, particularly about her apparitions in Fatima and Lourdes. It was around that same time that Odom decided he wanted to become a monk.

"I sold my house, gave my car away and I moved to Greenville, North Carolina," he said.

He wanted to start living a simple, monastic kind of life.

"I decided there was no sense in waiting until I go to into a monastery, I might as well start now," he said.

Through further research, Odom discovered Belmont Abbey, which prompted his move to Charlotte.

"Belmont Abbey was the closest monastery that I knew about," he said. "In my head, monasteries were places where there weren't a lot of people."

He was surprised to find Belmont

Abbey at the center of a bustling college campus and decided he would probably be better off in a more secluded environment.

"When I came to Charlotte, I came here with nothing. So I basically was in the men's shelter for three or four months," he said.

In the meantime, he got a temporary job, found a place to live and began attending Our Lady of Consolation Church. It was there that he met Dale Brown, pastoral associate and coordinator of the parish Right of Christian Initiation for Adults (RCIA) program.

Brown said that Odom's conversion was unique because he felt drawn to religious life from the beginning.

"He knew where he wanted to go but he just didn't understand how to get there," said Brown, who was able to point him in the right direction.

"I said to him, 'Rodney you have to keep in mind that God is not going anywhere,'" said Brown, as she explained to Odom that he would have to go through RCIA before he could become a monk.

"Once he came to fully understand what the church teaches, he was willing to abide by those teachings," she said.

After his meeting with Brown, Odom said his approach to his conversion process shifted.

"In my mind I was fired up to get through the process," said Odom, but he was beginning to understand that he would have to be patient.

During his time in RCIA, Odom continued his search for a monastery with a more cloistered environment.

In his search, he came across Mepkin Abbey in Moncks Corner, S.C.

When he visited Mepkin Abbey for the first time, he stayed for three days.

He went for a second visit in fall 2007 and stayed for two weeks.

"During those first visits I guess I was just extremely nervous," said Odom, reflecting on the difficulty he had adjusting to the strict monastic lifestyle, which included rising at 3 a.m. each day for prayer.

After he became Catholic at the Easter Vigil in 2008, Odom arranged to make a 30-day visit to Mepkin Abbey in February 2009.

"Each time he came back with a better attitude," said Brown.

"When he came back from the month-long visit, he had a glow on him that I had never seen before," she said.

Odom agreed that his most recent visit was also the most beneficial. He attributes that to a stronger devotion to the Eucharist and a more open state of mind.

"I think a lot of it had to do with the fact that I had been dedicating myself to go to Mass five times a week," he said.

In keeping with his simplistic lifestyle, Odom relied on public transportation to get to church — a three-and-a-half hour roundtrip journey by bus.

"I was now used to dedicating a significant portion of my life to God," he said.

Going to Mass became a priority for Odom. It became "more important than getting sleep," he said.

"Somehow I must have been made empty," he said, because "this time when I went to Mepkin, I received a lot."

"After the first week, your mind starts to quiet down," he said of his month-long stay at the monastery. "You sit and you start to discover things that you never knew you could discover just by sitting."

During his visit, Odom also had a chance to meet with the abbot and several of the priests.

He filled out an application, and if all goes according to plan, he will enter the monastery in September.

"The reason I became Catholic is because of the saints," said Odom, "reading about the saints and how they lived their lives."

On his journey from the book-lined walls of the Philadelphia public library to the tranquil Mepkin Abbey monastery, Odom has learned that certain things in life just take time.

"Patience was not one of my strong points," he said. But "it is a characteristic of monastic life."

"If you don't learn patience then you can't be a monk," said Odom.

But sometimes he has a hard time hiding his enthusiasm.

"Once you discover the love of God and how sincere it is and how pure it is, it's hard not to follow it," he said.

Iraqi refugees find hope, seek better future in N.C.

Psalm 55:23 — "Cast your care upon the Lord, who will give you support" — and the words from Joshua 1:9 — "Do not fear nor be dismayed, for the Lord, your God, is with you wherever you go."

Amal and her children were resettled in Charlotte in February through the Refugee Resettlement Office of Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte. The past few years of their lives have been fraught with peril and danger.

She and her husband were middle-class, well-educated Christians with promising futures in the construction of new homes in Baghdad. The industry collapsed with the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003.

Shortly after, Amal and her husband — both of whom speak English — secured jobs as translators for the coalition forces. Working closely with U.S. troops, Amal saw the good they were trying to accomplish in Iraq, especially the democratic way of life they hoped to establish after the fall of Saddam Hussein. She was grateful for their efforts.

Then her cousin was murdered. A message from the terrorists assured Amal the bullet had been meant for her, because she "was a Christian and was working with the enemy," she said.

Both she and her husband quit their jobs as translators and went into hiding.

Terrorists next kidnapped Amal's brother and his family had to pay $20,000 for his release. He returned home with a message for Amal: the terrorists would find her sooner or later, and kill her.

So Amal and her family fled to Jordan, praying en route that the border would be open when they arrived. Amal believes her prayers were answered — when they arrived at the border, they were allowed to cross, but the border was then closed to the cars behind them.

Amal's faith did not falter, even when her husband's passport was stolen and he was subsequently deported back to Iraq. There he found a note from the Islamic Army of Iraq pinned on the door of their home: "You are Christian and work with the Americans. So we are taking your house and are making it our headquarters."

Amal's husband stayed with relatives, but he was soon kidnapped. After a year, the family made contact with the terrorist group and paid a ransom for his release.

Today he remains in Iraq in hiding, trying to find a way to leave the country.

Challenges ahead

Many Iraqi families have been torn apart since the invasion and subsequent violence. A significant number of Christians have already fled, and continue to flee, Iraq and the Middle East.

Latin-rite Archbishop Jean Sleiman of Baghdad, in an interview with Vatican Radio Feb. 23, said Christians in countries like Iraq and the Palestinian territories leave out of "fear of Islamic fundamentalism and being legally discriminated against" in an Islamic republic or under Shariah, the religiously based law of Islam.

He said the international community must help Iraq build peace and democracy by guaranteeing "the primacy of law and primacy of nation."

"Many problems will be solved because (a state of) law equals equality and justice," he said.

Catholic Social Services' Refugee Resettlement Office helped resettle nearly 400 refugees in 2008. While the number of refugees has increased over the years, federal funding has decreased.

"This is a challenge for us," said Cira Ponce, Refugee Resettlement

Office director.

"This ministry is a service God has blessed and, we trust, God will continue to help us find the means to provide for people like Amal," she said.

Amal said democracy and freedom are precious to her, and she continues to hope both will prevail and endure in Iraq.

Until that day, she looks forward to the new life her family can create in America. She dreams one of her children will grow up and become a senator.

She currently is looking for work to help support her family and a Catholic parish to join, but a lack of transportation has made both difficult.

In the meantime, she prays every night for her husband's safety and looks forward to the day the family will be reunited.

"I know that God will bring him home. I trust in my God," she said.

Championing women's rights

Local Catholics participate in annual U.N. commission on women

BY MARY B. WORTHINGTON
CORRESPONDENT

NEW YORK CITY—The first two weeks of March found tens of thousands of women from around the world at the United Nations in New York City for the 53rd Commission on the Status of Women (CSW).

Catholics from the Diocese of Charlotte were among those bringing the Catholic Church's hope-filled message of the dignity of women to the March 2-13 commission, which focused on the role of women as caretakers, specifically in the context of HIV and AIDS.

The CSW is a functional panel of the U.N. Economic and Social Council and is devoted solely to gender equality and the advancement of women.

Representatives of member states gather each year at the U.N. headquarters to assess progress on gender equality, set global standards and formulate tangible policies to promote gender equality and the advancement of women worldwide.

Jessica Rohaly, 20, a parishioner of St. Matthew Church in Charlotte and a sophomore at the College of Notre Dame of Maryland, attended the commission — her second — with fellow students, faculty and members of the School Sisters of Notre Dame, who sponsor the college.

Rohaly helped to develop document language for the commission regarding the importance of education for girls.

Dr. Martha Shuping, a psychologist and parishioner of St. Leo the Great

"The ability to get my voice heard on this topic was very important to me."

Church in Winston-Salem, held workshops with Concerned Women for America for world leaders on the detrimental aftereffects of abortion on women's health.

Both women reported success in their missions.

For Rohaly, success was hearing the text developed by her group proposed during a presentation by a delegate from the United States.

"While I do not know whether our language will be used in the final document, the most exciting part of the conference was to hear our words used," said Rohaly.

Speaking on the issue of the rights and dignity of women, Rohaly explained how girls in poor countries are often pulled from school to care for a family member afflicted with HIV and AIDS.

"The effects of the epidemic of AIDS often falls on women and girls," she said. "Even if living with the disease themselves, they are often expected to perform extensive domestic duties along with caring for sick family members."

commissions since 2005, specializes in psychological care of women and men after abortion.

Most recently, she co-authored a study in the Journal of Psychiatric Research indicating an increased incidence of a variety of mental health problems after abortion based on analysis of the national comorbidity survey.

Shuping shared some examples of attendees at her workshops who thanked her for her research, explaining how it will help them in their home countries where they are resisting pressure for normalizing or legalizing abortion.

"Pro-woman, pro-life non-governmental organizations have a very important role to play, even if abortion is not the specific topic of the commission," said Shuping.

"Because there is a constant pressure by the U.N. to make abortion a universal right, it is all the more important to educate on the issue during the CSW," she said. "The CSW should look to a long range of women's issues, not just the one issue addressed during a particular conference. Abortion is not a solution because it causes so much pain for women."

"Why not educate the women of the world on the negative impact of abortion since so many are involved in promoting it," she suggested. "Let's let the nations know the consequences."

Finding solutions

Though abortion was not the commission's focus, Samantha Singson, director of Government Relations for Catholic Family and Human Rights Institute, said "the United States delegation openly stated that 'sexual and reproductive health and rights' would be a priority issue for the Obama administration."

"Reproductive health" is a phrase commonly used to refer to access to abortion, contraceptives and sterilization.

Both Shuping and Rohaly spoke of the challenges of bringing forth

Catholic Church teachings in a way that is acceptable to a secular or non-Catholic audience.

"If we try to evangelize the culture by saying, 'the pope says,' we don't get too far," said Shuping. "However, when you show the scientific data on how abortion hurts women, people are better able to understand."

"We have to get wording into documents that are logical and moral without using religion," said Rohaly. "It's a back-door approach."

The Vatican regularly sends delegations to the commissions. The late Pope John Paul II took a particular interest in the activities of the United Nations regarding the dignity of women.

On the occasion of the fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing in 1995, he wrote "Letter to Women," in which he extolled women's dignity and perseverance despite unfavorable conditions throughout history.

"Women's dignity has often been unacknowledged and their prerogatives misrepresented; they have often been relegated to the margins of society and even reduced to servitude," wrote Pope John Paul.

"We need only think of how the gift of motherhood is often penalized rather than rewarded, even though humanity owes its very survival to this gift ... Women will increasingly play a part in the solution of the serious problems of the future," he wrote.

Rohaly said it was in studying Catholic Church documents and teachings such as "Letter to Women" throughout her high school years that propelled her to take up the challenge and come to the defense of women.

"I just couldn't pass up the opportunity," she said prior to the commission. "The ability to get my voice heard on this topic was very important to me."

To embrace a continent

Pope says trip to Africa will focus on continent's hopes, challenges

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Editor's note: This is part of a series regarding Pope Benedict XVI's March 17-23 trip to Africa and the October Synod of Bishops on Africa.

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI said his trip to Africa would be a missionary journey highlighting the continent's challenges, its enormous potential and its "profound religious soul."

The pope, speaking two days before his departure for Cameroon and Angola, said he was not bringing a political or social program to Africa, but simply the Gospel message of love that is "capable of transforming the world."

"This is the grace that can also renew Africa, because it generates an irresistible power of peace and a deep and radical reconciliation," the pope told pilgrims at his noon blessing March 15.

"With this visit, I intend to embrace the entire African continent: its thousands of differences and its profound religious soul; its ancient cultures and its difficult path of development and reconciliation; its serious problems, its painful wounds and its enormous potential and hopes," he said.

The pope dedicated the trip to St. Joseph, whose feast is March 19, and entrusted to the saint the challenges and hopes of all segments of the African population.

"In particular, I am thinking of the victims of hunger, of disease, of injustice, of fratricidal conflicts and every form of violence that unfortunately continues to strike adults and children, as well as missionaries, priests, men and women religious, and volunteers," he said.

The pope said that among the main purposes of his weeklong visit was to confirm the faith of Catholics and encourage all Christians in ecumenical cooperation. He said the trip, his first to the African continent, was inspired in part by the evangelizing efforts of St. Paul.

"I depart for Africa with the awareness that I have nothing to propose and to give to those I will meet except Christ and the good news of his cross, a mystery of supreme love, of divine love that overcomes every human resistance and makes possible even forgiveness and love for one's enemies," he said.

The pope spent March 17-20 in Cameroon, where he met with African bishops and hand-delivered the working document for the Synod of Bishops for Africa, to be held in Rome next October.

The pope will visit Angola March 20-23, celebrating Masses, meeting with civil and religious leaders and meeting with young people in a soccer stadium.

It is his 11th foreign trip since his election as pope in 2005.

Angola enjoys growth but still recovers from deadly civil war

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — One of Africa's major oil producers, Angola is also one of the world's poorest countries.

Most people live on less than $1 per day, and more than half of the population is unemployed. The average life expectancy is about 38 years.

Angola gained independence from Portugal in 1975 and is still recovering from the physical, social and political repercussions of a 27-year civil war that broke out soon after.

Fighting began between two longtime rivals, the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola, known as MPLA, and the National Union for Total Independence of Angola, or UNITA.

The conflict evolved into a prominent Cold War battle, with the Soviet Union backing the MPLA and the United States supporting UNITA. A peace agreement was signed in 2002, but Angola's constitutional republic remains in transition.

The government is highly centralized and dominated by President Jose Eduardo dos Santos of the MPLA, but elections have been deemed free and fair. Dos Santos held legislative elections in September 2008 and announced plans to hold presidential elections in 2009.

According to reports by Human Rights Watch and the U.S. State Department, Angola's human rights record is marred by a string of abuses, including unlawful killings by police, forced eviction without compensation, restrictions on freedoms of speech and press, and the arbitrary detention and torture of civilians by the Angolan army.

Angola has enjoyed recent economic improvements. High prices in the international oil market have worked to Angola's advantage as a supplier of crude oil to the U.S. and China. Postwar reconstruction efforts and the resettlement of displaced people have led to growth in construction and agriculture.

Catholics in Angola number about 8.6 million, more than half of the 15.5 million total population. The ratio of priests to Catholics in the country is 1-to-10,800, one of the highest in Africa.

The latest Vatican statistics show there are 18 hospitals in Angola owned or administered by the Catholic Church, as well as 42 orphanages, four marriage-counseling centers and 25 centers for social education.

In total the church runs 454 social-service institutions in Angola.

Near the end of the war, church leaders in Angola promoted peace efforts by holding national and diocesan councils to establish humanitarian programs and help rebuild the country.

The bishops' conference of Angola and Sao Tome joined with other Christian churches at an ecumenical peace forum in 1999 to bring Angolan churches together to work for peace and to encourage dialogue with the international community.

Cameroon seen as stable country, but also highly corrupt

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Cameroon was created in 1961 by the unification of French Cameroon and part of British Cameroon.

Situated on the West coast of Central Africa, the country's general stability and fertile land have brought about the development of agriculture, infrastructure and a profitable petroleum industry.

Its economy is dependent on commodity exports; per capita income is about $2,000 a year.

President Paul Biya's Cameroon People's Democratic Movement has retained power for more than 25 years. National elections have been held, but opposition parties say they have been unfair, and human rights organizations have faulted the government for restricting freedoms of speech, press, assembly and association.

According to the U.S. State Department, the country's corruption level is among the highest in the world. A report issued in December 2007 by Transparency International, the global coalition against corruption, said more than 80 percent of Cameroonians surveyed considered the nation's police and political parties to be corrupt.

The number of Catholics in Cameroon is rising steadily. In the 40-year period from 1920 to 1960, the number of Catholics rose from 60,000 to 700,000.

The most recent Vatican statistics tally about 4.8 million Catholics, roughly 26 percent of Cameroon's 18.2 million total population.

The first indigenous priests were ordained in 1935. In 1988, Cardinal Christian Wiyghan Tumi was the first Cameroonian named to the College of Cardinals.

Vatican statistics show there are 23 hospitals, owned or administered by the Catholic Church. The church runs 10 centers for the care of people with Hansen's disease, 12 orphanages and 18 centers for social education.

In total there are 460 social-service centers run by the church in Cameroon.

Cameroon's literacy rate is among the highest in Africa. More than 400,000 students are enrolled in schools, including universities, run by the Catholic Church.

On a road to peace

In Kenya, dioceses work to control ever-present ethnic tension

BY LIZ QUIRIN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Editor's note: This is part of a series regarding Pope Benedict XVI's March 17-23 trip to Africa and the October Synod of Bishops on Africa.

ELDOROT, Kenya — It was the Christmas holidays, and diocesan offices were closed. James Kimisoi, head of the peace and justice commission of the Diocese of Eldoret, planned to be in the office only to pay people who monitored the polls in the December 2007 national elections.

Mwai Kibaki was declared the winner and sworn in as Kenya's president an hour later. Then the violence began, said Kimisoi.

Homes were looted and burned — some with the people locked inside — and some Kenyans were beaten and killed. International observers claimed the election was rigged, and as supporters of opposition leader Raila Odinga expressed outrage, the violence escalated, pitting rival ethnic groups against each other.

The bishop and those diocesan workers who could safely make it to the diocesan compound opened the gates and offered shelter to about 10,000 people.

By Feb. 28, 2008, when a power-sharing government was announced and Odinga became Kenya's prime minister, the overt postelection violence had stopped, and all of the diocesan resources were being used to care for the area's displaced people while promoting reconciliation and peace-building.

One year later, the diocese had made great strides in rebuilding trust among neighbors, but church officials had run out of money to provide most of the services offered before the violence began.

Today, many of those displaced by violence remain living in tents instead of their homes. An uneasy peace crisscrosses the country, where many have said violence bubbles just below the surface, ready to explode again.

Part of the unease remains because people do not trust one another, said Father Charles Lukati, development coordinator for the Diocese of Eldoret.

Church officials also said the perpetrators of the violence have not been named or brought to justice, and many worry that if perpetrators are not held accountable for their crimes, the violence will be repeated and possibly escalate.

A government truth commission has drawn up names of perpetrators, but those names have not been made public.

"Without justice there can be no peace," said Msgr. Michael Rop, Eldoret diocesan vicar general.

"The political violence has disrupted pastoral activities," he told Catholic News Service. "This is the biggest disruption anyone has seen."

'A miracle road'

On the other side of the country, on the coast in Malindi, Bishop Francis Baldacchino said the postelection violence "was horrible. Nobody expected such a tragedy."

Once the violence began, Catholic officials focused on helping the displaced and victims of violence. For instance, the U.S. bishops' Catholic Relief Services helped set up water and latrines in the Eldoret church compound when the refugees were camped there.

Many Kenyans have received help to rebuild with grants from the Eldoret Diocese through international church aid agencies like CRS and Caritas Australia.

Voucher programs in villages have given people money to spend on materials to rebuild and replace some of the household items and farm implements destroyed in the violence.

Fraud-reduction processes have been established, and village committees were directed to look first at women and children and single heads of households in determining eligibility.

While not everyone qualified to receive the vouchers, the program has made a difference in villages where it was used.

One project in the Eldoret Diocese brought together people in two villages to build a "peace road."

A portion of the road always existed, and the two villages, which supported different political candidates in the election, belonged to the same parish: St. Mary's Church.

A great deal of mistrust existed between the two villages and spilled over into the parish.

"This is a miracle road," said St. Mary's pastor, Father Thomas Dougherty, a Scottish member of the St. Patrick Missionary Society who has lived in Kenya for many years.

"The Kikuyu (a tribe that supports Kibaki) and the Kalenjins (who support Odinga) are working together on the road. It's a real miracle after what happened to us," he said.

The project requires youths from both villages to work an eight-hour day, and their wages are paid from a grant from Caritas Australia. Elders from both villages mentor the youths.

Since the road is almost finished, the youths are asking for other projects they can work on together.

"The people of both communities are showing the world action," Father Dougherty said. "The country of Kenya is full of talk but little action. A man told me: 'Our words of peace and unity are in this road because we did it together.'"

Eldoret's diocesan director, Kimisoi, said the work that went into the project before it was begun, and the hours and hours of meetings with the bishop and staff have paid off.

"That's why they have not had any difficulties (with the road project)," he said.

Always just below the surface is the issue of land ownership. The violence began as a politically motivated event, then degenerated into ethnic violence.

At the core are issues of land ownership that were not settled in the 1960s when the British relinquished colonial ties to the country.

The situation is complicated, said Father Charles Kirui, pastor of St. Patrick's Church in Burnt Forest village, but "at the end of the day we're all God's children."

Books offer food for thought on preparing youths to lead churches

REVIEWED BY DANIEL S. MULHALL
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The question "What is the role of young people in the church today?" provides the linkage between two recent books.

The authors of "Awakening Youth Discipleship" argue that young people today have the role of providing leadership in resisting the consumer culture in which they (and we) live. The author of "Reverse Mentoring" argues that young people are ready to take leadership roles in the church today if only the older generations will let them.

Both books provide much food for thought that will be of interest to anyone who works with young people or who is engaged with ministry in the church.

"Awakening Youth Discipleship: Christian Resistance in a Consumer Culture" is a collection of six articles by three college professors and the transcript of a conversation among them — Brian Mahan, Michael Warren and David White.

The articles examine how the consumer culture in which we live shapes the attitudes and behaviors of everyone. Mahan's and White's articles are written from an experiential approach and offer suggestions on what can be done to overcome those cultural biases.

Warren's two articles are written from a more academic perspective and provide a solid basis for the book's argument. Warren writes, "Most youth ministry is reduced to a program of a particular church, rather than an organic statement of its inner life."

For Warren, ministry is a way of life, and if we want to form young people to live Gospel-centered lives in a consumer culture, the church community must first learn how to live this way.

As Warren bluntly puts it: "When the local church is a living sign of the good news, then its ministry to youth is likewise a living sign, flowing out of what the church is living."

Rev. Earl Creps is a pastor, ministries consultant and university professor within the evangelical Christian community.

His book, "Reverse Mentoring: How Young Leaders Can Transform the Church and Why We Should Let Them," is directed primarily to those who serve as youth pastors in evangelical churches, but also raises significant ideas and issues that will be of interest to those who work with youths and young adult ministries in the Catholic Church and to those concerned about the church of the future.

Rev. Creps writes that the church of the next generation must be shaped by the members of this next generation and not by the old folks who are in the church's leadership today. Through a series of anecdotal tales, he explains how much he has learned about using technology more effectively from younger people.

From these stories Rev. Creps then argues that young people today are ready to take leadership roles in the church but that they are not allowed to because the current leadership isn't willing to get out of the way.

The goal of the book "is to prepare spiritual leaders to apply reverse mentoring as a spiritual discipline, a way of experiencing personal formation through exercising the kind of humility that invites younger people to become our tutors."

The concept of reverse mentoring is taken from the field of business, which recognizes that the input of younger generations is needed in order to build products that will be of value and interest to their peers.

The concept certainly holds true for churches: In order to attract younger members, churches must understand the needs of these young members and make ways for them to influence what the church offers and how it is offered.

The value in this book is what it reveals about how different the lives of "Generation X" — those born between 1965 and 1976 — and "millennials" — born from 1977 to 2000 — are from those of the baby boomer generation that now holds most leadership positions in churches.

Pastoral leaders interested in reaching out to these younger generations will find much here that will assist them in this task.

Sacrifice is needed to find more fulfilling future

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I watched my young friend Curtis play in his final collegiate basketball game recently. It was a joy.

He'd had an outstanding season, reaching peak performance at the end of his college career. A few days earlier, he admitted to his mother that he was feeling the bittersweet emotions that come with the end of "the best time of my life."

I remember four years ago when he played in his last high school game, and he was feeling similar conflict, sad about leaving his teammates and excited about beginning again on the college level.

Back then, his sadness was tempered by some difficult struggles with unfair treatment and the resulting lack of self-confidence and disappointment.

As a 17-year-old, though, Curtis was an extraordinary example to his friends as he quietly, humbly endured those trials without public complaint, thanks to the guidance and support of his family who assured him of his worth.

His friends and family since then have been gratified by his development and wonderful success as a college player and his growth and capability as a man. His college career was everything his high school experience wasn't, although the testing of the latter certainly prepared and strengthened him for it.

Curtis' family and friends are sad we won't get to watch his graceful performance on the court anymore. But we also know that when he leaves it behind, there is much ahead in his next stage of life that will be even richer and more fulfilling.

The Gospel for this fifth Sunday of Lent tells us — as Jesus told his disciples — that the only way to a new and greater life is by leaving the old one behind. The grain of wheat cannot serve its bigger purpose until it falls to the ground to grow and produce much fruit, he explained in simple terms.

Jesus felt troubled at leaving his friends in this earthly life, but he knew God's truth — that it was necessary in order for him to live his glorified life.

That included his promise that those who love and follow him also will follow him out of this lesser life and to a greater life with God.

Questions:

When have you had to leave a place or end a situation in order to begin "a new life"? In retrospect, why was it necessary for the old circumstance to die away? How does this prepare you for celebrating Easter?

Nebraska-based Spirit Catholic Radio expands reach with new signal

Broadcast now reaches 1.5 million listeners

BY S.L. HANSEN
CATHOLIC-NEWS SERVICE

LINCOLN, Neb. — After a decade of discussions, years of planning and fundraising and countless prayers, Spirit Catholic Radio is now broadcasting with a new FM signal from Lincoln, Neb., reaching a potential audience of 1.5 million listeners in eastern Nebraska and western Iowa.

Spirit Catholic Radio, which has been available in Omaha for 10 years, broadcasts a mix of contemporary Christian music and Catholic programming from the EWTN Radio Network, St. Joseph Communications and St. Joseph's Radio, Catholic Answers, Ave Maria and Starboard Communications.

"There's a sense of joy and excitement in my heart that I've never experienced before," John Soukup, manager of the 102.7 FM station in Lincoln, said about the new broadcast outlet.

Spirit Catholic Radio, operated by VSS Catholic Communications, will maintain its main studio in Omaha in addition to its new Lincoln studio and office. Its broadcasts will be heard on both 88.9 FM in Omaha and 102.7 FM until an equipment transfer is completed in early spring.

The broadcast enterprise, which also has a Web site at www.kvss.com, is supported totally by listeners' donations and business underwriters.

Currently, the average listener donation is about $210 a year, or just shy of $20 a month. But there are roughly 215 families who are donating $1,000 or more a year. Underwriting by businesses provides about a fourth of the budget.

It is "a wonderful way to get the word out about your business," Soukup said.

With a new station and a broader reach, "the benefits are going to be huge for businesses and groups who underwrite" Spirit Catholic Radio's programming, he added.

Not only are Catholic business owners interested in underwriting KVSS, but so are Protestant owners, said Soukup.

"They like the alternative format to advertising on secular stations," he said.

A contribution of any size qualifies as membership in the Spirit Catholic Radio family.

"If all you can do is pray, you're a member," said executive director Jim Carroll.

"We can't thank people enough for the many prayers and support they've given to this endeavor," he added. "It's only by God's grace and a lot of hard work by many good people that we were able to make this all happen."

Spirit Catholic Radio began broadcasting on 102.7 FM the afternoon of Jan. 29, after the paperwork was signed and VSS Catholic Communications officially took over the station.

The day had no special spiritual significance, but a quote from the day's Gospel reading from St. Mark seemed especially fitting: "Anyone who has ears to hear ought to hear."

Deacons recommit to ministry at annual Mass

said Bishop Jugis.

In the Catholic Church, the diaconate is the first of the three ranks in ordained ministry, and a permanent deacon is the only ordained man allowed to be married.

As ordained ministers, permanent deacons may perform baptisms, witness marriages and assist in various liturgies of the church.

In the diocese, all active deacons also are required to participate in continuing education and an annual retreat. Like the priests, who recommit themselves to priestly service at the annual chrism Mass during Holy Week, the permanent deacons gather for a similar recommitment Mass.

It is God's "grace which empowers you to do your ministry," Bishop Jugis told the deacons during his homily.

The bishop said that during the deacons' ordinations, "we prayed to the Holy Spirit to help you faithfully carry out your ministry."

"You promised to work with humble charity and to be faithful in proclaiming the faith," said the bishop at the recommitment Mass. "You promised to serve the Lord. Now you must live that moment and put it into practice."

To be successful in their ministries, the deacons must be "men of prayer," said Bishop Jugis.

"It was the Lord who imposed these joy-filled obligations as you became his stewards. Therefore, always refer back to the Lord — the one who calls ... always go back to the source, to Jesus," said the bishop.

"Orient yourself to Jesus ... and renew your commitment to him, and strengthen the bond of friendship with him ... and between one another."

Pope responds to criticism over excommunication decision the extent of the Holocaust was "an unforeseen mishap" — one that could have been anticipated, however, by paying more attention to information easily available on the Internet.

The pope said he was particularly saddened at the reaction of some Catholics who seemed willing to believe he was changing direction on Catholic-Jewish relations and were ready to "attack me with open hostility." He thanked "our Jewish friends" who helped clarify the matter and restore a sense of trust.

The Vatican published the letter in six languages March 12. Vatican spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, called it a "unique, exceptional document" for its direct and personal style, and said it showed the pope had listened carefully to what people were saying.

The pope said he was taking the unusual step of writing to the bishops because the episode had generated "a discussion more heated than any we have seen for a long time," both inside and outside the church. He said his overture to Bishop Williamson and the other three bishops of the Society of St. Pius X was designed to close a wound and bring unity to the church, by lifting excommunications incurred in 1988 and opening the way to dialogue with the society.

But when Bishop Williamson's comments about the Holocaust were circulated, "it suddenly appeared as something completely different: as the repudiation of reconciliation between Christians and Jews, and thus as the reversal of what the (Second Vatican) Council had laid down in this regard to guide the church's path," he said.

As a result, he said, "an avalanche of protests was unleashed, whose bitterness laid bare wounds deeper than those of the present moment."

"I was saddened by the fact that even Catholics, who, after all, might have had a better knowledge of the situation, thought they had to attack me with open hostility," he said. "Precisely for this reason I thank all the more our Jewish friends, who quickly helped to clear up the misunderstanding and to restore the atmosphere of friendship and trust."

The pope acknowledged something critics have pointed out: that a simple Internet search would have revealed Bishop Williamson's views on the Holocaust and helped the Vatican anticipate the reaction. "I have learned the lesson that in the future in the Holy See we will have to pay greater attention to that source of news," he said.

Pope Benedict said he deeply regretted another mistake: that the lifting of the excommunications was not adequately explained and gave rise to misinterpretations about the traditionalist society's status in the church.

He emphasized that the removal of the excommunications was a disciplinary measure that affects individuals. But the fact that the Society of St. Pius X has no standing in the church depends on doctrinal reasons, he said.

"Until the doctrinal questions are clarified, the society has no canonical status in the church, and its ministers — even though they have been freed of the ecclesiastical penalty — do not legitimately exercise any ministry in the church," he said.

In view of the importance of the doctrinal issues still to be clarified with the society, the pope announced that he was putting the Pontifical Commission "Ecclesia Dei," which has handled reconciliation efforts with traditionalist groups, under the auspices of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

"This will make it clear that the problems now to be addressed are essentially doctrinal in nature and concern primarily the acceptance of the Second Vatican Council and the post-conciliar magisterium of the popes," he said.

He underlined what Vatican officials have said in recent weeks, that for the Society of St. Pius X full communion implies acceptance of Vatican II. "The church's teaching authority cannot be frozen in the year 1962 — this must be quite clear to the society," the pope said.

At the same time, he said, some defenders of Vatican II need to be reminded that being faithful to the council also means being faithful to the church's entire doctrinal history, without cutting "the roots from which the tree draws its life."

After making his clarifications, the pope confronted the question: "Was this measure needed? Was it really a priority?" He answered with a heartfelt defense of his reconciliation move, saying the church cannot stop working for unity among its ranks.

"That the quiet gesture of extending a hand gave rise to a huge uproar, and thus became exactly the opposite of a gesture of reconciliation, is a fact which we must accept," he said.

"But I ask now: Was it, and is it, truly wrong in this case to meet halfway the brother who 'has something against you' and to seek reconciliation?" he asked.

The pope said he recognized that disturbing statements have often come from the society's leadership, reflecting "arrogance and presumptuousness." But he said he has also witnessed "an openness of hearts" among some members. He said the traditionalist society deserves the same kind of tolerance given to other members in the church.

"At times one gets the impression that our society needs to have at least one group to which no tolerance may be shown, which one can easily attack and hate. And should someone dare to approach them — in this case the pope — he, too, loses any right to tolerance; he too can be treated hatefully, without misgiving or restraint," he said.

Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, Vatican secretary of state, denied reports that the pope was isolated or cut off from much of the Roman Curia, and added that the pope had received many letters of support during the recent controversy.

Detoxing from the virtual world during Lent

Technology helps, hinders our daily lives

It happened to one young lady I know, just like it happens every day in towns and cities across the world.

She felt the stares in the hallways. She heard the whispers flicker down the lockers like a particularly vibrant species of butterfly. It's easy to become the subject of a rumor; she slipped up socially, and the next day found herself the chosen topic of discussion between classes and in the cafeteria.

Before cell phones, Facebook and the Internet, though, there would have been refuge at home or a favorite hangout.

When I was in high school, you could escape, exit the rumor mill through the school's front doors, get on the bus and go home. I often went to my room to read books, listen to music or do my homework. In my room, surrounded by the things I loved, I felt empowered.

There's no such refuge today, not in a world where text messaging is even more instantaneous than e-mail, and where Facebook is as real a hangout as the hamburger stand.

The rumors and bullying continued after the girl left school for the day. Mean comments were posted on her MySpace profile, turning a safe space into another place where she felt assailed. People would text her all evening, and it wasn't always nice.

A New York teenager recently filed a lawsuit against four classmates who founded a Web site dedicated to "holding [her] up to public hatred, ridicule and disgrace." Another girl reported receiving text messages from unknown numbers, telling her that "U R smelly," "Nobody likes you" and "I hate you."

This can have real life-and-death consequences. In Cincinnati recently, 18-year-old Jessie Logan killed herself after a nude photo was texted to hundreds of people. She was teased at school — and out of school — when kids who didn't even know her would text her mobile phone with messages calling her horrible names.

No wonder Archbishop Benito Cocchi of Modena, Italy, recommended giving up social networking and text messaging for Lent. He said that a textual fast would help teens "detox from the virtual world and get back in touch with themselves."

I think he might have a point.

Plastic cases, jangly devices and electronic circuits aren't the problem, but they do serve as enablers for people who are ready to hear a rumor and pass it on, who are gunning for gossip, who serve as bystanders when someone is being hurt, who want power over others through hurting them with words.

The existence of mobile phones and Facebook make it imperative for teens to stand up to bullying and teasing, whether it's in school, on a social-networking site or a mobile phone.

Technology does make it easier to tease, but it also makes it easier to stand up and say no.

Don't contribute to the problem, even if you think it's harmless fun. Standing up to tech-teasing and cyberbullying can be as easy as pressing a "stop" button.

Don't pass on photos or rumor texts. Don't start or join online groups created to ridicule other people. Don't create fake accounts or impersonate others online. Don't tolerate people who do. Don't forward private IM conversations without the permission of the other party. Don't send nasty text messages.

Most of all, get empowered and refuse to be part of the problem. Take Archbishop Cocchi's advice and "detox." You don't necessarily have to turn off the phone; just turn off the teasing and encourage others to do the same.

The responsibility to fight injustices

Taking innocent life, even in its most nascent stages, is always intrinsically evil

On March 9, President Barack Obama signed an executive order reversing the ban on federal funding of embryonic stem cell research. In doing so, President Obama pledged to "use sound, scientific practice and evidence, instead of dogma" as a guide to federal policy.

Many scientists believe that stem cells harvested from embryos could help advance medical technology to develop cures for certain diseases and illnesses. This is because stem cells harvested from human embryos have the capacity to be manipulated to form any of the body's cell types, and thereby repair or replace damaged tissue or organs.

On March 11, the Charlotte Observer ran an editorial hailing President Obama's decision as "long overdue." The editorial went on to opine that "it seemed to many Americans that the failure to pursue stem cell research aggressively and broadly was an immoral choice, given so much human suffering and so much scientific promise of real results from it."

But while there has been a restriction on federally-funded embryonic stem cell research, there has been a great deal of embryonic stem cell research that has been privately funded during the past eight years.

While embryonic stem cell research does hold promise of finding cures for diseases such as diabetes, Parkinson's disease and even cancer, the research is morally reprehensible because it requires the destruction of human life.

Embryonic stem cells are taken from living human embryos, thereby destroying the embryo in the process. In fact, in December 2008 the Vatican's Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith released a bioethics document, "Dignitas Personae" ("The Dignity of a Person"), which clearly condemns this practice:

"The obtaining of stem cells from a living human embryo, on the other hand, invariably causes the death of the embryo and is consequently gravely illicit. ... History itself has condemned such a science in the past and will condemn it in the future, not only because it lacks the light of God but also because it lacks humanity" (no. 32).

Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia, chairman of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Committee on Pro-Life Activities, called President Obama's decision "a sad victory of politics over science and ethics."

Guest Column

FATHER

The cardinal said embryonic stem cell research is wrong due to the fact that it destroys "innocent human life" by "treating vulnerable human beings as mere products to be harvested." He noted also that the executive order "disregards the values of millions of American taxpayers who oppose research that requires taking human life."

Furthermore, there are morally-permissible alternatives to embryonic stem cell research that have proven to be much more effective than embryonic stem cell research, thus making embryonic stem cell research unnecessary — a point often ignored by the mainstream media.

Specifically, there have been great advances in reprogramming adult stem cells so that they behave like embryonic stem cells.

Moreover, adult stem cells taken from umbilical cords are as versatile as embryonic stem cells and have already been used to reverse illnesses and rebuild damaged organs. To date, there have been 72 cures and treatments developed from adult stem cells, but zero cures and treatments that have come through embryonic stem cell research.

You can find more information on embryonic and adult stem cell research at www.stemcellresearchfacts.com.

Our Catholic moral tradition has always held that it is not licit to perform an evil action simply to derive some good from it. The taking of innocent human life, even if that human life is in its most nascent stages, is always and in every way intrinsically evil.

The decision by President Obama is a grave injustice that will further erode the proper respect for human life in our country. As Catholics we have the responsibility to fight such injustices through all legitimate means open to us (for example by voting for pro-life candidates, holding peaceful protests, writing letters to our elected officials, etc.).

In addition to committing ourselves to fighting such evils in the public forum let us also pray and offer sacrifices for all those who support or who are involved in embryonic stem cell research, that they will come to understand the true evil of this practice and repent.

Father Reid is pastor of St. Ann Church in Charlotte.

Letter to the Editor

Gratitude for pro-life guest column

We owe a huge debt of gratitude to Father Matthew Buettner for his March 6 column, "A response to Nancy Pelosi: Pro-choice Catholic legislators give scandal to faithful, set dangerous precedence."

Father Buettner made it abundantly clear that the attempts to modify church teaching on abortion to suit one's politics are not at all acceptable.

There is no such thing as a "pro-choice Catholic." For those who would justify voting for a pro-abortion political candidate, I would suggest they have an in-depth discussion with their pastor, preferably in a confessional, and definitely before receiving holy Communion.

Who — or what — is our master?

Our Lenten challenge is to indentify where we've put our trust

There were seven of us gals gathered around a coffee table with a bottle of red wine, a bottle of white and a lot of good chatter. We all taught preschool together at one time, and we're dedicated to maintaining our friendship. So every month or two, we make a date and catch up on families, jobs, vacations, life.

It occurred to me late in the conversation that no one had said, "Hey, let's talk about the economy." But just as the late afternoon sun breaking through the window infused the room with light, so too did the economy, unbidden, seep into every nook and cranny of our conversation.

One woman told us that her daughter, son-in-law and the kids had moved back home with her. They could no longer afford the mortgage on the condo and were trying to sell it.

Others, married to oil-company workers, that mainstay of our Alaskan economy, talked about possible layoffs and definite wage freezes.

Another spoke of her son and daughter-in-law buying a vacation home close to theirs in Arizona. The home was a foreclosure and they were getting a terrific buy.

For my part, when asked about my graduating daughter's college plans, I mentally cringed at the current state of our college savings portfolio. No, this economic downturn is unavoidable.

Did I say "downturn"? Every week, it seems, the media and their experts come up with a new term. Downturn seems too polite and cautious now.

We've moved from "recession" to "severe recession," and then some use the "D" word, only they tell us it won't be as bad as the Great Depression. At least that's what they assure us now.

Some remark that this event, whose end we really cannot foresee, will change the way Americans live and spend forever. That reminds me of the commentator who said after 9/11 that Americans might never regain their sense of humor.

Please — historical events may change us, but it takes a lot to revolutionize us. But it is Lent, a time for reflection and personal revolution. Reflection should include how we feel about money, affluence, trust, security.

Some people think money and prayer belong in two separate niches of their psyche. I, on the other hand, feel challenged by Thomas Merton, who said, "A life is either all spiritual or not spiritual at all." How hard it is to ask how

For the Journey

EFFIE

I measure up against that phrase!

In a time when my college and retirement funds sink, do I thank the Lord for asking me, "Is not life more than food and the body more than clothing?" (Mt 6:25) Your heavenly Father knows you need these things, Christ says, and as for me, well, I'm supposed to seek first the kingdom of heaven and not worry about all that "stuff."

What better time than Lent in the midst of recession to ask: Where have I really put my trust?

My mother lived and suffered through the Great Depression. It did change her. She saw her father lose his farm, and she had to work as a teenager to help her family survive.

She clung to security after that, and unlike our generation, she was a woman who saved money strenuously.

But she didn't really enjoy her money because she tried never to spend it. And she didn't give a lot of it away. I don't judge her; I have those same tendencies.

And that's why I feel Lent is calling right now and demanding that I answer in an honest way, What do I seek first? Who — or what — is my master?

Ethical and legal wills

Legacy Notes

JUDY SMITH
DIOCESAN PLANNED GIVING DIRECTOR

Deeply rooted in western religions, the practice of writing ethical wills has reemerged as a way of leaving behind something more meaningful than material goods.

As the name suggests, ethical wills are intended to be spiritual counterparts to the legal documents that dispose of our worldly goods after our deaths. The undeniable assumption inherent in ethical wills is that we are more than the sum of our material parts, and we should pass along the intangibles the way we do cash or stock.

An ethical will is a way to leave what is most important to us beyond our possessions. There are many reasons for writing one, including the following:

— We all want to be remembered, and we all will leave something behind.

— When we tell our stories and the stories of our parents and grandparents, we ensure that their stories will not be lost.

— When we take the time to explore the things in our Catholic faith and in our lives that matter to us, it helps to identify what we value most.

— When we articulate what we value now, we can take steps to ensure the continuation of our values for future generations.

— Writing an ethical will helps us come to terms with our mortality and creates something of meaning that will live on after we are gone.

— Writing an ethical will grounds us in our Catholic faith and provides a sense of completion in our lives.

An ethical will reflects the "voice of the heart." Think of it as a love letter to your family. Every ethical will is as personal as the person writing it and will be an important document for your families and loved ones.

Your will, whether legal or ethical, reflects what is most important in your life. Doesn't it also make sense to remember your Catholic faith in your final statement to the world as a Christian steward?

When you leave a bequest to your parish through your legal will, you support its works of education and Christian service, or help maintain a beautiful church for worship.

Your bequest to the diocesan foundation is a "gift that keeps on giving." These gifts support the church in its good works, including Catholic education, Christian service and seminarian formation.

By remembering in your will your parish, a Catholic school, a Catholic agency, the diocesan foundation or the Diocese of Charlotte, you thank God for the blessings received in this life, and for the faith that sustains you.

During Lent: What would Jesus do?

Christ calls us to aim higher, follow moral high road

Of all the many crucial questions we need to ask ourselves this Lent, the first and most important question should be: What would Jesus do?

Sometimes the answer is obvious. Other times it takes considerable soul-searching and honest dialogue to figure out the Lord's moral high road.

The Ten Commandments give us a foundational guide to morality. They instruct us in the basics.

But Jesus calls us beyond the basics. He says, "Come follow me."

The Gospel story of the rich young man is an excellent illustration. A well-off man approaches Jesus with the question: "Teacher, what good must I do to gain eternal life?"

Jesus replies, "Keep the commandments." After explaining that he has kept all of the commandments, the rich man asks, "What do I still lack?"

To that Jesus answers, "If you wish to be perfect, go, sell what you have and give to (the) poor. ... Then come, follow me."

What does it mean to follow Jesus? In the story of the rich young man, it means more than simply being a decent human being. The Lord directs his followers to be most generous with the poor. But even that's not enough.

Throughout the Gospel, Jesus extends the meaning of the commandments. For instance, he goes beyond the ban on stealing, and warns us to rid ourselves of all greed.

Certainly his warning would now include corporate greed.

According to a representative of the International Food Policy Research Institute, U.S. financial giants Morgan Stanley and American International Group (better known as AIG) used regulatory loopholes to buy over 2 billion bushels of grain, which was then kept off the market to send food prices soaring.

Their lust for profit caused countless people to go hungry.

Jesus would insist that corporate officials turn away from their greed and make up for all the harm they did to hungry people.

However, since a quick repentance is unlikely, and since regulatory loopholes were never closed, the government has a responsibility to ensure that these innocent victims are rescued.

Many American corporations purchase much of their merchandise from sweatshops in poor countries where employees are treated almost as slaves.

Certainly Jesus would not put "everyday low prices" above human suffering. He would, and is, calling us to challenge these greedy companies.

Making a Difference

TONY
MAGLIANO
CNS COLUMNIST

Instead of taking advantage of desperately poor workers, shouldn't we be urging such companies to ensure just wages, decent working conditions and reasonable hours for these brothers and sisters?

The Lord calls us beyond a mere observance of the law. "Be perfect, just as your heavenly Father is perfect." Jesus is inviting us to aim higher, to love as he loves!

The Fifth Commandment insists that we not murder. But in traditional Jewish understanding of the law, killing in war or capital punishment is not forbidden by this commandment.

But to bring this commandment to fulfillment, Jesus teaches, "But I say to you, love your enemies, and pray for those who persecute you. ... Do to others whatever you would have them do to you."

Jesus makes no exception to killing. He is calling us to follow him and totally abolish both war and capital punishment. He is directing those who will listen to respect the life and dignity of every single person — even enemies and murderers.

That's what Jesus would do!

MERCY BEYOND BORDERS

Bishop's stories of tragedy sparked Mercy sister's outreach to Sudan

ERIE, Pa. (CNS) — Eighteen years ago, Mercy Sister Marilyn Lacey was at a conference in Los Angeles and heard a Catholic bishop tell about life in Sudan, which at the time was in the middle of a civil war.

Bishop Paride Taban of Torit told of 1 million displaced people and how he housed refugee children in his home. He said there were no schools, hospitals or clinics, and he described bomb craters on his front lawn.

Unfamiliar with the situation in Sudan, Sister Lacey, who had been working to resettle refugees with Catholic Charities in San Jose, Calif., was stunned and felt compelled to stay behind and talk with the bishop.

"I told him that I wanted to know more about what was going on in Sudan," she recalled in a March 11 interview.

A member of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas West Midwest Community, Sister Lacey said the bishop's response piqued her interest even more. "Come and see," he said.

She likened the invitation to what Jesus said in the Gospel.

In 1992, Sister Lacey went to Sudan and what she saw there changed her forever. She described a scene similar to the passage about dry bones found in Chapter 37 of Ezekiel in the Old Testament.

"There were about 10,000 people who were starving. I couldn't understand how they were able to stand," she said.

She learned that the people had walked for two weeks fleeing a massacre and looking for water.

"I was stunned at the devastation. I had not seen such extreme poverty," said

Sister Lacey. "From that point on, I was changed and knew that I would do for Sudan whatever I could."

Last year, Sister Marilyn founded Mercy Beyond Borders, www.mercybeyondborders.org, a nonprofit agency that helps educate young girls and supports small entrepreneurial projects that can be run by displaced women in southern Sudan.

The agency is working on projects such as providing grants for refugee women so they can cultivate vegetables, getting bicycles so the women don't have to walk four hours to sell their vegetables at the market, and opening roadside cafes at which they can sell tea and bread to travelers in Sudan.

Since then, she has been meeting Mercy sisters and associates, and traveling to Mercy colleges, universities and high schools to educate people on what is happening in Sudan and outlining how they can help.

"I want to challenge folks to study the issues behind the many injustices and imbalances in the world. It's not enough to give food and water to the poor; we have to find out why they are poor," she said.

In 2005, the Comprehensive Peace Agreement ended more than two decades of Sudan's civil war, which left 2 million dead and displaced 4 million. But since then fighting has again intensified and threatens the agreement.

To Sister Lacey, Mercy Beyond Borders is a natural fit for the Mercy tradition.

"Being with the poor is our best chance to meet God face to face," Sister Lacey said.

Despite criticism, Notre Dame firm on Obama as commencement speaker

WASHINGTON (CNS) — University of Notre Dame officials were standing firm on their choice of President Barack Obama as commencement speaker at the institution's May 17 graduation, in spite of a large number of Catholics calling on them to rescind the invitation.

The Indiana university, run by the Congregation of Holy Cross, and the White House announced March 20 that Obama would be Notre Dame's 2009 commencement speaker and confirmed he will receive an honorary doctor of law degree at the graduation.

"The invitation to President Obama to be our commencement speaker should not be taken as condoning or endorsing his positions on specific issues regarding the protection of human life, including abortion and embryonic stem cell research," said Holy Cross Father John I. Jenkins, president of the University of Notre Dame.

"Yet, we see his visit as a basis for further positive engagement," he said in a March 23 statement.

The announcement was promptly followed by a flurry of criticism from Catholics, who said the president's support of legal abortion and embryonic stem cell research makes him an inappropriate choice to be the commencement speaker at a Catholic university.

The Cardinal Newman Society — a Manassas, Va.-based Catholic college watchdog group — announced March 26 it had collected more than 157,901 signatures so far in an online petition that calls for Notre Dame to rescind its invitation to Obama to be this year's commencement speaker.

Notre Dame spokesman Dennis Brown said March 23 the university anticipated criticism, and that most students are pleased with this year's choice of Obama as the commencement speaker and feel honored the first black U.S. president would accept Notre Dame's invitation from among the many he has received.

FROM THE VATICAN

Papal social encyclical should be published in May, says cardinal

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI's first social encyclical is already completed and should be ready for release in early May, said a top Vatican official.

The original aim had been to have the encyclical on social justice issues ready for publication in 2007 to coincide with the 40th anniversary of Pope Paul VI's encyclical on human development, "Populorum Progressio" ("The Progress of Peoples"), said Cardinal Renato Martino, president of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace.

"Naturally, however, with the research and revisions necessary to create and have a text that would respond to today's current situation, well, it got behind schedule a little bit," he told reporters March 20.

He said the new papal encyclical will offer "a beautiful response" to the new realities and the changes that have occurred since the last papal encyclical on Catholic social teaching, "Centesimus Annus" ("The Hundredth Year"), was published in 1991 by Pope John Paul II.

Pope Benedict's social encyclical was tentatively titled "Caritas in Veritate" ("Love in Truth") and will be his third encyclical in four years.

The pope said one reason for the encyclical's delay was the need to deal thoroughly with the current global economic crisis.

"We were almost ready to publish it when this crisis erupted and we went back to the text in order to give a more adequate response" and to examine what the church sees as being the real problems underlying the financial crisis, he said March 17.

He said he hoped the encyclical could play a part in helping the world overcome its economic woes.

Marriage, religious vows don't limit freedom, papal preacher says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The unbreakable bonds of marriage and the permanence of religious vows do not place artificial constraints on the freedom to love; rather they free a person to love forever, in good times and bad, said the preacher of the papal household.

Capuchin Father Raniero Cantalamessa continued his Friday Lenten meditations for top Vatican officials March 20 even though Pope Benedict XVI and his closest collaborators were in Africa.

Focusing on the writings of St. Paul about the Holy Spirit, the papal preacher looked specifically at the meaning of the passage from the Letter to the Romans: "For the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus has freed you from the law of sin and death."

If Christ's death and resurrection and the descent of the Holy Spirit have freed people from the law, he said, "what sense do the Code of Canon Law, monastic rules, religious vows" and the church's insistence on the indissolubility of marriage have?

"Jesus said he did not come to abolish the law, but to fulfill it," the Capuchin said.

What the Holy Spirit adds to the law is life-giving love, he said.

"People today increasingly ask: What relationship there could be between the love of two young people and laws regarding matrimony, and what need does love have to bind itself when it is naturally free and spontaneous," he said.

If two people are really in love, Father Cantalamessa said, they do not see a promise to love each other forever as a burden, but as a joy.

"This consideration is valid not only for human love, but also for divine love," he said. "One could ask, 'Why should one make a commitment to loving God, submitting to a religious rule, taking vows that force him or her to be poor, chaste and obedient?'"

The reason is that, "in a moment of grace, you felt attracted by God, you loved him and wanted to be with him forever, totally, and fearing that you might lose him because of your own instability, you bound yourself to him to guarantee your love," he said.

Religious vows and marriage vows help keep people steady through difficult times, guaranteeing that when the crisis is over, the relationship will still be firm, Father Cantalamessa said.

Plkwy., at 3 p.m. on Sunday, April 19. The celebration will include a traditional solemn Benediction and recitation of the Divine Mercy Chaplet. The sacrament of reconciliation will not be offered prior to the celebration. Individuals should check the times offered in their respective parishes.

As floodwaters rise, bishop asks Catholics to pray, help one another

FARGO, N.D. (CNS) — Bishop Samuel J. Aquila of Fargo has asked all Catholics in his diocese to pray for the protection of North Dakota residents and communities that may be affected by rising floodwaters, which threatened to destroy about 6,000 homes.

"Please remember to pray for their protection, for the protection of their families, our communities and also asking the Lord to give us strength during this time of trial," said Bishop Aquila at Mass March 22 at the Cathedral of St. Mary in Fargo. The bishop also sent a similar statement by e-mail to all Catholic parishes, religious communities and officials with diocesan offices and Catholic Charities North Dakota.

Several days of unrelenting rain caused the waters of the Red River to rise as much as 5 feet in one day. The city closed a number of bridges over the river. The rising floodwaters were threatening dozens of communities in the river basin in the southern part of North Dakota and in the neighboring state of Minnesota.

Rites of election celebrated around diocese

CHARLOTTE — Rites of Election are being held in churches around the Diocese of Charlotte.

The rite, celebrated annually in churches around the world, formally acknowledges the readiness of those preparing to enter the church through the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA): candidates — who were baptized Catholic or in another Christian faith but have yet to receive the other sacraments of initiation of Communion and confirmation — and catechumens — who have never been baptized.

All will receive the sacraments during the Easter Vigil at their parishes.

The rite of election marks the beginning of the candidates' and catechumens' final, and most intense, period of preparation. The ceremony also denotes their official reception as "members of the elect."

In the Diocese of Charlotte, the RCIA is a program of the diocesan Office of Faith Formation, which is funded in part by contributions to the annual Diocesan Support Appeal.

Students spend spring break doing service projects

Opportunity (OEO) — a program of Catholic Social Services' Office of Justice and Peace — and St. William Church, both in Murphy.

"Part of our reason for partnering with OEO was so the students would have an opportunity to learn more about the state of North Carolina," said Gloria Schweizer, Asheville-area campus minister.

"This was the first time that I think anything like this has been done out in this part of the diocese," said Claudie Burchfield, OEO director.

St. William Church hosted the students and campus ministers.

"The students really had a great experience with the parish," said

Schweizer of the interaction between the parishioners and the students.

By the end of the week, they "had a new level of appreciation for each other," she said.

"The retired people from the parish have been a big part of keeping the community together," said Kelly Laccinole, a freshman at Central Piedmont Community College and UNC-Charlotte.

Throughout the week, parishioners provided the students with a pancake breakfast and cookout and the students joined them for a game night and Lenten service at the church.

"The trip involved lots of physical labor as a team, as well as focusing on understanding the deeper social issues involved in the four far-western counties of North Carolina," said Schweizer.

"The men's group at the parish worked with us," said Julie McElmurry, campus minister at Wake Forest University and Salem College in Winston-Salem.

"I told them, 'We have strong backs and good attitudes, but no skills and no tools,'" she joked.

At the OEO, the students and parish volunteers worked on the exterior of the building — pressure washing, scraping and repainting.

They cleaned out a home used by St. William Church for faith formation activities and they volunteered at two local thrift stores that specialize in providing goods to low-income families at affordable prices.

"One of the students commented that it was cool that we didn't go to some exotic location," said Erin Leonard, campus minister at Appalachian State University in Boone.

"It made a big difference to know that we were helping people within our own diocese," she said.

Staying within the state also allowed them to save money on gas and accommodations.

"We could do the trip economically and make more of an impact," said Leonard.

Throughout the week, the students went to daily Mass at St. William Church and met in the evenings for prayer and devotion.

"The thing that I appreciate about a trip like this is the Catholic spiritual dimension," said Schweizer.

Another goal of the project was to provide an opportunity for Catholic students from the different universities to interact.

In total, there were eight participants representing five universities.

"I would say making the connection with the parish and with OEO" was one of the most rewarding aspects of the trip, said McElmurry.

"It made me realize that what we were doing was making an impact," she said. "And there is more to it than just accomplishing these tasks for them."

"I think they just really enjoyed having us there," she added.

Burchfield agreed that the connection with the parish was an important component.

"I think that was so important for them to be able to connect with that group and have an opportunity to share experiences," said Burchfield.

"It was beneficial to both the youths and the parishioners," she said.

Bishops cite reasons for HHS to keep regulation discrimination are being challenged in a new way, and we are asking for your help in contacting federal government regulators about this issue," said the bishops in a March 23 statement.

The Department of Health and Human Services opened a 30-day comment period March 10 on whether it should rescind a regulation that took effect two days before President Barack Obama took office.

The rule codifies three longtime federal statutes prohibiting discrimination against health professionals who decline to participate in abortions or other medical procedures because of their religious or other moral objections.

Rather than working to rescind the regulation, the Obama administration's proper role is to enforce the will of Congress as already expressed in existing statutes, said attorneys for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Anthony Picarello Jr., USCCB general counsel, and Michael Moses, associate general counsel, filed public comments on behalf of the USCCB March 23 with HHS.

"The question is not whether the policy to be pursued is the strong protection of conscience in health care — Congress has already decided that question repeatedly and decisively by a series of statutes — but how best to enforce the policy of conscience protection already expressed in those statutes," Picarello and Moses said.

The USCCB comments also said rescission of the regulation would conflict with the administration's stated goals of promoting "choice" and reducing abortions; reduce health care options for the poor and other underserved populations; and perpetuate the "undisguised hostility to conscience rights" and widespread ignorance of existing law that are already rampant.

"If the administration's policy is one of 'choice,' it cannot, consistent with that policy, refuse to accommodate a health care provider's choice not to participate in abortion," the USCCB said. "Otherwise, the policy is simply one of unmasked coercion."

Similarly, it makes no sense to contend that one is working to reduce abortions by increasing access to abortion, the comments said.

"Increasing abortion access increases abortion rates," the USCCB lawyers said. "The administration cannot coherently — or in good faith — claim to stand for both policies at the same time."

In their joint statement, the North Carolina bishops ask Catholics in their two dioceses to visit the USCCB Web site at www.usccb.org/conscienceprotection during HHS's 30-day comment period, which ends April 10, to learn more about the proposal and to voice their opposition to it.

"Please ... let our government know that you do not want to rescind the regulation that was enacted last December and that you want to protect the right of doctors, nurses and other health care professionals who make the life-affirming decision not to participate in abortions or other objectionable medical procedures based on their moral or religious beliefs," the bishops said.

Uncertain outcomes

In soliciting public comment on the proposed rescission, HHS asked whether the regulation "reduces access to information and health care services, particularly by low-income women," as some groups such as Planned Parenthood and NARAL Pro-Choice America have charged.

The USCCB attorneys said rescinding the conscience regulation "would have uncertain effects on access" to abortion and sterilization, but "would certainly reduce access to life-affirming health care services, especially for poor and underserved populations."

Faced with a lack of conscience protections, health care providers and institutions opposed to abortion or sterilization could be forced out of business, thus reducing access to all health care, they added.

"Indeed, the poorest and neediest patients will suffer the most from such reduction in access to life-affirming health care.

"Those who allege a conflict between conscience and 'access' neglect to ask why rural and other underserved areas are so frequently served only by a Catholic or other faith-based provider," the USCCB comments said.

"This occurs because for-profit providers see no profit margin in serving poor or sparsely populated areas, while religiously affiliated providers ... see those patients as having inherent human dignity and human rights," they said.

"If these providers were barred from acting in accord with the moral and religious convictions that motivated them to provide life-affirming health care in the first place, the result will not be more comprehensive health care for these areas but, in some cases, none at all," they added.

Defending rights

As evidence of the need for the current regulation, the USCCB attorneys said negative public reaction even before the rule took effect "demonstrates, at best, a deplorable lack of understanding about the federal legislative rights of conscience on which the regulation is based, at worst outright hostility to those statutory rights."

They also cited actions by groups such as the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, the American Civil Liberties Union, NARAL Pro-Choice America and various state and local governments to ignore or override conscience rights in violation of the current federal statutes.

The USCCB called for outreach and educational efforts by HHS about the regulation "in addition to, rather than in lieu of, vigorous regulatory implementation of the existing conscience statutes."

"Public misperception about the conscience regulation and the statutes they enforce is, in and of itself, a testament to the need for regulatory enforcement and other guidance from HHS," the comments said.

"Congress has made its policy choice — a choice that respects and advances this nation's founding principles of religious liberty and diversity, and that tends to increase patients' ready access to basic health care, regardless of their location or socio-economic status," the comments concluded.

"The administration's regulatory actions should faithfully enforce that existing policy choice," they said.

CHALLENGES IN AFRICA

"Do not let yourself be captivated by selfish illusions and false ideals."

In Africa, pope challenges attitudes, cultural trends from women's rights to economic development, the pope preached the Gospel in a way that took issue with common practices and prevailing attitudes.

His conviction, expressed on his first day in Cameroon, is that Christianity is the answer — the only real answer — to the chronic problems plaguing Africa. His fear is that Africa, caught up in economic and cultural globalization, will follow the secularized West and lose touch with its own best values.

Condom campaigns are, to Pope Benedict, a small but very real part of this threat. But his concern extends to virtually every area of social, economic and political life.

"At a time when so many people have no qualms about trying to impose the tyranny of materialism, with scant concern for the most deprived, you must be very careful," he told Africans in Cameroon.

"Take care of your souls," he said. "Do not let yourselves be captivated by selfish illusions and false ideals."

News accounts usually leave out the words that inevitably followed these papal warnings, but for the pope they were the most important part of his message in Africa: "Only Christ is the way of life." "The Lord Jesus is the one mediator and redeemer." "Christ is the measure of true humanism."

Calling for conversion

The transformation the pontiff asked of Africans was, as he described it, one that must begin with a radical conversion to Christ that redirects every aspect of life.

"The Gospel teaches us that reconciliation, true reconciliation, can only be the fruit of conversion, a change of heart, a new way of thinking. It teaches us that only the power of God's love can change our hearts," he said at an outdoor Mass in Angola.

The pope kept reminding listeners that, in his view, inside and outside Africa the Christian message lived to the full is profoundly countercultural.

That was eminently clear when he addressed young people in an Angolan soccer stadium, telling them that their power to shape the future was directly dependent on their "constant dialogue with the Lord."

"The dominant societal culture is not helping you live by Jesus' words or to practice the self-giving to which he calls you," he said. In fact, he said, today's "individualistic and hedonistic" values prevent young people from reaching maturity.

At his Mass the next day, the pope continued in the same vein, saying that "living by the truth" was not easy in the face of the "hardened attitudes" of selfishness that dominate much of contemporary social relations.

Other challenges

Abortion was very much on the pope's mind in Africa.

His first speech on the continent reminded Africans of their traditional values and said the church was the institution best able to preserve and purify them — unlike agencies that want to impose "cultural models that ignore the rights of the unborn."

In a speech to foreign diplomats, he laid down a direct challenge to international organizations that, in his words, were undermining society's foundations by promoting abortion as a form of reproductive health care.

The working document for next October's Synod of Bishops, delivered by the pope to African bishops, said globalization "infringes on Africa's rights" and tends "to be the vehicle for the domination of a single, cultural model and a culture of death."

The Pygmies conferred a rare turtle, a traditional sign of respect in their culture, to the pope shortly before his departure for Angola. The pope and Vatican aides, who initially spoke about finding a home for the turtle in the Vatican Gardens, decided that the turtle should stay in Africa and asked staff members of the Vatican Embassy in Luanda to find a proper home for it.

The pope hit hard on African wars and ethnic conflicts and repeatedly held out Christianity as the answer.

If Africans grasp that the church is "God's family," he said in Cameroon, there is no room for ethnocentrism or factionalism.

In effect, he presented the church as the only institution capable of bringing Africans together in a way that goes beyond political or economic expediency.

Although the pope had two one-liners about corruption, typically portrayed in the West as the quintessential "African" problem, he did not engage in finger-pointing — even in Cameroon, which is usually at the top of the corruption charts of human rights organizations.

Indeed, he called Cameroon a "land of hope" for Africa.

The reason is that he knows local African church leaders are already on the front lines in denouncing political corruption.

In Cameroon, for example, a year ago Cardinal Christian Wiyghan Tumi of Douala took the unprecedented step of publicly opposing President Paul Biya's constitutional meddling that allowed the president to serve yet another seven-year term — a position the cardinal reiterated during the pope's visit.

Significantly, the pope treated corruption not as a problem to be eliminated in return for foreign aid, but as a practice incompatible with the demands of the Gospel.

He added, however, that Africa deserves a similar change in attitude from the developed world — not "more programs and protocols" but "conversion of hearts to sincere solidarity."

His visit to the sick in Cameroon illustrated that the church must invest its resources in love and care for the needy, but with a special focus: Human suffering can only make sense in light of Christ's crucifixion and his "final victory" over death, he said.

Even the pope's defense of women's rights in Africa was very much a "Benedict" approach, based not on human rights declarations but on the biblical account of creation.

Here, too, his point that men and women have "complementary" roles will no doubt find critics.

The pope's method in Africa was not to lay down the law but to lay down a challenge, asking people to examine their own lives and their relationships in the light of the Gospel.

He believes that Christianity is a perfect fit for Africa but that, in view of cultural trends, it won't necessarily be an easy fit.

Reflections and menus offer satisfying glimpse into saints' lives

REVIEWED BY RACHELLE LINNER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"Saints at the Dinner Table" is simple and satisfying in its idea and execution: to create and present menus inspired by reflections on the lives of 12 saints.

The book is informed by author Amy Heyd's gratitude for her family, her faith and her vocation as a wife, mother of three children and gifted cook.

Heyd's inspiration for the book was the realization that her prayers were more confident when she felt a connection with a saint's life.

She writes about praying to St. Joseph in the dark hours when her father was hospitalized with a serious stroke.

"In that quiet and heart-wrenching moment, I felt that Joseph himself had stepped off the pedestal, took my hand and walked into my dad's room with me."

In St. Joseph's strength and presence she found a "wonderful listener" and "friend I could talk to in my time of need. In my quest to 'relate' to the saints, I started an intentioned journey to find a collection of saints on whom I could call."

She began with those who, like her, were interested in "food and caretaking."

The fruit of this journey is this lovely book of meditations and recipes that celebrate three biblical saints (Joseph, Andrew the Apostle and Martha); eight historical European saints (Brigid of Ireland, Isidore the farmer, Margaret of Scotland, Hildegard of Bingen, Clare of Assisi, Elizabeth of Hungary, Notburga and Didacus of Spain); and the recently canonized Sudanese St. Josephine Bakhita.

Each chapter begins with several pages of text (an explanation of the saint's historical or scriptural context, a reflection and a description of the meal) followed by the recipes (usually a main course, salad, vegetable and dessert) and concluding with thoughtful questions for dinner conversations and a prayer.

The meals are well-balanced, though heavy on meat and dairy products and sometimes an unfortunate use of processed commercial foods.

Many of the menu plans include traditional foods from a saint's country or region, such as the chicken saltimbocca for St. Clare, colcannon for St. Brigid, and Sudanese beef and potatoes for St. Josephine. Other menu choices, like those honoring St. Joseph, are metaphorical.

"The lamb chops remind me of how Joseph helped raise Jesus, the lamb of God. The breadcrumbs on top of the Carpenter Tomatoes resemble the sawdust that must have scattered the floors in Joseph's workshop.

"The mashed potatoes are a traditional comfort food and signify the comfort that St. Joseph has always given me.

"The Rocky Road Cake is symbolic of the difficult roads, both literally and symbolically, that Mary and Joseph had to travel during Mary's pregnancy and throughout Jesus' childhood."

The best parts of this book are Heyd's simple, well-crafted reflections on how the saints speak to her life.

She writes about St. Josephine's remarkable imitation of Christ in the ability to forgive those who abused her when she was a slave and the acceptance of God's will in illness and infirmity.

"As she neared the end of her life, she couldn't walk and required a wheelchair to get around. The bishop approached Bakhita and asked her what she did while sitting in her wheelchair. Bakhita replied, 'What do I do? Exactly what you are doing — the will of God.'"

St. Josephine is an appropriate woman with whom to conclude a book that is ostensibly about cooking and saints, but is really about a joyful obedience to God's will.

The saints illustrate how a person can accept God's will in any (and all) circumstances, and Heyd's gentle book reminds us that charity, creativity and fruitful living flow from fidelity, whether one is a queen, a farmer, a cloistered contemplative, a fisherman or a contemporary homemaker.

Contemplating Jesus' passion can help build our faith

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Last year Easter came early, and I found myself in Washington on the weekend of Palm Sunday at an annual meeting I have with other editors and the leadership of Catholic News Service.

At a coffee shop near Dupont Circle that Sunday morning, I looked out on rain slick sidewalks, pondering some painful situations of people I care about very much.

One of my fellow editors had shared stories of serious health problems in his family. Another friend I'd spent time with that weekend was facing a trip home to Fort Worth for his mother's surgery to remove a large tumor, not knowing if it might be cancerous.

I had just received word of a trauma in my own family the night before.

We shared a sense of loss, a sense of fear of outcomes, a sense of powerlessness.

We also shared a mutual support.

Peering out into the light rain, I realized that none of what we each faced could compare to the pain of our Lord as he faced physical persecution and ultimately his crucifixion at the hands of at least some of the same people who honored him on his triumphal entry into Jerusalem.

No palms covered the streets here, just rain.

In the year since then, I have encountered the spirituality of the Focolare movement. One central element of that spirituality embraces the notion of focusing in prayer on the moment in which Jesus, on the cross, experienced separation from his Father, and seeking to identify with him in that moment of absolute abandonment.

I must confess that I can only read the passion readings during Lent. They affect me too much to allow me to read them frequently throughout the year.

But during the very hard year since last Palm Sunday, I have found strength in the practice of contemplating Jesus' great isolation so that he could redeem us from our sins — a greater loss than any of us will ever experience.

It is quite comforting somehow. I recommend it.

Questions:

Do you find contemplating Jesus in his last day difficult? How can you use contemplation of Jesus' passion, death and resurrection to build your own faith?

'Riches to rags'

Filmmaker's personal conversion a boon for groups helping the poor

BY BETH GRIFFIN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

MARYKNOLL, N.Y. — Gerard Thomas Straub recounted his "riches to rags" journey from atheistic, financially successful Hollywood television producer to secular Franciscan filmmaker documenting world poverty.

During a Lenten meditation for 200 people March 8 at Maryknoll headquarters, he described how his unexpected conversion during a 1995 visit to Collegio Sant'Isidoro, a Franciscan friary in Rome, led him to devote his talents to "putting the power of film at the service of the poor" by making documentaries about unsung nonprofit organizations.

He does not charge the groups for his work and he also travels the country showing the films and telling his conversion story to parish, high school and college groups and raising funds for the groups depicted.

"My initial impulse was to give ministries that are serving the poor a tool to raise funds. Film is so emotional and people respond to it," Straub told Catholic News Service.

"Then I started to get invited to colleges and I realized a vital part is the educational component. I could show the plight of the poor and connect faith to poverty. Then the only option is to do something," he said.

The images in Straub's films are raw and heartbreaking. He has documented grinding poverty in inner-city Los Angeles, Detroit and Philadelphia, as well as in Africa, Asia and Central and South America.

He said his experience living for a month with Franciscan friars operating St. Francis Inn, a soup kitchen in Philadelphia, challenged his preconceptions about the homeless and addicted.

"I met real people, people just like me in so many ways," he said. "It's easy to label a homeless person as lazy or an alcoholic or drug addict as weak. The labels removed my obligation to do anything about it."

"But Jesus did not label or judge people. He reached out to them and excluded no one," he said.

Straub, 62, was raised Catholic in New York City and briefly attended a minor seminary. He landed an internship with "The Ed. Sullivan Show" on the CBS television network after high school and then moved into a clerical job there.

He progressed rapidly to network executive and produced soap operas, including "General Hospital."

He said he was "a committed atheist" who enjoyed the material successes of his chosen industry.

"I had reached a pinnacle in a very brutal, tough and competitive industry, but I began to slide away from God. I was very successful, but there was a deep emptiness," he said.

Straub said he walked away from an opportunity to produce yet another television program.

"We pandered to the lowest and most base in human nature," he said. "I knew TV was all about the commercials. And the commercials were about creating desires we don't have. It's all about pushing the envelope for rating points."

During a period of reading, writing and soul-searching, Straub explored the connection between Vincent van Gogh's creativity and St. Francis of Assisi's spirituality.

He said he was more interested in van Gogh and thought that "Francis was a pious fairy tale from the Middle Ages who had nothing to say to my modern, skeptical, secular life."

Looking for free lodging on a 1995 trip to Rome, he asked a Franciscan priest friend for a lead and was invited to stay at Collegio Sant'Isidoro, a Franciscan friary with the world's largest English-language library of literature on St. Francis.

When he arrived, he went to rest in the chapel and opened the Liturgy of the Hours randomly to Psalm 63, which begins "O God, you are my God whom I seek."

"An empty church and an empty man became a meeting place of grace," Straub said. "God broke through the silence and everything changed. I felt his overwhelming presence and I was transformed from an atheist to a pilgrim."

He returned to the sacraments and redirected his talents to making films for groups working to alleviate poverty in the United States and overseas. A theme that runs throughout the films is: "The best way to love God is to relieve the pain and suffering of others."

Straub said he hopes the films will connect the viewers emotionally to the poor and help them look at the poor through the eyes of faith.

"Slums in developing countries are the cathedrals of the poor," he said. "They are holy ground. Jesus is here — in the form of people suffering from curable diseases."

He also intends the films to call people to action.

Straub challenged the audience at Maryknoll to take Jesus seriously and turn away from things that "block us from being fully united to God."

He said, "Christ isn't asking us to be successful or productive, but to be present to each other in acts of love and mercy."

Straub established the San Damiano Foundation to finance his films. It is named for the church outside Assisi, Italy, that was rehabilitated by St. Francis at the beginning of his ministry.

Book focuses on pope as communicator

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II's ability to communicate was not primarily a result of his experience as an amateur actor, but was an expression of his theology, said the authors of a new book.

In speeches and writings, whether the audience was religious or not, the late pope continually emphasized the role of Jesus Christ as both the creator of words and as the embodiment of the Word, the authors said at a round-table discussion launching the book in February.

Christine Mugridge, a member of the Society of Our Lady of the Most Holy Trinity, and Salesian Sister Marie Gannon wrote "John Paul II: Development of a Theology of Communications," which was published by the Vatican publishing house. In his almost 27-year pontificate, Pope John Paul "was known for his communicative gifts," the authors wrote.

After analyzing both the pope's work and his communication style, the authors concluded that a principal theme of Pope John Paul's pontificate was "the person of Christ, who not only reveals/communicates the salvific plan of the Father, but reveals/communicates man to himself in the light of this divine revelation."

Oblate Father Thomas J. Fitzpatrick, 1932-2009

Longtime teacher, pastor remembered for service to church

CHILDS, Md. — Oblate Father Thomas J. Fitzpatrick, who had served in the Diocese of Charlotte, died March 16 at the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales community home in Childs, Md.

He was 77.

He had been retired in Childs after serving more than 25 years as a Catholic school teacher in Philadelphia and 20 years as a pastor in North Carolina churches.

A Mass of Christian burial was held March 20 at Our Lady of Light Chapel in Childs, with interment in the Oblates' cemetery.

A native of Wildwood, N.J., Father Fitzpatrick entered the seminary of the Oblates after graduating high school. He earned graduate degrees in theology and French from Catholic University of America and Niagara University, respectively.

He was ordained a priest in Wilmington, Del., in 1961.

Father Fitzpatrick taught religion and foreign languages at Father Judge High School and Northeast Catholic High School, both in Philadelphia, from 1961 until 1987. He then became pastor of Holy Cross Church in Kernersville, N.C., where he served for 10 years.

Next he became pastor of Our Lady of the Highways Church in Thomasville, ministering there for 10 years until his retirement in 2008.

"The death of Father Fitzpatrick is a great loss to the Oblates," said Oblate Father James Greenfield, provincial of the late pastor's religious community.

"Father Fitzpatrick was known for his commitment to our community and willingness to serve the church. He was also famous for his deep laugh. We will certainly miss him," said Father Greenfield.

In addition to his fellow Oblates, Father Fitzpatrick is survived by a sister, two sisters-in-law and many nieces and nephews.

In lieu of flowers, contributions may be made in Father Fitzpatrick's memory to the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales, P.O. Box 87, Childs, MD 21916-0087.

Ginny Boyd, an affiliate artist with McColl Center for Visual Art, directs third-graders in an art project at St. Patrick School in Charlotte Jan. 22. The project is part of a collaborative effort between the school and McColl Center to create abstract art panels exploring communities covered in the students' social studies curriculum. Over several months, the students have been designing, painting, mapping, stenciling, stitching and journaling during the course of the project. The final product will be unveiled in May.

The cross and joy

Jesus knew only way to find true joy was to empty oneself in loving others

God wants you to be happy, even though life is filled with misery. There will always be crosses, and yet we are called to live joyfully.

St. Paul helps us to master the Christian faith by understanding the relationship between God's love for us and the trials we have to endure in this world. He suffered mightily in his day, yet he commanded us to "rejoice always!"

We all suffer physical and emotional pain of some sort: Our bodies ache, people disappoint and abuse us, financial woes engender fear in us, and yet we are still called to live joyfully.

I write about joy all the time, and I suppose I get on the nerves of some people, but I feel driven by the Holy Spirit!

Occasionally St. Paul felt driven to boast about his many trials for the glory of God, and I feel that need right now.

In my Army days, I fired an M-1 rifle for endless hours on a practice range. I was an MP, and the company commander wanted us to fire expertly.

This bombardment of noise left me with a fierce buzzing in my ears to this day. I cope by uniting my inner buzzing with the song the angels sing before the Lord.

My tinnitus is no longer my enemy, but has become my friend, enabling me to pray without ceasing.

I have ulcerative colitis, and my 77-year-old arthritic knees give me fits. I'm a cancer survivor, so far that is, and I suffer from cardiac asthma.

And yet, I get through it all by following St. Paul's advice to thank God "in all circumstances."

St. Paul's advice has kept me sane. All of my little miseries are under control with medication. I love my life and my vocation. I love to write, which is a vocation within a vocation, and I especially enjoy maintaining my Web site (www.messengerofjoy.com), which offers help on being more joyful.

How do we know that God loves us?

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOR
CNS COLUMNIST

It's simple really. Jesus Christ told us to call God "our Father." Doesn't every father want his children to be happy?

That's why St. Paul said, "Rejoice always. ... In all circumstances give thanks, for this is the will of God for you in Christ Jesus" (1 Thes 5:16, 18).

St. Paul took this magnificent idea from Jesus, who at the Last Supper said, "I have told you this so that my joy may be in you and your joy may be complete" (Jn 15:11).

Pope John Paul II confirmed it: "Christ came to bring joy: joy to children, joy to parents, joy to families and to friends, joy to workers and to scholars, joy to the sick and to elderly, joy to all humanity. In a true sense joy is the keynote of the Christian message and the recurring motif of the Gospels. ... Be messengers of joy."

Our response ought to be, "I will delight and rejoice in you" (Ps 9:3).

What about the cross?

When Jesus told us to "love one another as I have loved you," he led us to the cross. Wherever there is love, there is service; wherever there is service, there is sacrifice; and wherever there is sacrifice, there is suffering.

Joy and the cross are not contradictory but complementary. Jesus knew that the only way to find true joy was to empty oneself in loving others.

"The greatest honor you can give to almighty God is to live joyfully because of the knowledge of his love" (Julian of Norwich).

Suffering and death are not the end

Review of a pain study in light of Holy Week and Easter

A recent study on pain gives us a glimpse of just how potent focusing on our faith is, and how blessed we are to practice our belief, especially when the days leading up to Holy Week and Easter are filled with powerful images of grace, suffering, fellowship and hope.

The study, published in the Pain Relief Connection newsletter, was an interdisciplinary effort conducted at the University of Oxford.

It featured specialists in clinical neurology, divinity, theology and philosophy.

It aimed to determine whether religious belief had any influence on pain and/or the perception of pain. The subjects were a group of 12 practicing Roman Catholics and 12 other adults who were either atheists or agnostics.

During the study, every participant was subjected to painful electrical stimulation on their hands while being shown one of two pictures, either Sassoferrato's painting of the Virgin Mary ("The Madonna del Sassoferrato") or a similarly styled, nonreligious image, "Lady With an Ermine" by Leonardo da Vinci.

They then were given MRI scans to see what changes, if any, occurred to the pain- and perceived-pain-specific areas of their brains.

Both groups were shown to have experienced significant real pain when undergoing the stimulation. But the Catholic group was shown to be able to "down-regulate" the perceived intensity of it when presented with the religious painting.

The nonreligious group did not show modulation of pain when viewing either of the pictures, and thus felt the full impact of the pain stimulation.

These results suggest that religious people are capable of reassessing their pain, that is, of putting it into a context that enables them to endure it more successfully.

This is distinctly different from being cured of pain, which would suppose that the pain is no longer present.

Living Well

MAUREEN PRATT
CNS COLUMNIST

Pain, the study would suggest, can still be present if the sufferer focuses on the divine. That focus can bring greater calm and even peace in the midst of ongoing trauma.

This also brings up another practical application for us. By reassessing pain in the context of a religious image, the study's Catholic subjects were also engaging in an active, prayer-like relationship with the divine.

"The other image was valued as positive by the nonreligious group," said Miguel Farias, one of the study's researchers, "but it did not activate a complex system of beliefs, like it did for Catholics."

We needn't go through the rigors of a scientific test to benefit from the pain-taming blessings of our faith.

As we focus on God's good gifts in our lives, including other people and prayer, then we can better put our pain in a workable context that allows us to live our lives with purpose, charity and dignity.

This Easter season and beyond we can consider our pain in the context of Jesus' last days as a man, his walk to Calvary, and his suffering and death on the cross. His was the ultimate expression of living with great pain while focusing on the divine.

He did not withdraw from others or from the Father, even as he knew that each step was bringing him closer to agony.

Jesus showed that suffering and death are not the end. Through the joy of the resurrection, he gives us hope and light — precious gifts that can sustain us no matter how painful our lives.

Easter hope

Our grief can blind us to God, who wants to remove it forever

Grief does strange things to us. It can keep us from seeing what is really going on in our lives, and prevent us from recognizing some of the most significant people we know.

On Easter morning, Mary Magdalene stood weeping by the tomb. Jesus himself stood there. But, St. John's Gospel tells us, "she did not know him" and supposed it was the gardener.

"Woman," he asked her, "Why are you weeping? Who is it you are looking for?"

The very cause of her grief was about to be removed by the one asking her about it. Little did she know that the reason for her weeping had already been destroyed. The Lord was present.

On Easter afternoon, two of the first Christians were walking from Jerusalem to Emmaus, "discussing as they went all that had happened. In the course of their lively exchange, Jesus approached and began to walk along with them. However, they were restrained from recognizing him. He said to them, 'What are you discussing as you go your way?'"

Again, the very reason for their grief had been destroyed by the one now asking them about their grief.

The Lord was present and was walking with them. Their hearts began to burn within them.

As the church continues to deal with the tragedy of abortion, it faces not only a sin against life but a sin against hope. We do not see abortion walking down the street. What we see is a woman, a child of God, who is caught in the grip of despair.

Even if she knows abortion is wrong, as most do, she sees no other way out. She, too, is in grief.

She feels she must choose between the baby's life and her life. The prospect of having the child is, psychologically, like a "death" to her: a death to her plans, her freedom, her future.

Grief does strange things. It can blind us to the value of the child.

It can also blind us to the presence of the Lord. He walks with us in our grief, and he asks us to share it with him so he can remove it forever.

Guest Column

FATHER FRANK PAVONE
GUEST COLUMNIST

Just as the Lord was present on the first Easter to those who thought they had lost him, so is he present today to those who grieve. He is present to those whose fear and despair are so great that they have their own children killed.

The Lord is present to others through his church. We, the people of life, enter into dialogue with the mother tempted to abort. "Why are you weeping?"

We learn her needs and fears, and we show her she is not alone. We walk with her, as the Lord walked with his grieving disciples.

We provide hope. We speak her name, we break bread with her, we lead her to the company of the other disciples. We bring her to the strength of the Eucharist.

Abortion will flee in the presence of Easter hope. The Lord still walks with his people.

The disease of 'a thousand things to do'!

Our Turn

THERESE J. BORCHARD
CNS COLUMNIST

I'm the typical young adult: I have contracted an illness called "the disease of a thousand things to do."

That's how author Abby Seixas describes it in her insightful book, "Finding the Deep River Within."

It's a modern condition whereby human beings are always rushing, trying desperately to cross off every task on their to-do lists, and are bombarded by interruptions and information overload.

Does this sound familiar? Consider these observations she makes to bolster her case of what has become a very unbalanced and frenetic culture:

1) The average working couple in America spends 20 minutes a day together. 2) Family time has become a goal, an achievement, rather than a natural consequence of being a family. 3) Most Americans are trapped in a vicious cycle of overwork and overconsumption. 4) Dropping in on a neighbor is practically nonexistent. 5) Keeping busy and multitasking are praised, and slowing down frowned upon.

I've made my Lenten resolution to adhere to six practices that Abby offers as an antidote to this cultural epidemic of living so fast that we are blinded to the big picture, of having to multitask 24/7 and thereby squandering the opportunities to be present to the moment we are living. Here. Now.

Her practices include: taking time for yourself each week, erecting important personal and work boundaries, befriending feelings, taming self-expectations, practicing presence and doing something you love.

In my life this means starting my day with 20 minutes of prayer (when I read the Lectionary texts for the day and a meditation from a saint or spiritual writer); staying offline until noon and keeping Sunday Internet work-free; cramming an hour of personal time into each week where I get to do NOTHING.

I want these 40 days before Easter to be an exercise of jumping off the treadmill of my own packed schedules and expectations. I guess I want to stop living each day like a waitress taking orders, trying to remember all the special requests (skip the mayonnaise, skim milk only, coleslaw, no fries).

I'm going after the results Abby promises if we are disciplined enough to slow down and take each minute at a time. She writes, "Access to the deeper realms, within us gives back to us our juice, our vital energy and resilience. ... We find a sense of connection to something larger than our own individual concerns and a sense of meaning that makes what we do with our time feel worthwhile."

The Holocaust: It still rightly haunts us

Pope Benedict's words disprove criticism, emphasize forgiveness

I was appalled earlier this year when the media attacked Pope Benedict XVI as being a Holocaust denier when he lifted the excommunication of four schismatic Society of St. Pius X bishops.

This gave fuel to the fire of such writers as "nonbeliever" Christopher Hitchens, as he calls himself. Writing in Newsweek, Hitchens jumped to an unproven conclusion that "by reconciling with extremist bishops, Benedict embraces the far-right fringe."

I have heard firsthand, however, how our pope never denied the Holocaust. I was invited to cover an unprecedented conference of Christians and Jews in Jerusalem in February 1994. The Catholic Church was represented by our pope, then-Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger.

I have a copy of his talk, and I quote: "The history of the relationship between Israel and Christendom is drenched with blood and tears. It is a history of mistrust and hostility, but also — thank God — a history marked again and again by attempts at forgiveness, understanding and mutual acceptance."

"After Auschwitz, the message of reconciliation and acceptance permits no deferral."

"Even if we know that Auschwitz is the gruesome expression of an ideology that not only wanted to destroy Judaism but also hated and sought to eradicate from Christianity its Jewish heritage, the question remains, What could be the reason for so much historical hostility between those who actually must belong together because of their faith in the one God and commitment to his will?"

Cardinal Ratzinger, who was a youngster when the Nazis took over his land of Germany, spoke personally of forgiveness:

"Already as a child ... I could not understand how some people wanted to derive a condemnation of the Jews from the death of Jesus because the following thought had penetrated my soul as something profoundly consoling: Jesus' blood raises no calls for retaliation, but calls all to reconciliation" — which is where the forgiveness Jesus speaks of comes in.

On that stage in an amphitheatre in Jerusalem, Cardinal Ratzinger concluded to thundering applause:

"Jews and Christians should accept each other in profound inner reconciliation, neither in disregard of their faith nor in its denial, but out of the depth of faith itself. In their mutual reconciliation they should become a force for peace in and for the world."

There is more to remember. In the Jubilee Year of 2000, our late

Pope John Paul II said in all honesty that our church needed to seek forgiveness for some of its wrongs done in the past.

He, along with Cardinal Ratzinger, then the president of the International Theological Commission, proposed a study: "Memory and Reconciliation: The Church and the Faults of the Past." Not forgotten in this document is the "tormented history" of the relations between Christians and Jews.

Wrote Cardinal Ratzinger: "The Shoah was certainly the result of the pagan ideology that was Nazism, animated by a merciless anti-Semitism that not only despised the faith of the Jewish people, but also denied their very human dignity."

"Nevertheless, it may be asked whether the Nazi persecution of the Jews was not made easier by the anti-Jewish prejudices imbedded in some Christian minds and hearts. ...

"There is no doubt that there were many Christians who risked their lives to save and to help their Jewish neighbors. ... The hostility or mistrust shown by numerous Christians toward Jews over the course of time is a painful historical fact ... which requires repentance."

There is no way this good man — now Pope Benedict XVI — can be justly accused of denying the Holocaust!

Catholic church reopens in New Orleans' Katrina-damaged 9th Ward

BY CHRISTINE BORDELON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW ORLEANS — A trumpet blared the hymn "We Have Come Into This House" as about 400 people began singing and marching around the block to officially reopen St. David Church in the Lower 9th Ward of New Orleans.

The church had been closed for nearly four years after it was damaged by the flooding caused by Hurricane Katrina.

"Sept. 8, 2007, was the official start of the rebuilding of St. David," said parishioner Michael Gordon, referring to the day when parishioners installed a church subfloor in preparation for the renovations.

That long road to reopening ended March 1 when New Orleans Auxiliary Bishop Shelton J. Fabre, the principal celebrant for the dedication Mass, handed the church keys to Josephite Father Joe Campion, pastor of the church, who unlocked the main entrance to start the rite of dedication.

Auxiliary Bishop Shelton J. Fabre of New Orleans blesses the baptismal font at the restored St. David Church in New Orleans March 1. At right is Josephite Father Joseph Campion, pastor of the church. The church had been closed for nearly four years after it was damaged by the flooding caused by Hurricane Katrina.

the readings, which included a passage from Genesis about Noah and the flood.

"In a wonderful way now you have been very faithful to God even though it has not been easy," Bishop Fabre said, comparing the parishioners' flood experience and faith to that of Noah.

He called the reopening of St. David Church a "beacon of hope in this community."

"Just as hope is the first thing that is lost, hope is the first thing to emerge from all that has been broken," Bishop Fabre said.

The bishop told St. David Church parishioners and their friends that even though they returned to their physical church their faith proved to be larger than any building.

At the end of the Mass, Father Campion reiterated the long journey home since Hurricane Katrina. He recalled his exile with other Josephite priests to Breaux Bridge where a Josephite Recovery Center was established.

His current pastoral assistant, Holy Family Sister Teresa Rooney, helped run the center to aid hurricane victims and reunite parishioners.

"It was there we began to bring our church together," Father Campion said.

He said St. David Church, which was renovated in 1990, had to be completely restored after Hurricane Katrina hit in August 2005. The process began in December of that year when the Alleluia Community Church from Augusta, Ga., gutted the church and rectory.

Former-St. David Church parishioners who had returned to New Orleans were worshipping at Blessed Sacrament Church, another Josephite parish, where Father Campion lived after the storm.

Then, parishioners from St. David Church and nearby St. Maurice Church were asked to worship at St. Maurice Church, without utilities. An average of 80 to 90 people attended Mass, a number that steadily increased in recent months.

A transitional leadership team was established at St. Maurice Church to jump-start basic ministries such as evangelization, social outreach and finances.

By July 2008, after assessing storm damages and population counts at both parishes, the archdiocese announced that St. David and St. Maurice churches would merge and worship at St. David Church.

The cost to reopen St. Maurice Church, which was established in 1852, was estimated at $2 million, compared to $600,000 for St. David Church, established in 1937.

By August 2008, St. Rita Church in New York had shipped pews, a sound system, vestments, Stations of the Cross, a baptismal font and statues to St. David Church, making worship possible.

"They sent everything to us that they had because their church was closed," Sister Rooney said. "The pews were smaller and didn't exactly fit, but it kept us going."

At the dedication Mass, Father Campion recognized many of those who had contributed to the reopening of St. David Church, including 21 parishioners from St. David of Wales Church in Willow Grove, Pa. The Pennsylvania parish, a sister parish of its namesake before Katrina, supported the New Orleans parish with fundraisers and donated a bronze replica of St. David of Wales for the rededication.

Father Campion said the storm awakened many to being open to change. The church's new motto, "Be joyful, keep your faith and do the small things in life," was displayed on a banner at the Mass.

Father Campion said he also hopes to rebuild the convent and community center and is considering adding a Spanish Mass or perhaps a Saturday vigil Mass.

"We're going to get out of our old patterns and evangelize beyond our boundaries," he said. "The small things — that's going to be our future."

FAITH OVER FUN

Michael Ochab poses with some of his Detroit Tigers gear on the steps of St. Florian Church in Detroit where he will be on Good Friday, which this year is also opening day for the Tigers' season.

Baseball home opener on Good Friday ends 20-year attendance streak

HAMTRAMCK, Mich. (CNS) — Michael Ochab's 20-year streak of rooting for the Detroit Tigers as part of the opening day crowd is coming to an end. Home opening day this year falls on Good Friday, April 10.

"It's a no-brainer for me," said the 47-year-old Ochab. "He died for us on that cross."

As the first pitch crosses the mound at Comerica Park, just after the 1:05 p.m. start of his beloved Tigers facing off against the Texas Rangers, Ochab will be in St. Florian Church for Good Friday services. He and his eight siblings grew up in the parish, attended the grade school and high school, and he said he spent years there as an altar server.

"I like to have fun on opening day," said Ochab. "I like to watch the revelries and all. But it just doesn't seem appropriate this year."

Ron Colangelo, vice president for communications for the Detroit Tigers, told The Michigan Catholic, Detroit's archdiocesan newspaper, that the league "tries to accommodate the clubs the best it can. In this instance, we had the Final Four being played on Monday (April 6) so they'll open the season on the road."

As it turns out, each of the 30 teams in Major League Baseball play on Good Friday this year, though not all are afternoon games.

"And don't forget," Colangelo said, "the NBA plays on Christmas and so does the NFL."

When the Tigers' opening day fell on Holy Thursday in 2004, Ochab was there as the Tigers beat the Minnesota Twins

10-6, "but it didn't really feel as festive."

After the afternoon game, he headed to Mass.

Jesuit Father Mark George, pastor of SS. Peter and Paul Church in Detroit, said being within walking distance of Comerica Park and Ford Field, home of the Detroit Lions football team, is an opportunity for his parish.

"We're trying to make sure all the hotels in the area know we're here so people can plan for Palm Sunday and Good Friday while they're here," he said.

This year basketball's Final Four game will be played at Ford Field, an indoor stadium, on the weekend of Palm Sunday.

He was an associate pastor in Cleveland two years ago when the opening day for the Indians fell on Good Friday. Although the game was started, it couldn't be finished and was called because of a snowstorm.

"Not only was that game snowed out, so was their whole first series. Was it because they tried to play opening day on Good Friday? That's one interpretation," he said with a laugh.

While Ochab said he's hoping others also pick Good Friday services over the game, he knows the already-sold-out stadium will be filled with people of all faiths.

Ochab is a 27-game ticket holder, and an opening-game ticket was included in his plan. He muses that it might go to a Muslim friend "since I don't think I'd give it to another Catholic or a Christian."

And in the meantime, he said, "I'm praying for rain."

Bishops remind Congress to remember poor, vulnerable in budget

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Congress must remember "the least of these" in society as it makes choices on the federal budget for fiscal year 2010, according to the chairmen of two U.S. bishops' committees in a joint March 26 letter to members of Congress.

Among the domestic items the bishops emphasized in their letter were health care, affordable housing, climate change, the D.C. Opportunity Scholarships program for the District of Columbia, funding for federal child nutrition programs, and domestic agricultural supports for smaller farms.

On international issues, the bishops stressed an increase in the international affairs budget, the Migration and Refugee Assistance account, and the Office of Refugee Resettlement budget.

"Our faith and moral principles call us to measure economic decisions on whether they enhance or undermine the lives of those most in need," said Bishops Howard J. Hubbard of Albany, N.Y., and William F. Murphy of Rockville Centre, N.Y., in their letter.

Bishop Hubbard is chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on International Justice and Peace. Bishop Murphy is chairman of the bishops' Committee on Domestic Justice and Human Development.

The bishops also asked that Congress pass a budget that does not cut incentives for charitable giving.

"The budget choices of Congress have clear moral and human dimensions; they reflect our values as a people," they said. "Our plea is simple: Put the poor and vulnerable first."

"Too often the weak and vulnerable are not heard in the budget debate," Bishops Hubbard and Murphy said.

"While they do not have powerful lobbyists, poor children and their families have compelling needs that have a priority claim on our consciences and our choices as the nation allocates limited federal resources," they said.

Vatican commission on China meets to discuss life of church in China

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A Vatican commission on the church in China was holding its second meeting March 30-April 1, looking at important issues concerning the life of the church in China.

The commission is made up of the heads of several Vatican congregations and offices, "representatives of the Chinese episcopacy" and representatives of religious orders working in China, the Vatican press office said in a statement March 28.

The first item of business, the Vatican said, was to discuss the life of the church in China in light of Pope Benedict XVI's June 2007 letter to Chinese Catholics.

The papal letter encouraged cooperation between clandestine Catholic communities and those officially registered with China's communist government; called for dialogue with the government on issues such as the appointment of bishops; and asked government-registered bishops who have secretly reconciled with the Vatican to make that fact clear to their faithful.

The pope also used the letter to announce the formation of the commission for discussing issues of major importance for the church.

The commission's first meeting was held March 10-12 last year and specifically discussed reactions to the pope's letter to Chinese Catholics and exchanged information and experiences concerning the life and activity of the church in China.

The commission, which did not include any bishops from China, also reflected on practical ways for the church to be an "instrument of salvation for the Chinese people," a discussion which included reconciliation between the divided Chinese Catholic communities and the governance of Chinese Catholic dioceses.

Vatican orders apostolic visitation of Legionaries of Christ

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has ordered an apostolic visitation of the institutions of the Legionaries of Christ following disclosures of sexual impropriety by the order's late founder, Father Marcial Maciel Degollado.

The announcement of the unusual investigation was posted on the Web site of the Legionaries of Christ March 31, along with the text of a letter informing the Legionaries of the pope's decision.

The letter, written by the Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, said the pope wanted to help the Legionaries of Christ deal with its present problems with "truth and transparency."

It said the visitation would be carried out by "a team of prelates," who were not identified.

Apostolic visitation is a form of internal church investigation ordered by a pope and undertaken by his delegate or delegates. The pope sets the jurisdiction and powers of the visitation, which usually ends with the submission of a report to the Holy See.

In February, Legionaries of Christ officials in Rome disclosed that Father Maciel had fathered a child. Sources in Rome said the order also was looking into accusations of financial irregularities by Father Maciel.

In the past, Father Maciel had been accused of sexually abusing young seminarians in the order. After investigating those allegations, the Vatican in 2006 told Father Maciel to renounce public ministry as a priest and spend the rest of his life in prayer and penitence; the Vatican did not, however, confirm that sexual abuse had occurred.

Father Maciel died Jan. 30, 2008, at the age of 87.

Father Alvaro Corcuera, director general of the Legionaries and its lay association, Regnum Christi, said in an online statement that the visitation "is the beginning of a process in which the Legion will fully and gratefully participate."

He said it would begin after Easter and would probably last several months.

Several Vatican officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the effectiveness of an apostolic visitation would depend in large part on cooperation by Legionaries of Christ leadership.

Head of Holy Cross order asks Obama to rethink position on abortion

ROME (CNS) — The head of the Holy Cross religious order that founded the University of Notre Dame has written to U.S. President Barack Obama and asked him to rethink his positions on abortion and other life issues.

U.S. Father Hugh Cleary, Holy Cross superior general in Rome, said that when Obama receives an honorary degree from the Indiana university and delivers the commencement address in May, he should take to heart the objections of Catholics who have been scandalized by the invitation.

Father Cleary asked the president to use the occasion to "give your conscience a fresh opportunity to be formed anew in a holy awe and reverence before human life in every form at every stage — from conception to natural death."

Helping the homeless

The dinner marked the final night of the shelter, which ran Nov. 22, 2008-March 18, and to show appreciation for the more than 120 volunteer monitors and guests who participated.

Cots, blankets, pillows and other supplies were donated to the shelter, held in the church basement from 7 p.m. to 7 a.m. daily, with an average of seven guests and three monitors per night.

The shelter began because of the lack of available space for homeless persons in Burke County shelters. House of Refuge, a nonprofit Christian ministry, was able to accommodate only six homeless persons at a time, so the Collinses helped the parish in their outreach efforts to the homeless.

Bowling event raises funds

BELMONT — More than 900 bowlers and 100 volunteers participated in Holy Angels' 17th annual All Star Angel Bowl in Gastonia March 14.

Holy Angels is a nonprofit corporation founded by the Sisters of Mercy in Belmont that provides residential services and programs for children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation and physical disabilities.

The Angel Bowl is Holy Angels' largest fundraising event. Businesses, schools, churches and civic organizations participated in the bowl-athon by forming more than 180 five-person teams, with each bowler challenged to raise at least $100 in pledges.

Holy Angels' residents also participated and led players in the Pledge of Allegiance.

In its 16-year history, the Angel Bowl has raised more than $1.3 million. Participants of the recent Angel Bowl continue to turn in donations and pledges from their fundraising efforts as the Holy Angels foundation nears its $100,000 goal for the year.

and deacons, women religious and monks from Belmont Abbey.

The pilgrimage, a day of prayer and reflection, was part of the diocese's preparation for the fifth diocesan Eucharistic Congress, themed "The Word Became Flesh and Made His Dwelling Among Us," to be held at the Charlotte Convention Center Sept. 25-26.

"The words from St. John's Gospel are the perfect theme to reflect on the meaning of the Eucharist," said Bishop Jugis.

"We usually hear these words during the Christmas season," he said, "but they are appropriate any time of year."

"Two thousand years ago Jesus was conceived by the power of the Holy Spirit," said Bishop Jugis, reflecting on the theme.

Today, "the Word becomes flesh once again here in the holy Eucharist," he said. "We see the mystery right here before us, there in the monstrance. This is the real presence of Christ."

"I think it was a great success," said Jenny Ryan, campus ministry director at Belmont Abbey College. "The students who participated seemed very engaged and very enthusiastic."

The day included a eucharistic

"It was really student organized and talks and led the youths in singing praise and worship music.

"I think the high school and middle school youths look up to that," said Ryan, "I think that had a lot to do with the success of the event."

Katie Bess, youth activity coordinator at Queen of the Apostles Church in Belmont, brought seven youths to the pilgrimage.

"I think it's important for them to see other people their age committed to the church and the life of the church," said Bess.

One of the speakers, Brother Edward Mancuso of Belmont Abbey, talked about the importance of faith in defining good relationships.

"It is important to have friends who support your faith," he said.

He shared the importance of the Eucharist in his life and how it led him to his vocation as a monk.

"The Eucharist started to play a defining role in my life when I went to college," said Brother Mancuso of his time at St. Bonaventure University in New York. He talked about the graces that come from receiving Christ in the Eucharist.

"Not everyone can attend Mass each day," said Brother Mancuso, "but when possible, Jesus is waiting to energize your day."

Christ in the Eucharist is a gift to us from the Lord, said Bishop Jugis, and it is not based on anything "we could have merited or deserved."

"It is my hope that as you offer yourself to Christ you will be a blessing for your friends and family and that the Lord will choose some of you to offer yourselves as priests or as brothers or sisters," said Bishop Jugis in his address to the pilgrims. "Many good works come from a person who is offering himself to God."

Charleston bishop says agenda is to meet needs

York and elsewhere all came to celebrate with him.

An overflow crowd of about 125 filled the Cathedral Center hall and joined the ceremony through video feed. Others watched from homes, schools and churches via streaming video on the Internet. The diocesan Web site received more than 6,500 hits during the live feed. The ordination was also broadcast on Mediatrix Catholic radio and catholicradiosc.com.

Cardinal Edward M. Egan, archbishop of New York, was the principal consecrator in the absence of Archbishop Wilton D. Gregory of Atlanta, who was unable to attend.

Co-consecrators were Bishop William F. Murphy of Rockville Centre, N.Y., and Bishop Robert J. Baker of the Diocese of Birmingham, Ala., who led the Diocese of Charleston from 1999 until September 2007.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte was a concelebrant of the ordination Mass, as was Archbishop Pietro Sambini, apostolic nuncio to the United States.

Archbishop Sambini read from the apostolic letter that officially called Bishop Guglielmone to service in the diocese. Prior to becoming bishop, he was rector at St. Agnes Cathedral in Rockville Centre.

"We are truly confident that as you faithfully teach and govern in the name of the Lord you will ... be a symbol of unity to all entrusted to your pastoral care," Archbishop Sambini said.

To be a bishop

In his homily, Cardinal Egan urged Bishop Guglielmone to commit himself to bear witness to the Gospel, to serve others and "love all whom God places in your care ... including the poor and the weak, the immigrant and the stranger."

He also referred to the bishop's strong Catholic family heritage and to his late parents.

"Carolina and Francesco are praying for you in heaven and will be praying for you every day," he said.

"You are the 13th bishop of one of the most historic and esteemed dioceses in the nation," he said. "... You are standing on the shoulders of wonderful successors of the apostles. I've known six of the previous 12 bishops personally. If you need any help, just call me in New York."

Cardinal Egan said it was appropriate that the ordination should take place on the feast of the Annunciation.

"On this day when we remember Mary handing herself totally over to the Lord, today you are making the same commitment," he said. "Lead your people in prayer ... the greatest of all being the Eucharist. You are becoming bishop in a time of considerable turmoil in the nation and the world. People will look to you for leadership, unity and prayer."

Cardinal Egan then led the Promise of the Elect, and asked Bishop Guglielmone to faithfully follow the Gospel and carry out his work as bishop. The Litany of Supplication followed as the bishop prostrated himself on the floor and the choir led the congregation in the Litany of the Saints.

Cardinal Egan and Bishops Baker and Murphy then performed the laying on of hands and led the prayer of ordination. Cardinal Egan anointed Bishop Guglielmone with sacred chrism, or holy oil.

During the Prayer of Ordination, two deacons held the Book of the Gospels over the bishop's head to symbolize the importance of following the word of God.

Bishop Guglielmone received the kiss of peace from the consecrators and the 12 other visiting bishops. He also officially received the three symbols of his office — his ring, miter and crosier — and took his seat in the bishop's chair, called the cathedra.

'Pilgrimage of life'

Toward the end of the ceremony, the bishop walked around the cathedral and blessed everyone while the choir sang the hymn, "Te Deum." He also offered some remarks.

"The first word that comes to my mind is 'Wow!' What a wonderful day this is for me personally," he said. "I am so happy to be with you as your bishop ... I hope that I can be for you all that you hope for and pray for, and that we can always be a people of hope. I can't help but be overwhelmed at all the love I've received, the Southern hospitality."

Bishop Guglielmone promised to support the priests and deacons, men and women religious, and lay people of the diocese as they spread the Gospel message, and in turn asked for their support and prayers.

He said he was aware of the challenges facing the diocese and society in general during the recent economic downturn.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte lays hands on Bishop Robert E. Guglielmone of Charleston during his episcopal ordination at the Cathedral of St. John the Baptist in Charleston, S.C. March 25.

"Folks, we're on the pilgrimage of life together, and we need each other ... if we're going to meet the challenges, we need to work together," he said. "I can't say I have an agenda. My only agenda is to form one with you as we forge on to meet the needs of God's people."

Bishop Guglielmone thanked everyone who supported him as a priest in New York. He became emotional as he explained that the crosier he carried was used by the Long Island bishop who ordained him.

He also thanked Bishop Baker and retired Bishop David B. Thompson for their help in learning about the diocese, and paid tribute to Msgr. Martin T. Laughlin, who served as diocesan administrator during the 17 months the diocese was without a bishop.

State and local dignitaries and other Christian clergy also attended the ceremony.

The bishop's two older brothers, Nick Dana and Tito Guglielmone, attended with their wives and children.

"This was very powerful. I have no aversion to saying I was crying during parts of it," said Tito, who lives in Callicoon, N.Y. "He's a wonderful person, priest and human being. He'll reach out to everyone."

"The ceremony was magnificent," Nick said. "I know he loves people, but it's now obvious how people here already love him."

living for?"

Although he had been a star high school athlete who aspired to play college basketball, Eades recalled attending Charlotte Hornets games and thinking about what an NBA player does at the end of the season.

"Somehow I used to think, once one reaches the height of the basketball world, then what does one do the next day?" he said. "Is what we are living for going to last forever or not? There has to be something greater to live for."

Eades, a native of Oxford, Ohio, who grew up in Charlotte and attended St. Gabriel Church, called those reflective moments in his life a "tremendous grace" in his spiritual journey toward what he is living for today: the Catholic priesthood.

Ordained a transitional deacon July 14, Deacon Eades will be ordained to the priesthood for the Congregation of the Oratory of Saint Philip Neri in Toronto, Canada, May 26.

"A vocation is a gift for the whole church," said Deacon Eades, referring to being ordained outside of the Diocese of Charlotte.

Deacon Eades attributes his spiritual growth and vocational call to the influence of his parents and priests — notably, Father Ray Williams, pastor of St. Mary, Mother of God Church in Sylva, who had served as chaplain at Charlotte Catholic.

While in high school, Deacon Eades considered becoming an investment banker, politician or lawyer, but soon realized he wanted to fulfill his desire to serve the church through the priesthood.

"I began to think there was nothing higher or more noble than the Catholic priesthood — without priests, there would be neither the Eucharist nor confession," said Deacon Eades.

In college, his attitude toward the priesthood changed from "a glorious idea for others" to "it's for me."

After two years of studying philosophy and economics at Notre Dame University in South Bend, Ind., Deacon Eades became a seminarian for the Diocese of Charlotte and completed his studies — earning a licentiate in philosophy — from Catholic University of America.

During his time at Catholic University, Deacon Eades discovered the Oratory of St. Philip Neri, a congregation of Catholic priests and lay brothers who live together in community and are bound together by no formal vows, but only by the bond of charity.

London-born Cardinal John Henry Newman founded the English community of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri in 1848.

Having both an interest in St. Philip and Cardinal Newman, Deacon Eades entered the novitiate at the Toronto oratory in 2004 where he "found his home."

The congregation has about 70 oratories around the world, but Deacon Eades was drawn to the Toronto oratory because of its founder, Oratorian Father Jonathan Robinson.

"His understanding of the principles of the spiritual life and his diagnosis of the current difficulties facing the church deeply impressed me," said Deacon Eades.

"I wanted to be formed in the house he built with its care for the Latin liturgy, the seriousness of its life of prayer and the combination of parish work and teaching," he said.

Deciding to pursue the priesthood in his early 20s was important to Deacon Eades.

"We only have so much time in our life — why put God off?" he said. "Those who enter when they are young ... can live for Christ more single mindedly."

"God desires our happiness," said Deacon Eades. "If God made you to do something, it's in your best interest to do it. You don't lose anything when you give your life to God ... much depends on when we respond or not."

To young people considering calls to the priesthood or religious life, Deacon Eades recommends they "be generous with Jesus — in prayer, spiritual reading and confession. He cannot be outdone in generosity."

After his priestly ordination May 26, Deacon Eades will celebrate his first public Mass — in the extraordinary form — at the Toronto oratory May 27.

He will return to the Diocese of Charlotte and celebrate Mass in the ordinary form at his home parish of St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte June 20.

St. Philip Neri starts Seven Churches pilgrimage

The devotion to the Seven Churches in Rome is attributed to St. Philip Neri, who lived 1515-1595.

Traditionally, the Seven Churches include the four major basilicas — St. John Lateran, St. Peter (at the Vatican), St. Paul Outside the Walls and St. Mary Major — along with the following three minor basilicas — St. Laurence, Santa Croce and St. Sebastian.

Throughout his ministry, St. Philip had a great devotion to the Seven Churches. The pilgrimage took penitents to the seven churches, where they would hear sermons, attend Mass, pray and perform other spiritual acts.

St. Philip used the pilgrimage as an alternative to Carnival to help young men avoid vice and sin. The pilgrimage grew from fewer than 30 to more than 2,000 participants during St. Philip's life.

The Way of the Cross

Stations of the Cross, or Way of the Cross, is the devotion commemorating the final hours, or Passion, of Jesus.

The devotion is to help the faithful make a spiritual pilgrimage of prayer, through meditating upon the chief scenes of Christ's sufferings and death.

This devotion may be done at any time, but it is most commonly done during Lent, especially on Good Friday and on Friday evenings during Lent.

A roundup of Scripture, readings, films and more

Separated by centuries, two women saints exhibit courage, grace

REVIEWED BY PEGGY WEBER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Centuries separate St. Joan of Arc and St. Edith Stein. And the women who wrote about them are different — Mary Gordon, a novelist, and Dianne Marie Traflet, a professor.

However, the authors both provide incredibly compelling works about the warrior saint and philosopher nun that strike similar chords with the reader.

And as one reads about the horrific yet courageous deaths suffered by both St. Edith and St. Joan, one can see just what these two had in common — courage and grace.

In "Saint Edith Stein: A Spiritual Portrait," Traflet, associate dean and professor of pastoral theology at Immaculate Conception Seminary School of Theology at Seton Hall University in South Orange, N.J., offers a wonderful insight into the mind and life of St. Edith.

Her scholarship glistens in this work as she quotes directly from many of St. Edith's writings and from those who knew this 20th-century saint.

Much has been written about St. Edith, a Jewish woman who converted, became a Carmelite nun, and died in a concentration camp.

What makes this book different is Traflet's focus on the spiritual life of a woman who, during several years of her life, rejected all religion.

The book focuses on St. Edith's relation to the Eucharist, Mary and the cross.

Traflet writes with a clear style that is not bogged down in academic jargon. She also brings this saint to life and shows the anxious moments, the fears and the worries that were part of St. Edith's spiritual process.

The author shows great compassion and almost a tenderness when describing how difficult it must have been for St. Edith to choose Catholicism and religious life in light of the strong opposition of her mother.

The book itself is an interesting biography. However, it also holds lessons for anyone intent on a better spiritual life.

For example, Traflet writes: "An interior life cultivated by quiet stillness prepares souls to surrender their lives to God and later to venture into the chaotic noise of society, remaining calm and focused."

Those words show St. Edith's journey but they also invite the reader to make a journey of his or her own.

In "Joan of Arc: A Life," one is immediately drawn into the book through Gordon's beautiful writing.

A professor of English at Barnard College in New York and an accomplished novelist, Gordon takes on a difficult subject here.

She notes immediately in the acknowledgments page that there are 20,000 books about St. Joan of Arc in the Bibliotheque Nationale in Paris. One might ask, what more can be said?

Gordon finds a new angle to approach the life of this warrior saint.

She states that the book is a biographical meditation. In it she focuses on the sheer audacity of the saint and the wonderful example she offers to those who follow a unique and special life.

Gordon writes that St. Joan was "a girl who came from nowhere, supported an equivocal cause, triumphed for a few months only, failed as a soldier, saw visions ... died in agony, a saint whom the church refused canonization for 500 years, yet who stands in our imagination for the single-minded triumph of the she — and it must be a she — who feared nothing (and who) knew herself right and fully able and the chosen of the Lord."

Gordon gives the readers beautiful words, a fascinating topic and the desire to live a courageous and grace-filled life where one attempts to listen to the voice of God.

Easter is a time to celebrate life

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

A proverb attributed to the late president Abraham Lincoln asserts: "In the end, it's not the years in your life that count. It's the life in your years."

Wise words, especially if one lives in a culture that is obsessed with holding death at bay. Human history is filled with the stories of persons fruitlessly attempting to prolong the years allotted to them.

Even today, countless products costing millions of dollars are marketed with the goal of preserving youthfulness and slowing down the aging process.

Even so, no one yet has found the secret of increasing his or her length of life or escaping physical death.

Easter — the feast that defines us as Christians — tells us that even with the sure progress of aging and the inevitability of our mortality, life does not end. This belief comforts many who have lost loved ones with whom they hope to be reunited.

However, the celebration of Christ's resurrection prompts us to claim not only the promise of eternal life beyond the grave, but the fullness of life that is given here and now.

Ironically, many people who still have a pulse experience their lives as those who are already dead (just ask anyone who has suffered from severe depression). On the other hand, many people with terminal illnesses maintain that they have never been more alive.

Clearly, the way one perceives one's own life and death depends on the perspective one takes. Death, in this view, is not really something to be feared or avoided — and life is a gift to be embraced and shared as fully as possible.

This is what St. Paul had in mind when he wrote to the Colossians: "For you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God."

For the believer in Christ, the years in one's life matter less than the life in one's years. Let the celebration of life begin.

Questions:

In what ways have you tried to avoid death or measure your years? What can you do today to fully embrace the life promised in Christ's resurrection?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord" (Psalm 118:17).

Captain Bogg & Salty pirate-themed band focuses on its youngest fans

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Loren Hoskins, who plays the parts of both Captain Angus Bogg and dimwitted swab Salty in the pirate-themed band Captain Bogg & Salty, noted that four years ago the band was branching out from its base of children's shows to play more shows at taverns and the like.

"It was the same music," he said. "We just turned the amps up."

But now, two albums later, the band has decided to stick to its roots and focus on its youngest fans. That doesn't mean adults aren't welcome. They are, especially if they're parents.

"I think everything should be PG — parental guidance. I think parents should weigh in on everything," said Hoskins, a Catholic who has been leading the Oregon-based band of merrymaking musicians for 11 years.

Captain Bogg & Salty has released a new CD, "Emphatical Piratical," with the CD cover unfolding into a map of mythical Frogg Island for young listeners to explore and imagine.

Hoskins took note of the ebb and flow of the band.

"We started in '98," when according to him the band was the only group with "kids' music on a CD."

"Before we started it was all Raffi," a children's singer who performs solo, he added.

"Now kids can have a CD of their own music and it doesn't have to be a synthesizer; it can be a rock band," Hoskins said.

"For a couple years we were (saying), 'We're a pirate rock band,' and people would say, 'Say what?' Now there's a whole pirate culture. Those Johnny Depp ('Pirates of the Caribbean') movies came out. We shot up. We were in huge demand. We played lots of places because it was so popular," he said.

Hoskins said he was "kind of bummed that those movies took pirates away from kids and made them more adult."

"Pirates were for kids — where we're coming from," he continued. It's "just kind of a fun place to be bold and brave and dress up and say 'Yarr,'" he added.

Children are too young to be caught up in adult matters, Hoskins said.

"They don't care about pirate movies or popular trends," he added. "We got back to being everybody's favorite little secret. ... We've come to the other side of that. We were pirate before pirate was cool."

Hoskins said the pirate band is, in essence, an extension of his childhood: "When I was a kid, I would play sound-effects records. I would play a jungle sound effect and set up my room as a treasure hunt."

He parlayed that bit of whimsy into a career writing commercials and jingles and doing voice-over work in the Portland area. Then came the inspiration to start a pirate band.

"Bogg & Salty got so busy I started turning things down and after six months people stop calling you," he said.

The new CD has none of the Captain Bogg & Salty sketches featured on earlier albums. But Hoskins said he is considering a CD consisting of nothing but sketches, with instrumental music and his old childhood favorite, sound effects, added to the mix.

Catholic media entrepreneur settles lawsuit

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A California Catholic media entrepreneur accused of fraudulent business practices has agreed to settle a lawsuit launched by the district attorney's office in Kern County, Calif., and agreed to pay $200,000 in restitution, penalties and fees.

Michael Galloway — president of Catholic Online, Catholic Financial Services, Your Catholic Voice and Your Catholic Voice Foundation — also agreed to drop a lawsuit he had filed against the Monastery of the Glorious Cross in Branford, Conn., as part of the March 24 stipulated settlement agreement.

Though Galloway and the Kern County District Attorney's Office have agreed to settle the lawsuit, both parties have until April 30 to make amendments before a judge signs off on it.

Though Galloway agreed to settle the civil suit and to pay restitution to individuals and Catholic nonprofit organizations claiming they are owed money, he told Catholic News Service March 30 the settlement didn't require him to admit guilt to accusations of fraud.

APRIL 24-25: CHRISTOPHER WEST PRESENTS AN EXCITING INTRO TO JOHN PAUL II's "THEOLOGY OF THE BODY"

In the words of Pope John Paul II, "if we live according to the true meaning of our sexuality, we fulfill the very meaning of our being and existence." Many think they understand what the Church teaches about the body and the relationship between man and woman. However, the deeper reasons (the why of these teachings) are not well understood. The human body is meant to be a sign of God's own life and love in the world. Join Christopher West for a thought-provoking presentation that will enrich your understanding of human sexuality and the spiritual power it contains.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Don't further research at cost of human lives

I applaud and thank Father Timothy Reid for his guest column on embryonic stem cell research ("The responsibility to fight injustice: Taking innocent life, even in its most nascent stages, is always intrinsically evil," March 20). Besides being prescient, the column was succinct and informative.

We should not allow the destruction of innocent human life by experimentation because it is immoral and unethical. Are we repeating the Nazi era during which (German SS physician) Josef Mengele experimented on human beings to further his research?

The Nuremberg trials after World War II convicted Mengele of horrific crimes against humanity. And after the furor was over the cry went up: "Never again!" How soon we forget. May God help us through the current darkness.

Notre Dame doesn't understand, respect church teaching

(Regarding "Despite criticism, Notre Dame firm on Obama as commencement speaker," March 27)

I am disappointed but not surprised at Notre Dame's selection of President Barack Obama as commencement speaker. Like too many Catholic institutions, this university seeks validation from the secular sector at the expense of true Catholic teaching.

Obama is the point person of the secular sector's culture of death. True to his commitment to the abortion-on-demand people, among his first actions as president he attacked the fragile political structure of the pro-life movement by dismantling federal prohibitions against funding foreign abortion support.

Notre Dame president Holy Cross Father John Jenkins' denial notwithstanding, his selection of Obama signals an acceptance — or at least a toleration — by the university of Obama's positions. And the university's claim that most students are pleased with this choice seems to indicate that either the student body rejects Catholic teaching or they don't understand it.

Either way, I see a fundamental failure of some Catholic educators, priests and bishops in guiding and shepherding the faithful. It is apparent to me that the "Fighting Irish" are not fighting for the unborn. Notre Dame is indeed "Notre Shame."

Letters to the Editor

Health care workers' conscience rights imperative for all

(Regarding "Conscience matters: N.C. bishops call for help in defending health care workers' rights," March 27)

It is my constitutional right to practice my Roman Catholic religion without harassment from the government or any other entity in this country. This is what our Founding Fathers decided upon.

If I must go against my conscience, which is intimately connected to my Catholic faith, then I will be denied the practice of my religion and my constitutional rights will be violated.

When I received my medical degree, it was known that I am a Catholic physician. Any determination that does not let me practice medicine in a Catholic moral manner is against my freedom to practice my religion under the U.S. Constitution.

If I must surrender my medical license due to being a conscientious objector, the rural area in which I practice medicine will be underserved.

Magliano misinterprets greed, solutions

I am amazed that Tony Magliano would be so presumptuous as to assume he knows what Jesus would do ("During Lent: What would Jesus do? Christ calls us to aim higher, follow moral high road," March 20).

Magliano makes a blanket condemnation of what he labels as "greed." However, the drive to maximize profits is part of the strength of U.S. capitalism and it benefits many. The moral issue is not the striving for excellence but how one uses the resulting profits.

I question the interpretation of Jesus' admonition to the rich man to "sell what you have and give to the poor." This could be more about not making riches your god.

Rather than giving everything to the poor, a savvy entrepreneur might benefit the poor more by keeping and investing his riches and giving the profits to the poor.

Jump-starting a ragged prayer life

Retreats help keep us alert for Christ's arrival

When Jesus goes to the Garden of Gethsemane, he asks his friends if they would "watch this hour with me." Every year we see his disciples, drowsy from the late hour and the wine they shared at the last meal, drift off to sleep as Jesus faces his loneliest moments.

In the garden, Jesus is at his most human, a brilliant man who realizes what will happen to him in Jerusalem, and a sensitive man, full of fear, real agony over the suffering he knows is coming his way.

At our parish, we offer eucharistic adoration after the Holy Thursday service, and as the choir softly sings, "Wait with me, watch with me," many people gather to wait and watch long after the liturgy is over. People are genuinely touched by this Jesus who endures this painful expectation bereft of loyalty.

This is prayer at its most basic — the desire to wait and watch with Jesus, just to be with him because we love him. That desire in itself is a prayer.

If we could discipline ourselves to cultivate this desire each day by dedicating even 10 minutes to waiting and watching, how much better our lives would be.

In an effort to improve my own distracted and undisciplined prayer life, I made a four-day retreat this Lent at our local Holy Spirit Center. It is on the hillside, with a chapel that overlooks the city and the ocean, and with a view of the mountains behind it climbing toward the sky.

Moose sometimes have to be shooed away from the conference room door, and on this March weekend snow was still piled high against the first-floor windows.

The retreat leaders were two elderly and very holy Jesuits, both of them over 80, with more than 100 years of ministry between them. I was reminded of something the instructor of a Christian anthropology course told our class: "The Holy Spirit only moves forward."

These two priests were living examples of that. You might find an octogenarian stuck in the past, rooted to some kind of nostalgia for a church that did things differently in his prime.

For the Journey

EFFIE

But not these two. They were alive in the moving and organic Spirit of God.

When one of them, a biblical scholar, told us the Hebrew word "ruah" (meaning "breath" or "wind") that we use for Spirit is actually a feminine word, he proceeded to call the Spirit "she." No political correctness there, just the scholarly acquiescence to nuances our church sometimes forgets to acknowledge.

The best part of the retreat was silence — that thing with which we moderns are so unfamiliar. No computers, no checking e-mail, no catching a phone call or a text. No idle chat at meals.

For a while, we stopped skimming the surface of our lives.

My retreat jump-started my ragged prayer life. It reminded me that I can read all the spiritual writing I want, but if I do not commit to the time of silence — waiting and watching — I am not committed to prayer.

I know how tough it is to get away for a retreat. A houseful of little kids makes it difficult. Teenagers with curfews and full schedules make it tougher. It can be expensive. With so many demands on our lives, sometimes just the desire to flop on the couch for the weekend is overwhelming.

But after my long weekend, I know that I really, really needed this. If I'm going to be awake to watch and wait with Christ, I've got to get a boost along the way.

No simple solutions to fixing Third World woes

In response to Tony Magliano's "During Lent: What would Jesus do?" (March 20), I would like to comment on the moral and ethical aspects of buying low-cost products (and taking advantage of desperately-poor workers) from Third World countries.

Labor rates are based on the availability of labor versus jobs. Third World countries have an abundance of manual labor, but jobs using that labor are scarce — similar to the United States in the 1930s.

There is little a U.S. company can do to affect labor rates in a country other than become a charity paying over the going rate for labor. Ironically this is not good for the labor force of the country because as the product price increases, competitiveness of the country decreases. Jobs move to lower-cost labor, with workers losing even the low paying jobs.

We have seen this in the United States as manufacturing jobs move to machines or to lower labor-cost countries and our workers become unemployed.

The moral question a business must answer when considering the price paid for a product is: Will this purchase improve the living standard of the workers and allow us to stay in business? Forcing the closing of a low-wage operation is not the answer to solving this difficult problem. The only exportable product many countries have is low-cost labor.

The war of the words

Various labels don't change facts when it comes to abortion

There is a war of words against the unborn, and I thought I was pro-life until I heard the "news."

It's amazing how much meaning can be put into a word. In the grand exchange of information, even words often can be more than they seem.

For instance, there is a certain bias in words such as "pro-choice," "anti-abortion" and "anti-choice." Anti-choice — it sounds so mean! I wouldn't want to share my lunch with someone who was "anti-choice." Would you?

But the meaning changes when the word "choice" is applied to, say, school tuition and school choices. Suddenly the exalted word of "choice" has no relevance to the discussion.

According to what I have heard in the news, the same week the "pro-life/anti-choice" march (the 36th annual March for Life) occurred in Washington, D.C., Jan. 22, President Barack Obama signed some new "pro-choice" legislation (a Jan. 23 executive order reversing the Mexico City policy, a move that clears the way for the federal government to provide aid to programs that promote or perform abortions overseas).

It seems we do have some extra money lying around to spend on a war this year against unborn children in other countries. I don't see how this helps stimulate our economy. To me it seems the money could have been better used to help pay off mortgages or shelter the poor than to help murder unborn children, but, then again, my mind has been warped by an overexposure to the word of God.

I recently received an anonymous letter from someone complaining about my homily against abortion. It said "this is America, and we have separation of church and state."

I didn't realize that opposing the killing of unborn children was equivalent to establishing a religious state.

My understanding is that there are members of the Catholic, Jewish, Muslim, Eastern and Protestant religions — as well as some atheists — who are opposed to abortion. So which religion would we be establishing by stopping abortion? I'm not opposed to the separation of church and state; I want separation of murder and state.

Some people say a woman has a "right" to do what she wants with her own body. As far as I know, a woman's body normally does not have two heartbeats, two brains, four eyes, four hands and four feet.

The heartbeat in the womb starts around 21 days after conception. So when abortion stops a beating heart, is it not a human heart?

Kind Herod was the politician in charge of Jesus' town of Bethlehem when Christ was born. Herod seems to be a man who would have had no problem with abortion. Scripture says he "ordered the massacre of all the boys in Bethlehem and its vicinity two years old and under" (Matthew 2:16).

In Revelation, it says "the dragon stood before the woman (Mary) about to give birth, to devour her child when she gave birth. She gave birth to a son, a male child (Jesus) destined to rule all the nations" (Rev. 12:4,5).

It looks like Herod and the dragon were on the same team, but don't let this trouble you — the stories are only words, and we know words can't really hurt anyone, right?

After all, what kind of weapon is a word? And, who could go to war with words?

Certainly not the secular news media. Besides, God's pen is mightier than man's word.

Father Burke is pastor of Immaculate Conception Church in Forest City.

In midst of conflict, church can bring peace, pope says at audience

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Working in areas of conflict and misery, the church has an important duty to be an instrument of peace and reconciliation, Pope Benedict XVI said.

But countries also must recognize the right of their citizens to share in their nation's wealth if there is to be truly lasting peace, he added.

The pope used his April 1 general audience in St. Peter's Square to review his March 17-23 visit to Cameroon and Angola. Even though his first papal trip to the African continent was limited to two nations, the pope said he "ideally wanted to embrace all of the people of Africa and bless them in the name of the Lord."

Today, the church is accompanying a new Africa, which is working "to strengthen its political independence and national identity in a globalized world," he said.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

Today I wish to thank Almighty God for the many blessings which accompanied my first apostolic visit to Africa. I am deeply grateful to the leaders, local authorities and bishops for the warm and enthusiastic welcome they extended to me.

My stay began in Cameroon, where I had the pleasure of meeting various Catholic groups as well as representatives of the Muslim community. I was struck by the profound religious spirit of this nation and the desire of its citizens to live and work together in peace.

My journey then took me to Angola, a country that continues to strive for reconciliation and reconstruction after a long civil war. I encouraged all Angolans to contribute to these tasks, especially by forming the consciences of young people.

I am grateful for the opportunity to have met with seminarians, catechists, women's groups, young people and many others during my sojourn in that country. A particularly significant moment of my visit was the presentation of the "instrumentum laboris" for the second special assembly for Africa of the Synod of Bishops.

As the church prepares for this important meeting dedicated to the theme "The Church in Africa in Service to Reconciliation, Justice and Peace," I ask you all to join me in praying that it will bear abundant fruit among the beloved people of this great continent.

I'll say it in the most direct way possible: Violence is never, ever, ever OK in a real, loving relationship.

On Feb. 8, the 21-year-old pop singer Rihanna — born Robyn Rihanna Fenty — was allegedly beaten by her boyfriend, hip-hop singer Chris Brown, 19. Pictures leaked onto the Internet a few days later show the Barbadian singer, model and former beauty queen with a bruised face, a blackened eye and a bloodied lip.

A mid-February survey by the Boston Public Health Commission found that 49 percent of the 200 Boston teens surveyed said that Rihanna herself was responsible for the beating, and that she'd done something to deserve it.

Nobody deserves to be treated like that — and somehow, teens just aren't getting that message. But the commercial industry did. Many of Brown's ads were suspended, his music was withdrawn from multiple radio stations; he is scheduled for arraignment in April.

According to the U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics, one in three high school students will be involved in an abusive relationship, and 10 percent of girls ages 14 to 17 say they know someone their age who has been hit or beaten by a boyfriend.

Many mistakenly consider that this is what happens in a normal relationship.

Abuse in relationships centers on power and control. But in a true, loving relationship, partners will share power, making decisions that are reflective of honesty, responsibility, trust and support.

In an abusive relationship, though, the abuser will be focused on blame, possessiveness, jealousy and domination.

The first sign of abuse — before that slap across the face — is often extreme jealousy, something that might seem "romantic" at first but soon proves dangerous.

Abusers control the ground rules of the relationship, not letting the other partner have any say. They might get angry when a partner sees or keeps friends outside of the relationship. The abuser often talks down to or puts down a partner before the hitting starts.

Abusers' victims often think they can do nothing to change the situation. But they can! They should speak to a trusted adult, a helpline or a counselor instead of remaining silent.

In a media-saturated world that seems focused on sex and passive, Bella Swan-esque "love at first sight," the most important thing teens can learn about a good relationship is from 1 Corinthians: "Love is patient, love is kind. It is not jealous, (love) is not pompous ... it is not rude, it does not seek its own interests, it is not quick-tempered, it does not brood over injury."

Real love is selfless and focuses on compassion.

If what you're experiencing has any symptoms of severe jealousy or abuse, it isn't love and it isn't romantic — even if it feels like it, even if the butterflies are fluttering in your stomach, and even if your boyfriend or girlfriend swears an offense will never be committed again.

Statistics say it will.

When it was reported that Rihanna accepted Brown's apology, abuse experts became worried because abusers rarely stop the abuse simply because they've apologized. In fact, most apologies from abusers — through words, flowers, begging or assurances — are just power plays to get their victim under their control once more.

I fear for Rihanna and the thousands of girls out there who are just like her.

Don't be part of the 49 percent who think violence is just part of the deal.

It's not.

Stand up for your friends; stand up for real love.

Keeping the faith amid the flood

North Dakota's receding Red River a welcome sight to seminary rector

BY CAROL ZIMMERMANN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — When North Dakota's Red River crested at 40.8 feet instead of an expected 42 feet, Msgr. Gregory Schlesselmann, rector of Cardinal Muench Seminary in Fargo, N.D., breathed a sigh of relief.

But he was hardly about to sit back and relax.

The rector of the seminary, adjacent to the Red River, told Catholic News Service March 30, "We're holding steady at this point, but we're not there yet."

He said the river was gradually receding, but a blizzard was expected to dump 8 to 14 inches of snow on the region by the next day.

"It's a wait-and-see kind of thing," he added, referring to how the dikes would hold out and if the latest batch of snow would increase the river's water level when it melted later in the week.

The wait-and-see approach was similar to what Fargo residents experienced in the days prior to the expected river crest, but they also were frantically busy building walls with sandbags.

Although the river's crest was lower than anticipated, there was still plenty of water at the edge of Fargo and in neighboring Moorhead, Minn., on the river's opposite side.

The flood crest topped the record level set in 1897, when the Red River reached 40.1 feet at Fargo. The river approached that level in 1997 when it reached 39.6 feet.

Fargo and Moorhead residents, helped out by the Army Corps of Engineers, did all they could to keep the Red River from overflowing.

By March 27, the Army Corps of Engineers had finished shoring up a pre-existing dike next to the seminary to about 45 feet. Since then, police officers and members of the National Guard have been constantly patrolling it.

The dike was not only protecting seminary property, but the north side of Fargo.

The college seminary was partially evacuated March 27. Seminarians who remained on the property were pumping water about three times a day; the water resulted from snow melting on the grounds.

Before the expected river rise they were busy helping neighbors fill sandbags and build dikes, assisting at the volunteer call center and helping nursing-home patients move to other locations.

Seven of the seminarians took up temporary residence with Fargo Bishop Samuel J. Aquila while others stayed at nearby parishes. During the weekend of anticipated flooding, Bishop Aquila went to several homes in the Fargo Diocese to bless the sandbag dikes and pray for the town's residents.

Catholic Charities USA set up counseling centers to help Fargo residents cope with the stress of potential floods.

Two deaths and 50 injuries were reported in flood-related incidents in the area. The injured included victims of car wrecks caused by flooded roads.

The Fargo residents who prepared for the worst also have been thanking God for their blessings, said Msgr. Schlesselmann.

At the seminary, those who stayed on the property continued with their normal prayer schedule. The group was joined Sunday by a non-Catholic neighbor who had been the unofficial "neighborhood captain" in the days leading up to the expected flood.

The neighbor, joined by his wife for prayer at the seminary, said his own church services had been canceled and he wanted to join the priests and seminarians to thank God for the town's safety.

Msgr. Schlesselmann said it will take a few weeks before residents can be sure they are past the crisis.

In the meantime, the priest, who has urged people to pray for the intercession of St. Joseph, is leaving two St. Joseph statues in their new location — at the windows overlooking the river — just to keep watch.

N.D. Bishop praises schools, parishes for flood preparations

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Days before the predicted rise of North Dakota's Red River, Bishop Samuel J. Aquila of Fargo said he was already impressed by how Catholics in the diocese were helping people prepare for expected flooding.

When Fargo's Veteran Affairs Medical Center evacuated March 24, the Cathedral of St. Mary of Fargo provided vans to take patients to their temporary quarters in St. Paul, Minn. Students from Fargo's diocesan Catholic schools were among teams of volunteers who spent days sandbagging around the city to prevent flood damage, and Fargo's Catholic Charities employees were preparing for potential food and shelter needs.

"There is a tremendous spirit among the people here," he said, adding the "people are watching out for one another" even while waiting to see how extensive the flood damage could be.

"The unknown is always unsettling, but at same time there is a very real preparedness among the people and the city has done a great job in reaching out to people," he said.

After all the preparations were finished, he noted that the "most important thing of course is prayers and asking for God's protection at this time."

During the week, the bishop had visited sites where residents were sandbagging to let them know the diocese would help in any way it could.

Bishop Edward J. Slattery of Tulsa, Okla., greets 95-year-old Marian E. Baker at a March 19 luncheon of the Diocesan Council of Catholic Women in Tulsa. She has been a parishioner of Immaculate Conception Church in Poteau, Okla., for 74 of her 95 years, and was honored during the luncheon as a Woman of Achievement in the Diocese of Tulsa.

For 74 of her 95 years, Oklahoman has been stalwart of rural parish

TULSA, Okla. (CNS) — There were just seven Catholics when Marian E. Baker began attending Immaculate Conception Church in Poteau, located in a small rural area of southeastern Oklahoma.

A parishioner there for 74 of her 95 years and known as the parish "matriarch," she was honored as a Woman of Achievement in the Diocese of Tulsa.

"Congratulations! God bless you," Bishop Edward J. Slattery of Tulsa told Baker when she came forward to accept her commendation at a recent Diocesan Council of Catholic Women luncheon.

Baker moved to Poteau in 1935 with her late husband, Wilbur, and their 1-year-old son, Kermit, now a physician who accompanied her to the luncheon. She has five grandchildren and 14 great-grandchildren.

Baker quickly started wearing many hats. She became the parish organist — playing for all Sunday Masses, weddings and funerals. In addition, Baker became the choir director and for many years organized the children's choir.

In addition, she became bookkeeper and treasurer for her church and two others. For 50 years she counted collections, made bank deposits and paid bills by hand — until she learned to use a computer.

Over the years Baker helped purchase, prepare and serve the food for all the funeral dinners. During her 74 years of parish service, she has worked with 18 different priests who were fresh out of the seminary.

At age 86, Baker survived colon cancer, getting through surgery and chemotherapy. She slowed down, and at 92 she decided it was time to resign as bookkeeper and treasurer.

Iowa bishops say allowing gay marriage 'will grievously harm families'

AVENPORT, Iowa (CNS) — Iowa's Catholic bishops vigorously disagreed with the Iowa Supreme Court's unanimous decision April 3 that strikes down state law defining marriage as a union of one man and one woman.

"This decision rejects the wisdom of thousands of years of human history. It implements a novel understanding of marriage, which will grievously harm families and children," the bishops said in a statement prepared by the Iowa Catholic Conference.

The bishops vowed to continue to protect and promote marriage as a union between a man and a woman and asked Catholics and other citizens of Iowa to call for a constitutional amendment on marriage.

With the high court's ruling, Iowa becomes the third state in the nation to recognize marriages for gay and lesbian couples, after Massachusetts and Connecticut.

In its 7-0 decision, the court in Des Moines ruled that "limiting civil marriage to a union between a man and a woman violates the Iowa Constitution." The decision further allows gay and lesbian couples full access to the institution of civil marriage.

The ruling resolves an action brought by six same-sex couples who were denied marriage licenses in Polk County because of the 1998 Defense of Marriage Act that defined marriage as a union between a man and a woman.

Iowa's bishops said they "uphold the right of all people to be treated with respect and live in peace. This right, like the right to enter into a permanent, monogamous marriage of one man and one woman, derives directly from the intrinsic dignity of the human person."

Signing the statement were Archbishop Jerome G. Hanus of Dubuque and Bishops R. Walker Nickless of Sioux City, Martin J. Amos of Davenport and Richard E. Pates of Des Moines.

Vatican commends Buddhist community's witness to a spirit of poverty

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In a world of unbridled consumerism and materialism, Christians can find inspiration in the Buddhist witness of happiness in nonattachment to material goods, said the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue.

In a message for the feast of Vesakh, a commemoration of the major events in the life of the Buddha, the Vatican office urged Christians and Buddhists to work together to contribute to the well-being of the world community. The Vatican released the message April 3 as many Buddhist communities were preparing to celebrate Vesakh May 2.

The message said Christian and Buddhist communities are aware of the challenges of "the ever more extensive phenomenon of poverty in its various forms" and "the unbridled pursuit of material possessions and the pervasive shadow of consumerism."

While very different, there are two types of poverty, the message said.

One is a poverty that can be chosen in the form of emptying oneself in order to listen to and be more open to God and other people, the message said.

The other kind of poverty is a material deprivation that "prevents people and families from living as befits their dignity," it said. God does not wish for this latter form of poverty, which also offends justice and equality, and threatens peaceful co-existence, it said.

The Catholic community wishes to thank its Buddhist friends "for your inspiring witness of nonattachment and contentment," said the message.

Buddhist monks, nuns and lay faithful freely embrace a poverty "that spiritually nourishes the human heart, substantially enriching life with a deeper insight into the meaning of existence, and sustaining commitment to promoting the good will of the whole human community," it said.

Knights Templar may have secretly held shroud, Vatican expert says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A Vatican researcher has found evidence that the Knights Templar, the medieval crusading order, held secret custody of the Shroud of Turin during the 13th and 14th centuries.

The shroud, which bears the image of a man and is believed by many to have been the burial cloth of Jesus, was probably used in a secret Templar ritual to underline Christ's humanity in the face of popular heresies of the time, the expert said.

The researcher, Barbara Frale, made the comments in an article published April 5 by the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano.

The article anticipated evidence the author presents in an upcoming book on the Templars and the shroud.

Frale, who works in the Vatican Secret Archives, said documents that came to light during research on the 14th-century trial of the Templars contained a description of a Templar initiation ceremony.

The document recounts how a Templar leader, after guiding a young initiate into a hidden room, "showed him a long linen cloth that bore the impressed figure of a man, and ordered him to worship it, kissing the feet three times," Frale said.

The idea that the Knights Templar were secret custodians of the shroud was put forward by British historian Ian Wilson in 1978. Frale said the account of the initiation ceremony, along with a number of other pieces of evidence, supports that theory.

The shroud's history has long been the subject of debate. It was believed by some to have been in Constantinople, now Istanbul, Turkey, when the city was sacked during the crusades in 1204.

It turned up for public display in France in 1357, and today is kept in the cathedral of Turin, Italy.

The cloth's image, according to some experts, corresponds with that of a man who was scourged and crucified.

Frale said the Knights Templar may have kept the shroud secret because of papal orders of excommunication for anyone involved in looting relics from Constantinople or trafficking in them afterward.

She said the shroud's image was particularly important for the Knights Templar, as an "antidote" to the heresies that had arisen — especially those that affirmed that Christ was a purely spiritual being, and never really had a human body or shed human blood.

Priests renew vows, oils blessed at chrism Mass dedicated service throughout the diocese and asked them to reflect on the promises they made during their ordinations.

"Our renewal of commitment to priestly service during this Mass, takes us back not only to the day of our priesthood ordination, but it also takes us back even further — to the source of our call, to Jesus, to the one who first said to us, 'Come, follow me,'" said Bishop Jugis.

"This Mass is a commitment to Christ Jesus," he said.

During the chrism Mass, the priests recommit themselves to their vocational ministry.

The chrism Mass is one of the Catholic Church's most solemn Masses, celebrated in most Catholic dioceses on Holy Thursday. If celebration of the Mass is not possible on Holy Thursday, it may be celebrated earlier in the week, as it is in the Diocese of Charlotte.

During the Mass, the bishop blesses the oils to be used in administering the sacraments of baptism, confirmation and anointing of the sick throughout the diocese in the upcoming year.

Bishop Jugis celebrated the Mass along with concelebrants Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor; Father John Putnam, judicial vicar; Benedictine Abbot Placid Solari of Belmont Abbey; and other clergy of the diocese.

Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin was in attendance and Father Christopher Roux, rector of St. Patrick Cathedral, served as master of ceremonies.

Permanent deacons assisted and seminarians of the diocese served as altar servers.

The recommitment ceremony, which followed the Liturgy of the Word, included the priests' renewal of their dedication as faithful ministers of Christ.

Priests and deacons gather around Bishop Peter J. Jugis during the eucharistic prayer at the chrism Mass at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte April 7.

Following the liturgy of the Eucharist, Bishop Jugis blessed the three oils used in sacramental and liturgical practices.

Vials of the oils are dispensed to every parish and mission church in the diocese. With the sacred oils — and having recommitted themselves to the mission they share with their bishop — the priests return to their parishes, rededicated in spiritual union with the people of the diocese.

DID YOU KNOW?

The sacramental use of oil is rooted in the Old Testament practice of anointing kings. The Hebrew word Mashiach, or "Messiah," means, "anointed one." Its New Testament Greek equivalent is Christos, or "Christ." As Jesus Christ was anointed with the Holy Spirit, so are Christians anointed with the same spirit through the use of holy oils.

the different circumstances that brought them to this point.

The searcher

For a long time, David Viola was a man on a mission.

He spent years experimenting with different fundamentalist and non-denominational religions. But he couldn't find what he was looking for.

"I wanted a venue where I could properly worship the Lord with a body of believers who were like-minded," Viola said.

He was looking for a faith that was rooted in tradition.

"The Baptists had no traditions," said Viola. "The Anglicans and Lutherans got away from tradition."

Then he found a faith that was rooted in history.

"The Catholic Church has held together for 2,000 years," he said. "Tradition helps keep the church together."

Growing up a fundamentalist, Viola was taught that "everything the Catholics believe is dead wrong."

"I had to do a lot of praying before I could even consider coming into the Catholic Church," he said.

But when he and his wife, Laura, who also is entering the church at Easter, first stepped into the Abbey Basilica of Mary Help of Christians in Belmont, they knew they were finally home.

"As soon as we walked in we knew that was where we belonged," Viola said.

"The reality of the Eucharist was important for them," said Father Cancro, pastor of Queen of the Apostles Church. "For them that was really a starting point in terms of their own exploration of Catholicism."

The Violas enrolled in Rite of Christian Initiation (RCIA) at Queen of the Apostles Church.

For David Viola, the decision to convert was reinforced during the Rite of Election.

"As soon as I put my name in the "Everything that I see in the Catholic Church points to Christ."

— David Viola

book, I just knew that this was the thing to do," he said.

The Rite of Election marks the beginning of the candidates' and catechumens' final, and most intense, period of preparation.

Catechumens, people not yet baptized, are preparing to receive the sacraments of initiation — baptism, confirmation and first Communion. Candidates, who are already baptized Christians, will enter full communion with the church by receiving confirmation and first Communion.

"Everything that I see in the Catholic Church points to Christ," said Viola. "The tradition and the Word and the way they are combined — it just creates worship."

The scholar

For Dr. Beth Kreitzer, the journey to Catholicism was one of intellectual discovery.

A professor at Belmont Abbey College, Kreitzer earned a doctorate in religion in the field of Lutheran studies.

"To make the switch at this stage of my life is actually a bit of a challenge in some ways," said Kreitzer, who studied the Protestant Reformation and did her dissertation on Martin Luther.

When she first started considering a conversion, she thought about the impact it would have on her studies and her career.

"It was something that I've had to keep in mind," she said.

Fortunately, she teaches at a Catholic college.

At Belmont Abbey "they won't mind if I'm Catholic," she joked.

Kreitzer was initially drawn to Catholicism because she wanted to practice the same religion as her family.

Her husband is Catholic and their three children were all baptized in the Catholic Church.

"For me it was more of a feeling that I wanted to be all together in one church with my family," she said.

With such an extensive background in religion, Kreitzer has approached her conversion on a scholarly level.

"I had to try to discern whether I could, in good conscience, become a Catholic and accept the things that are different from the tradition in which I was raised," she said.

"I think I'm looking for something different than a lot of people are. I'm trying to figure out theological points, more than spirituality or to gain some form of formation," she said.

"It's clear that someone like Beth is in a very different place theologically than some of the others," said Father Cancro.

"To be willing to move from her educationally-solid, theological understanding to now respond to the heart is a testament to the witness of her family and her own life of prayer," he said.

Like Viola, Kreitzer also appreciates the history and traditions of the Catholic Church, particularly the devotion to the saints.

"I think one of the things that I appreciate about the Catholic tradition as opposed to the Protestant tradition is the appreciation and accommodation to the saints," said Kreitzer.

"It really adds an extra dimension to religious practice," she said, and it is "something that I certainly didn't find as a Lutheran."

Common ground

"Every year I am always edified by the witness of these people who come to a point where it's clear that they have to say 'yes' to God," Father Cancro said about the candidates and catechumens.

He said he also admires their "willingness to change in a world that doesn't really accept change easily."

He appreciates the unique perspective that each individual brings to the RCIA program and he admires the respect that they have for one another.

Despite their varying religious backgrounds "they seem to accommodate each other," said Father Cancro.

"Diversity is the tie" and there is "always that notion of patience," he said. "My basic premise and the basic premise of the church is that this is the work of the Holy Spirit."

Those preparing to be received into full communion with the Catholic Church and their sponsors stand during the Rite of Election at St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro March 8. The service formally acknowledges those who are preparing to receive the sacraments of initiation — baptism, confirmation and the Eucharist — at the Easter Vigil. As many as 150,000 new or returning Catholics are expected to join the U.S. Catholic Church at Easter.

'From darkness into light'

Thousands of new or returning Catholics to join church in U.S. in 2009

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — As many as 150,000 new or returning Catholics are expected to join the Catholic Church in 2009 in the United States. Many of them will do so during the Easter Vigil April 11 in parishes across the country.

Only partial figures from a sample of U.S. dioceses were available so far for 2009, according to a March 31 news release from the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops. The numbers do not include infant baptisms, which are recorded separately.

The number of new Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte this year is not expected to be available until June. In other areas, the numbers of new or returning Catholics show growth in the church in places where it has traditionally been a minority, such as Georgia.

The Archdiocese of Atlanta estimated that 513 catechumens and 2,195 candidates will join the ranks of the archdiocese in 2009. About 1,800 of them will do so at Easter.

Catechumens, or people not yet baptized, receive the sacraments of initiation — baptism, confirmation and first Communion. Candidates, who are already baptized Christians, enter full communion with the church by receiving confirmation and first Communion.

"The Archdiocese of Atlanta is in a part of the country with a large non-Catholic population, and has been blessed with an authentic dynamism during recent years, which is perhaps best expressed in our annual eucharistic congress, which draws some 30,000 participants," said Father Theodore Book, director of the archdiocesan Office of Divine Worship.

"One of the many blessings that we have received from the Lord is the large number of individuals entering the church," he said in a statement.

On the opposite side of the country the Archdiocese of Seattle planned to welcome 736 catechumens and 506 candidates for a total of 1,242 new members; and the Diocese of San Diego expected to baptize 305 new members and welcome 920 other baptized Christians, adding a total of 1,225 to its ranks.

In the mostly rural Diocese of Birmingham, Ala., the Cathedral of St. Paul could not handle all who are joining, 445 people in total, and their families for the Rite of Election.

The rites were held in three different ceremonies, two at the cathedral on the first Sunday of Lent, and another one in Huntsville, Ala., the prior Saturday. Some people came from as far as 80 miles away to participate.

The Rite of Election, usually celebrated at the beginning of Lent, marks the official countdown to initiation or admission into the church.

Baptism also will have a special significance this year for Heidi Sierras of Ceres, near Modesto, Calif., along with her family, church sponsors and parish community.

Sierras will be in a group of five people — representing different areas of the world — who will be baptized by Pope Benedict XVI April 11. The 29-year-old mother of four will represent North America.

"It's hard to put into words how I feel," Sierras told Catholic News Service in a March 2 telephone interview from her home in Ceres. "I feel honored. It's an amazing opportunity."

Around the country parishes in dioceses big and small, urban and rural, were preparing for the special Easter liturgies filled with symbolism that will lead the "neophytes," or the newly baptized, those received into full communion, their new faith community and the entire church "from darkness into light."

In 2008, according to the Official Catholic Directory, 49,415 adults were baptized and 87,363 people came into full communion with the church. In 2007, those numbers were 62,464 and 92,975, respectively.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, according to the diocesan Office of Faith Formation a total of 911 catechumens and candidates were initiated into the church in 2008. In 2007, the combined number was 914.

Hunger haunts Haiti

"Feed My sheep."

(John 21:17b)

Just as Jesus commanded His disciples to care for others, today we are asked to do the same.

Christ's words take on an extra sense of urgency as global food shortages and an economic crisis threaten the survival of countless people worldwide.

In Haiti, the poorest country in our hemisphere, food shortages have reached epic proportions. Four major storms battered Haiti last fall, taking lives, destroying homes and ruining crops. Rebuilding and replanting will take time, but the need for food is immediate.

Hungry Haitian families desperately need your help.

Elanie Losange, a mother of two boys, ages 4 and 2, describes the flood that washed away her home and all of their meager belongings: "The water was waist-high, so I grabbed the two boys and ran up the mountain," she says. Elanie, her husband and their children escaped with their lives, but they returned to find total devastation. Their house was gone. The crops and fruit trees they relied on for food and income were washed away. Now they have nothing.

Despite the family's tragic losses, their faith remains. Elanie says, "I was praying. I'm always praying. Now I pray for food from God. I thank God for protecting us and keeping my children safe. We don't have much, but we still thank God."

Elanie and her husband, Vedzu, have replanted their crops, but they estimate it will take at least a year before they can harvest. The fruit trees will take longer to bear fruit. Elanie is expecting her third child, and she is terrified that she won't be able to feed her baby.

This family is just one example of the many people in Haiti who are struggling to survive. Father Duken Augustin, a local priest, works tirelessly to help needy families like Elanie's. He relies on Food For The Poor for help, and we, in turn, rely on people like you for support.

Founded in 1982, Food For The Poor is an interdenominational ministry working to end the suffering of the poor in the Caribbean and Latin America. Not only do we provide food for the starving, but we also build small houses for the destitute, dig water wells for parched villagers, provide medicine and medical equipment for the sick and elderly, support orphanages and education for children, and much more.

The people of Haiti have suffered greatly this last year. They are hungry, weary and afraid that the world will forget them. Today, you can honor and serve Christ by helping to feed our brothers and sisters in need.

By partnering with Food For The Poor, you can provide lifesaving food for hungry children and their families. Your gift of $45 will feed 15 children for a month. A gift of $81 will feed 27 young ones, and $150 will feed 50 children for a month. Any gift you give will be truly appreciated.

Please, be as generous as you possibly can and help Food For The Poor feed precious children. Please use the postage-paid envelope in the brochure located in this publication to send your gift today.

"Amen, I say to you, whatever you did for one of these least brothers of Mine, you did for Me."
(Matthew 25:40b)

Father Duken Augustin has dedicated his life to serving the poorest of the poor in northern Haiti. After the storms passed last fall, Father Duken said, "We work hard to help people have a better life. It takes a lot of faith. The situation [here] was hard before, but now people are discouraged. Some of the children are in a very bad condition."

Food For The Poor works directly with clergy throughout the Caribbean and Latin America to help them serve impoverished communities.

A gift that will save lives

Food shortages and rising prices are devastating for the poorest of the poor in Haiti. The price of rice and beans has more than doubled in the past year; yet many in this poverty-stricken country earn less than $2 a day. The struggle for survival has become increasingly difficult, and lives are at stake.

Today you have the chance to save a life. Please use the Food For The Poor brochure enclosed in this publication to send your gift today. God bless you.

Polish woman writes book detailing close friendship with late pope

OXFORD, England (CNS) — A Polish psychiatrist has published a book of letters and reflections detailing her close, lifelong friendship with Pope John Paul II.

"The Holy Father asked me to publish these notes and meditations as a testimony that each person possesses a spirit which has to develop," said Wanda Poltawska, who was friends with Pope John Paul from his first years as a priest until his death April 2, 2005.

"He was a person with a sense of humor, who was ready to talk and listen to everyone. As soon as I met him, I knew he was a holy person who could not conceal his sanctity," she said at the recent release in Poland of her book, "Beskid Retreats."

Poltawska, 87, said Pope John Paul had approved most of the material and asked her to write the book in the 1990s. She said she still had a "suitcase of letters" from the late pope that will not be released until after her own death.

"When his death was expected, I asked the Holy Father if I should burn these notes and he replied, 'That would be a shame,'" she said.

Poltawska, who studied medicine after surviving the Ravensbruck and Neustadt-Gleve Nazi concentration camps in Germany, got to know the then-Father Karol Wojtyla after he heard her confession in Krakow, Poland.

They later worked together on problems associated with abortion and contraception.

She accompanied the future pontiff on hiking and camping trips, kept him supplied with medicine and vitamins, and corresponded with him on spiritual and religious topics.

When Poltawska, at the time a mother of four young children, was diagnosed with cancer in 1962, then-Bishop Wojtyla sent a request for prayers to Padre Pio and wrote again to thank him when she recovered.

Pope John Paul canonized Padre Pio in 2002.

In numerous letters, affectionately signed "Brat," the Polish word for brother, the future pontiff thanked Poltawska for her reflections. He kept her informed of his spiritual development and credited her with nurturing his own thought on family values and the "theology of the body."

As a cardinal, he continued to exchange letters containing prayers and meditations with Poltawska.

One time during a vacation in the mountains in August 1978, he recounted to her over breakfast that he had dreamed he saw the late Pope Paul VI "beckoning to me." Two months later, after his election as pope, he told Poltawska he wanted to declare her his "personal expert" on birth control, raising children and pastoral medicine.

"You have followed my priesthood step by step and participated for so many years in uncovering its meanings and values," Pope John Paul wrote to her.

In addition to directing the Family Theology Institute at Krakow University, Poltawska lectured at the John Paul II Institute at the Pontifical Lateran University in Rome.

She and her husband, Andrzej, became members of a new Pontifical Council for the Family in 1983. Poltawska also joined the Pontifical Academy for Life and worked with the Pontifical Council for Health Care Ministry.

For the pope, she wrote descriptions, now "closed up in the Vatican," of the hills and valleys of his native southern Poland, and took family members on vacation to the papal villa outside Rome at Castel Gandolfo.

Photos in the book show Poltawska's grandchildren paddling with plastic boats in a Castel Gandolfo fountain, and the pope relaxing over tea with his clerical collar undone.

In the final pages of the book, Poltawska describes how she read to the dying pope at his bedside, and she listed the books as "The Robe," by the Rev. Lloyd C. Douglas, an American Lutheran minister, "Pan Tadeusz" by Adam Mickiewicz and parts of Pope John Paul's own "Memory and Identity."

The pope died, Poltawska says, when she was on the final page of "The Free City" by Polish writer Mieczyslaw Jaluwiecki.

In a foreword, the president of the Polish bishops' conference, Archbishop Jozef Michalik of Przemyśl, described the book as a "singular diary of the soul."

The book contains unique insights into the late pope's religious life and work as a spiritual guide, he said.

God's mercy endures, sustains us forever

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Mary Faustina lived a life of simplicity as a member of the Congregation of the Sisters of Our Lady of Mercy.

She joined them in 1925 at the age of 19 and spent her life working as a cook, gardener and porter in three of their houses. She died just 13 years later from tuberculosis.

It is in the life of this humble servant of the Lord where we find the foundation for Divine Mercy Sunday.

Faustina regularly received visions that she recorded in a journal. One was a vision of Jesus with two lights emanating from his heart.

She explained that these lights represent the water and blood that flowed from Jesus on the cross and are emblematic of God's endless mercy for us pouring from his heart.

The mercy of God flows to us all. For my wife and me it was never more needed than when we experienced six miscarriages.

Early in our marriage we went through three excruciating years of trying to sustain a pregnancy. We did all we could, but in the end it was determined that we would not be able to bring a child to full term.

My faith had carried me through a lot, but this seemed too much. I wondered if God cared, doubted his existence and was angry that my faithfulness to him was not being returned.

But in spite of my misgivings, through it all I felt the mercy of God carrying me, as in the scene described by the inspirational piece "Footprints in the Sand." In my darkest hour I no longer was walking beside Jesus; I was being carried by him.

The psalmist exhorts us: "Let those who fear the Lord say, 'His mercy endures forever.'"

We are not called to say "I understand all that the Lord does" or "Because I love the Lord no hard times will befall me." Rather, we are reminded that the mercy of God endures and in fact carries us forever.

On Divine Mercy Sunday we remember that no matter what we face there is one thing that can sustain us — the mercy of God flowing from the heart of Jesus. St. Faustina, pray for us.

Questions:

How would you describe the mercy of God? Was there a time in your life when you felt that Jesus was carrying you?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Let those who fear the Lord say, 'His mercy endures forever'" (Psalm 118:4).

Jingle writers say their 'Rosary Tapes' encourage hope, prayer

BY JACKIE TAYLOR
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Jingle writers John Giaier and Bill Gildenstern have put a new spin on the rosary by combining the traditional mysteries and meditations with contemporary music.

Their product is called the "Rosary Tapes," made up of four compact discs, one for each of the rosary's four sets of mysteries.

"When Bill came up with the idea, at the time I thought he was kind of nutty," Giaier said, joking.

To change Giaier's mind, Gildenstern and his wife, Kelly, put together a sample to the tune of "Silent Night" for Giaier's wife, Debbie.

Her tearful reaction was all it took for Giaier to agree to the rosary project.

Longtime friends and co-owners of a Michigan-based advertising agency, Catholics Giaier and Gildenstern are best known for producing the Ford Motor Co.'s famous jingle "Have you driven a Ford lately?"

The duo has produced more than 6,000 jingles in the past 40 years.

Giaier said the "Rosary Tapes" project has been a "real labor of love" over the years. They have controlled much of the production and distribution of the "Rosary Tapes" within their company.

Gildenstern, the lyricist of the collection, created meditation concepts for each piece. He consulted Catholic clergy as well as clergy from other Christian denominations to ensure the messages of his songs were accurate.

"The songs come right from the Bible and tell a story. It's the actual rosary with the Our Fathers, Hail Marys and meditations. It's inspirational and makes you think," Giaier told Catholic News Service.

Giaier composed and arranged the music with Gildenstern in their own studio. He also provided male vocals on the albums. The outcome was a blend of rock, jazz, blues, country and pop music.

The songs were purposely created to have "staying power" across a wide demographic, said Gildenstern.

"We tried to blend the music so that listeners would never go past a track or two before hearing one of their favorite songs," Gildenstern said.

Since the "Rosary Tapes" project began in the early 1990s, Gildenstern and Giaier have sold about 50,000 sets of the four CDs. Songs from the Grammy-nominated album, "The Joyful Mysteries," which focus on Jesus' birth,

The CD has had more than 2 million downloads.

The four CDs are titled after the joyful, sorrowful, glorious and luminous mysteries of the rosary. Pope John Paul II added the luminous mysteries, or the mysteries of light, in 2002.

During his pontificate, Giaier and Gildenstern received a letter sent on the pope's behalf thanking them for their work on the rosary CDs.

They also have received an apostolic blessing from Pope Benedict XVI.

Gildenstern and Giaier hope the "Rosary Tapes" will encourage people of all Christian denominations to pray more often.

"I'm trying to sell the rosary. To me, it's the perfect prayer," Gildenstern told CNS.

"It's a Christian prayer, not just a Catholic prayer. We want you to be whatever you want to be to be comfortable with Jesus," he added.

Gildenstern suggested prayer as a way to find comfort during these tough economic times.

"It really goes past the 'Rosary Tapes.' It's all about hope," Gildenstern said.

"We have to work to overcome our problems. We have to put our hands to the plow, but in the same token, we've got to be praying like crazy," he said.

"If we don't pray, it'll just be a mess," he added.

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

For the month of April, here is a brief history of the Catholic Daughters of America and its service to the Diocese of Charlotte.

ARCHIVES PHOTO

Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin is pictured with members of the Catholic Daughters of America in Charlotte in April 1994. Bishop Curlin was one of three North Carolina bishops to serve as national chaplain of the Catholic Daughters.

Founded in 1903 and originally named National Order of Daughters of Isabella, Catholic Daughters of the Americas (CDA) is one of the oldest and largest national organizations of Catholic women in the world.

Located in 45 states as well as Mexico, Guam, Dominican Republic, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, CDA has 95,000 members with 1,400 local chapters, or courts.

The motto of the CDA is "Unity and Charity," and its members are active in the church and community.

Catholic Daughters are especially noted for their effective fundraising, assistance with charities and zealous support of priests and seminarians.

The first project of CDA Court Charlotte was sponsoring an Altar Society to care for the altar at St. Peter Church (at that time the only Catholic church in Charlotte).

Since then, CDA has engaged in various other projects in the Charlotte area throughout the years, such as sewing vestments, altar linens and hospital gowns.

CDA also rolled bandages for the Red Cross during World War II, made blankets for Holy Angels nursery in Belmont and hosted receptions for priests after their ordination Masses.

CDA still sponsors Priest Appreciation days and is actively involved in the pro-life movement.

Three North Carolina bishops have served as national chaplain to CDA: Bishop William J. Hafey from 1925-1947, Bishop Vincent S. Waters from 1947-1966 and Bishop William G. Curlin from 1990-1994.

Additionally, Bishop Hafey is credited with the establishment of the Junior Catholic Daughters of America (JCDA) in 1926.

Three North Carolina Catholic Daughters have been CDA national directors: Ruth Carlisle of Court Charlotte, Maureen Daughtry of Court Durham and Maryann Grabasky of Court Greensboro, who was elected just recently.

Presently, there are seven courts in the Diocese of Charlotte:

Court Asheville 412 – Established May 21, 1920

Court Charlotte 1199 – Established March 30, 1933

Court Greensboro 1200 – Established March 31, 1933

Court Sacred Heart, Salisbury 1759 – Established Sept. 15, 1957

Court St. Joan of Arc, Asheville 2471 – Established March 4, 2000

Court St. Mary Mother of God, Sylva 2534 – Established June 27, 2004

Court St. Philip the Apostle, Greensboro 2593 – Established Sept. 15, 2007

NOTABLE MOMENTS:

1927: Court Asheville hosts national CDA convention.

May 9, 1933: First regular meeting of Court Charlotte following its establishment. Some of the first motions carried include: all Court Charlotte members to "receive communion in a body on the second Sunday of the month"; designated pews in church will be marked "reserved" for Catholic Daughters.

Sept. 1, 1934: CDA sponsor weekend retreat for lay women at Sacred Heart Convent in Belmont. Forty women, including three non-Catholics, attend the retreat.

World War II period: Court Charlotte provides support and food for soldiers stationed at Morris Field Air Base in Charlotte — including Catholic books and maintaining of a lounge for soldiers on base. CDA sponsors dances for soldiers at O'Donoghue School and one morning served breakfast to 100 soldiers following their reception of holy Communion.

1950: Court Asheville hosts its second national CDA convention.

1955: North Carolina becomes a state court.

May 1960: North Carolina CDA attends state convention in Winston-Salem and vote on a resolution opposing federal aid to education because it would only support children attending public schools.

CDA votes also on a resolution recommending that President Eisenhower assemble a national conference to examine the problem of public sales of indecent literature and find ways to counteract the loss of values among youth.

March 8, 2008: Court Charlotte celebrates 75 years of service with a Mass offered by court chaplain, Msgr. Mauricio W. West, chancellor and vicar general of the Diocese of Charlotte.

Number of births to unwed mothers on rise in U.S.

According to the report, issued in late March by the National Center for Health Statistics, 4.3 million babies were born in 2007 — more than in any other single year in U.S. history. The number of births to unwed mothers reached its highest level at more than 1.7 million. Although 25 percent of these births were to teen mothers, the rest were to women in their 20s through their 40s.

The data reflects an overall trend and something society has come to accept more than it did in previous generations, said S. Philip Morgan, a sociology professor and fertility researcher at Duke University in Durham, N.C. Morgan told Catholic News Service April 1 that the rise in the number of unwed mothers has occurred for several reasons.

For starters, he said the "shotgun wedding solution to a premarital pregnancy" is no longer seen as necessary or something that leads to a lasting marriage. He also said the debate about abortion has "changed the social stigma" of having a child out of wedlock.

"Young pregnant women can carry their babies with pride in a way they couldn't in the '50s and '60s," he said.

Morgan said the pro-life movement in particular has emphasized that it "shows strength, courage and valor to have a baby." Another factor is that "women have dramatically postponed" marriage until later in life or have ruled it out altogether, he said.

In the face of these trends, the Catholic Church offers a countermesssage, urging people to see and value the link between marriage and parenthood.

John Grabowski, associate professor of moral theology at The Catholic University of America in Washington, said the church stresses this connection based on natural law and Scripture.

But in recent years, he said, this view also has been supported by studies from social scientists demonstrating that "children are much happier and much better cared for in a stable marriage."

But clearly not everyone is buying the message, in part because it gets "a lot of competition from today's culture," Grabowski said.

He said the church's teachings on marriage are prevalent in the writings of Pope John Paul II and can be found in parts of the U.S. bishops' National Pastoral Initiative for Marriage.

Mary Jo Pedersen, former family ministries specialist at the Family Life Office in the Archdiocese of Omaha, Neb., said the bishops' marriage initiative and diocesan family life programs are key ways the church is stressing the value of married life.

Pedersen said the church walks a fine line pastorally when it highlights the role of married couples in shaping children while also addressing the many contributions of single parents.

The bishops similarly addressed this issue in their 1991 pastoral, "Putting Children and Families First: A Challenge for Our Church, Nation and World."

"We support and applaud the often heroic efforts of single-parent families," they wrote in the statement, adding: "We also emphasize the value of parents staying together and sacrificing to raise children. Children generally do best when they have the love and support — personal and material — of both their parents."

Pederson is convinced that married couples teach children about God just by their daily example of loving each other and showing forgiveness and commitment.

"Without doing anything extra," she said, "parents' lived example teaches children of God's faithful love ... which is why the church says marriage is the best way to form children in the image and likeness of God."

Sainthood soon?

For Pope John Paul II, beatification process may be on final lap

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — They brought flowers and messages to his grave. They sang songs evoking his memory. And they prayed for his beatification.

The fourth anniversary of the death of Pope John Paul II April 2 was marked by a sense of anticipation following reports that the late pontiff would be beatified on the fifth anniversary next year.

The Vatican has played down those rumors. But among the thousands who flocked to his tomb and gathered in St. Peter's Basilica for a memorial Mass, the feeling was strongly hopeful.

"There's all kinds of talk about him being beatified. It's only a matter of time before it happens. He's heading so fast toward sainthood that they're only waiting to give him a little bit more legitimacy, I guess," said Samantha Coveleski, 22, of Lewes, Del.

Coveleski was among hundreds of people who jammed the crypt area of St. Peter's Basilica April 2 to pay their respects at Pope John Paul II's tomb. They left candles, photos and letters, and murmured prayers in many languages.

On the white marble tombstone lay three red roses.

"So many people loved this guy so much. When you're at the tomb you can really see what the big deal is," Coveleski said. "He was so accessible during his papacy, and here you can really see and feel how much he was loved."

Pope Benedict XVI celebrated the commemorative Mass and said he was praying for "the gift of beatification" for his predecessor. In 2005, Pope Benedict set Pope John Paul on the fast track to beatification by waiving the normal five-year waiting period for the introduction of his sainthood cause.

That seemed to respond to the "Santo subito!" ("Sainthood now!") banners that were held aloft at Pope John Paul's funeral.

The initial diocesan phase of the cause was completed in April 2007.

Last November a team of theological consultants to the Congregation for Saints' Causes began studying the 2,000-page "positio," the document that makes the case for beatification, according to Archbishop Angelo Amato, head of the congregation.

Archbishop Amato told Vatican Radio that once the theological study of the "positio" is completed, the cause will be considered by the cardinal and bishop members of the congregation.

If approved, it will then go to the pope for a final decision on a decree of "venerability," which means the person lived the Christian virtues heroically.

Meanwhile, a presumed miracle through the intercession of the late pope — involving a French nun said to have been cured of Parkinson's disease — is being studied in a five-step process that involves medical experts, a medical board, theological consultants, the members of the congregation and, finally, the pope.

With the decree of venerability and a confirmed miracle, beatification can take place.

Archbishop Amato emphasized that the Vatican could not promise a timetable for all this. The fact that the Vatican is expediting the cause doesn't mean "haste or superficiality," but on the contrary demands methodical attention to detail, he said.

Five years from death to beatification may not strike people as "subito," but it would be a modern record in the church; even for Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta, who was described by many as a "living saint" and for whom the waiting period was also waived, it took six years to complete the process.

Polish Cardinal Stanislaw Dziwisz of Krakow, personal secretary to the late pope and one of his biggest beatification boosters, was in Rome for the fourth anniversary. He told reporters that a presumed miracle had recently occurred at Pope John Paul II's tomb in St. Peter's Basilica.

A nine year-old Polish boy from Gdansk, suffering from cancer of the kidneys and unable to walk, was brought to the tomb by his parents, Cardinal Dziwisz said. When they left St. Peter's, the boy told them, "I want to walk," and began walking in good health, he said.

Vatican officials are not publicizing what are said to be 251 "inexplicable" healings or other events attributed to Pope John Paul II's intercession, and which have been filed away.

Like Archbishop Amato, the officials emphasize the seriousness of the study being undertaken and insist there are no foregone conclusions.

April 5 celebration of World Youth Day as they remembered Pope John Paul.

At the end of the Mass, young people carrying oil lamps led Pope Benedict into the grotto of St. Peter's Basilica, where they all knelt and prayed at the tomb of Pope John Paul.

During his homily, Pope Benedict said the torch of faith and hope was what Pope John Paul "left us as a heritage."

"He consigned it to me, as his successor, and this evening I pass it on once again to you, the young people of Rome, so that you would continue to be sentinels of the morning, vigilant and joyful," said Pope Benedict.

Throughout his life Pope John Paul did not hesitate using all his energy to spread the light (of Christ) everywhere," the pope said. "He was not willing to compromise when it came to proclaiming and defending Christ's truth. He never tired of spreading his love."

The fruitfulness of Pope John Paul's life and ministry, he said, is seen in the faces of the young men and women who crowded into St. Peter's Basilica for the anniversary Mass.

"How many vocations to the priesthood and consecrated life, how many young families committed to living the Gospel ideal and aiming for holiness are tied to the witness and preaching of my venerated predecessor," the pope said.

"How many young men and women converted or persevered in their Christian journey thanks to his prayers, his encouragement, his support and his example," Pope Benedict said.

"At the hour of his agony and death, this new generation wanted to show him they understood his teaching by gathering silently in prayer in St. Peter's Square and many other places throughout the world," the pope said.

While Pope Benedict did not make any mention of the process to beatify and canonize Pope John Paul, he did end his homily by praying that the late pope "never ceases to accompany us and intercede for us from heaven."

After praying in the grotto and before leaving St. Peter's, Pope Benedict stopped to greet Angelo Gugel, Pope John Paul's Vatican valet, and the Handmaids of the Sacred Heart Sisters from Poland who ran the papal apartment and cared for Pope John Paul during his final illness.

For ongoing dialogue

Inquiring into the science and morality of life at the moment of resurrection

Robert George, a government professor at Princeton University, and I have had an ongoing dialogue on stem cell research.

Both of us, as Catholics, have faith-based reservations about President Barack Obama's recent lifting of restrictions on federal funding for research on new stem cell lines.

We recognize that, as Cardinal Justin Rigali and Bishop William E. Lori have personally instructed Vice President Joseph Biden, the Catholic answer to when life begins is said to be both "a matter of objective [biological or scientific] fact" and a "moral" conclusion dependent upon a principle of "natural law accessible to people of good will."

As such, the embryo and the human adult are entitled to the same "inalienable rights bestowed by the Creator."

In essence, our faith makes a scientific claim and a moral one.

But then, why do President Obama and other intelligent, non-Catholic people disagree?

To closely examine the source of that disagreement, and to know better whether the church's answer to the life question is based more in science or theology/philosophy or evenly in both, we are continuing our helpful conversation.

We are also inviting comments from everyone interested in this subject.

Responses may be sent to faithprecedent@gmail.com.

It is always a pleasure for me to engage in discussion with George because of his great knowledge and even greater courtesy.

And I ask anyone responding to this request to observe the same ethic.

Far too often it seems as if we Catholics are drawn into boxing matches with each other, whether it be over the proper scope of medical research or who Notre Dame should ask to its graduations.

Instead, we propose to continue this inquiry, slow to judge and answering in love.

When does life begin such that no governmental or legal system could be called "just" if it failed to accord full legal recognition and protection to that life?

The pro-life office of the bishops has compiled a very useful list of statements from scientists that identifies fertilization as the point when life begins (www.usccb.org/prolife/issues/bioethic/fact298.shtml).

Then too there are distinguished scientists who often qualify the answer.

For example, the director of the Faith & Precedent

DOUGLAS W. KMIEC
CNS COLUMNIST

Centre of Medical Law and Ethics at King's College London notes that some scientists say 14 days, since that is when the primitive streak, the precursor of the nervous system, emerges.

Other scientists rely on this later point because, prior to it, twinning or triplets are possible.

Still other men and women of science ask why either the nervous system or the number of embryos is relevant since neither relates to consciousness.

But then, why does consciousness matter? We wouldn't unplug Uncle Harry's respirator just because he is in a transient coma, would we?

There would not seem any escape from the theological or philosophical aspect of the answer.

If so, have scientists only picked a point later than fertilization to facilitate their own work, specifying the 14-day line as a political compromise to avoid unspeakable research on late-stage embryos?

(Remember, in science the embryo stage lasts through 8 weeks.)

By the same token, is it right for some scientists to claim that "the question over experimenting with embryos is not about whether they are (within the human species) or not?"

"That's not what matters. What matters is being a person with rights and interests," and that is not a scientific question.

What happens when everyone from scientists to presidents to Presbyterians are not on the same page as Catholics on this?

Is it enough to proclaim, as our church teaching does, that "those who hold a narrower and more exclusionary view have the burden of explaining why"?

But we submit there is, in this Easter season, a need for humility and charity in the evaluation of the answers submitted.

In that spirit, we look forward to reading your helpful responses at faithprecedent@gmail.com.

We must embrace a youthful thirst for justice

Church has duty to couple passion for justice with encounters with Christ

Too often, new reports document the waning religious interest of young adults.

And while there is ample reason to worry about the graying of the church, particularly in Europe and North America, there is also cause for hope.

One element of Catholic faith that still profoundly resonates with young adults is helping the poor.

A major report on young adult Catholics, from 2007, found that 78 percent of those ages 18-39 believe that charitable efforts toward helping the poor are essential to their faith.

It's no secret that passion to change the world has long been a strength of young adults.

Just ask the Peace Corps, Doctors Without Borders and countless mission and outreach organizations across the globe.

It seems that each new generation burns with a special thirst for justice.

At the same time, young adult Catholics of our own time are far less likely to attend weekly Mass or become registered with a local parish, according to a 2008 report by the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate at Georgetown University in Washington.

This has left dioceses across the nation wrestling with how to connect a whole generation to the life of the church.

The Jesuit Volunteer Corps and Dominican Father Francis Hung Le's annual medical mission trip to impoverished countries might offer some clues on how to invite young adults into the profound work of the church — work that changes both the world and the individuals who labor for justice.

A group of local Jesuit volunteers works in Anchorage at places like the Beans Cafe soup kitchen and the Red Cross.

This band of eight young adults lives together in Christian community and upholds spirituality as a foundational tenet of their mission.

Studies of former Jesuit volunteers find that they are more likely to attend Mass and stay married later on in life.

This is social justice with a spiritual bedrock.

Similarly, Father Le's mission trips are another shining example of pairing a passion for justice with a quest for eternal matters.

In February, the pastor of Holy Family Cathedral continued his annual tradition of taking a group of medical professionals to his homeland in Vietnam to provide medical aid to the poorest of the poor.

Woven between the remote medical stops were regular celebrations of the

Guest Column

JOEL DAVIDSON
GUEST COLUMNIST

Mass and collaborative work with priests and religious sisters from Vietnam.

This is the sort of seamless garment of faith and action that could well inspire a generation of young Catholics to reconsider the faith of the saints.

In Pope Benedict XVI's recent message for World Youth Day 2009, he explored the question of how young people might find the hope that is Christ.

To this end, the pope called young people to pray, receive the sacraments and to "cultivate love of neighbor and try to put yourselves and your human talents and professional abilities at the service of the common good and of truth."

Youthful zeal remains. It is the duty of the church to couple this passion for justice with instruction in the faith and encounters with our Savior.

It cannot be one or the other. Religious instruction without a hand reaching to the poor rings hollow to a generation that desires justice.

At the same time, social outreach without a robust spiritual backbone loses all eternal significance.

Why be Catholic?

Our immortality is directly related to our union with Christ

There are many reasons for being Catholic, but the one that excites me most is what C.S. Lewis called the eternity factor.

We seldom see the hidden hand of God at work in this world, but God is always active in human history.

C.S. Lewis always stressed that "the church will outlive the universe," and because of this, "the individual person within it will outlive the universe."

"Everything that is joined to the immortal head (of the mystical body of Christ) will share his immortality. ...

"If we do not believe it (this truth)," Lewis insisted, "let us be honest and relegate the Christian faith to museums" ("The Weight of Glory").

Lewis debunked the non-Christian notion that each one of us starts with the treasure we call the "personality" locked up within us, and that the main end of life is to expand and express the shoddy ego and to guard it from interference so as always to be "original."

He scoffed that no one who seeks originality for its own sake will ever be original.

In light of this truth, we know that the true goal of human life is to abide in Jesus Christ and attain heaven.

We are called to tell the truth as we see it and do any bit of work as well as it can be done for the work's sake. When we succeed at this, originality will come unsought. In Christ, with him and through him the goal of eternal life becomes possible.

Lewis said: "There will come a time when every culture, every institution, every nation, the human race, all biological life is extinct and every one of us is still alive. Immortality is promised to us."

Immortality, the gift of living beyond the time/space limits of this world, will come only to those who belong to the inner life of God.

This gift is bestowed on us by virtue of our membership in Christ's body.

Jesus is the only eternal being who has ever lived. By belonging to his mystical body we will share in his eternal destiny.

Lewis continued, "It is not the individual as such who will share Christ's victory over death. We shall share the victory by being in the Victor."

Our immortality is directly related to our union with Christ.

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR

Baptism makes us an organic part of the body of Christ. The mystical body of Christ is a metaphor for the cosmic Christ, who pervades and penetrates the entire universe.

It is a metaphor, which helps us to explain the unexplainable.

"There lies the maddening ambiguity of our faith as it must appear to outsiders," Lewis wrote.

As private individuals, "as mere biological entities, each with its separate will to live and to expand, we are apparently of no account. ... But as organs in the body of Christ, as stones and pillars in the temple, we are assured of our eternal self-identity and shall live to remember the galaxies as an old tale."

The Catechism of the Catholic Church defines membership in the mystical body of Christ as extending well beyond the limits of the Roman Catholic Church, but the essential truth is that Jesus Christ established the Catholic Church to open the gates of heaven for one and all.

Holy Week offers occasion to understand gift of salvation, says pope

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The rituals of Holy Week and Easter offer Catholics an opportunity to understand the "priceless gift of salvation obtained by Christ's sacrifice" on the cross, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The Easter triduum, which represents the heart of the whole liturgical year, is a time for the faithful to immerse themselves in the central events of redemption, to relive the paschal mystery and to meditate "more vividly on the passion, death and resurrection of the Lord," he said.

At his general audience April 8 in St. Peter's Square, the pope explained the meaning of the liturgies the church was to celebrate in the coming days.

The pope prayed that the Holy Week celebrations would draw all Christians "more deeply into Christ's paschal mystery."

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

Tomorrow we begin the holy Triduum, the heart of the entire liturgical year: a time when we immerse ourselves in the central events of our redemption.

The chrism Mass serves as a prelude to these three days, as priests renew their promises to the bishop, who then blesses the holy oils and consecrates the chrism signifying the gift of the Holy Spirit.

At the Mass of the Lord's Supper, we recall the institution of the Eucharist, the supreme sign of Christ's love for us.

As we venerate his cross on Good Friday, we contemplate the full meaning of his words: "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many" (Mk 14:24).

Holy Saturday finds us waiting in silent hope for the Easter Vigil, when every church will break forth in a song of joy at the Lord's resurrection.

The celebration of the paschal mystery recalls the depth of Christ's love: he did not wish to exercise his divinity as an exclusive possession, a means of domination, or a sign of distance between him and us.

Rather, "he emptied himself, taking the form of a servant" (Phil 2:7) by sharing fully in our human condition, even to the point of death — not a death imposed by blind chance or fate, but one freely chosen in obedience to the Father's will for the salvation for all.

May our fervent celebration of the Triduum draw us ever more deeply into Christ's paschal mystery!

Transcending self-interest

How faithful people go about the work of politics

Politics is a contact sport but still one that people of faith can influence by bringing reconciliation and humility to the game, according to a man with a unique perspective on both faith and politics.

"I think it is important in our country to be engaged in the political process and to understand that politics is a difference of ideas," said John Danforth, a former three-term senator from Missouri, former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations and an ordained Episcopal priest.

"It is not everybody sitting around and agreeing with each other," he added. "We do disagree and we have vigorous debates and that's the way it should be."

He published a book in 2006, "Faith and Politics," in which he wrote Christians have a choice between reconciliation and divisiveness, and "those who have chosen the latter course are getting all the attention."

The relationship of faith and politics is not about fashioning religious beliefs into political platforms, he wrote, adding, "It is, instead, the way in which faithful people go about the work of politics."

I had the opportunity to meet

Danforth, and I asked him if his book remained relevant following a national election and a change in administration.

"This is a subject that is very germane today," he replied. Christians must take their rightful place in the public square, but should "do so in context of not believing any one of us has the monopoly on truth, an understanding that we can be wrong and the other guy can turn out to be right."

"I think that people of faith can bring that kind of message to public debate," Danforth said.

"Not that we pull our punches, not that we feel less vigorously about different approaches to government. But along with strong views, we can bring a sense of humility, a sense that the other guy could be right and we could turn out to be wrong."

Danforth graduated from Yale Law School and Yale Divinity School in 1963 and was ordained later that year. He was Missouri's attorney general for eight years.

He was elected to the Senate in 1977, served three terms and retired in 1995.

"Religion can be very divisive," he said. "We see that throughout the world and we see that throughout history. On the other hand, religion brings to politics a sense of humility and a sense that God's truth transcends our perception of it so that we are not the custodian of God's truth in the political sphere."

"I think that degree of modesty helps people disagree in an agreeable fashion."

Danforth was a special presidential U.S. envoy to Sudan in 2001 and brokered a peace agreement that ultimately ended a 20-year civil war in 2005. He sees a role for reconciliation and humility in foreign affairs.

"I think that Sudan was an example of the United States trying to be a constructive force in a country where our self-interest was hard to define," he reflected.

There is a strong role for realism in the conduct of foreign affairs, he said, and added: "I think that people of faith can bring to any government policy something other than self-interest, something that transcends self-interest."

Pope says he wants to visit Italian earthquake victims

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Encouraging solidarity with the victims of the earthquake that struck central Italy April 6, Pope Benedict XVI also promised to visit the survivors.

"My dear ones, I hope to come see you as soon as possible," the pope said April 8 at the end of his weekly general audience, which is televised throughout Italy.

Shortly before the papal audience, Italian government officials raised the official death toll in the city and province of L'Aquila to 250 people and said more than 1,000 were injured, about 100 seriously.

The main quake, which struck at 3:30 a.m. April 6, registered a magnitude of between 5.8 and 6.3 on the Richter scale. Hundreds of tremors followed, including an aftershock April 7 that registered 5.3 on the Richter scale and caused more buildings to crumble.

At the end of his audience, the pope said he wanted to reaffirm his closeness to the people of central Italy suffering because of the earthquake.

Pope Benedict praised the work of the Italian government, police, firefighters, military and volunteers working to rescue victims, house and feed the thousands left homeless, and ascertain which homes, churches, offices and businesses are safe to enter.

The assistance efforts, he said, "demonstrate how important solidarity is for overcoming such a harsh trial together. Once again, I want to tell those dear people that the pope shares their suffering and their worries."

"Know that the pope prays for all of you, imploring the mercy of God for the deceased, and he asks for the maternal comfort of Mary and the support of Christian hope for their families and the survivors," Pope Benedict said.

Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, Vatican spokesman, said planning for a papal visit to the region was under way, but he said it would take place at least a week after Easter.

Father Lombardi said Pope Benedict spoke to Archbishop Giuseppe Molinari of L'Aquila by telephone after the audience and promised that after his chrisem Mass April 9 he would send the archdiocese some of the sacred oils he blessed for use in the sacraments since the archbishop would not be able to celebrate a chrisem Mass in his own cathedral.

after Easter.

Italian news agencies quoted a spokesman for the archdiocese as saying the pope would visit April 13 or 14, flying by helicopter from Castel Gandolfo, the papal villa outside Rome where the pope was scheduled to spend Easter week.

Among the rescue workers assisting in the region were eight members of the Vatican fire department.

Domenico Giani, director of Vatican security services, told Vatican Radio that as soon as he heard about the earthquake he and the officials in charge of the Vatican governor's office discussed ways they could help and then spoke to Pope Benedict about it.

"It seemed important at this moment of great pain to ensure that one of our fire department squads was present to lend a hand," he said.

The firefighters, including a structural engineer, were sent to Onna, a tiny town near L'Aquila that was almost completely destroyed by the quake; 40 of the town's 350 residents were killed.

Giani said that after helping recover bodies the first night the Vatican fire fighters started assisting the survivors.

Interviewed from Onna, Paolo De Angelis, the Vatican structural engineer, told Vatican Radio April 7, "The situation is disastrous. The town is destroyed."

But, he said, even though most of the residents have lost everything, they are helping each other.

The quake, which was felt even 70 miles away in Rome, also did major damage in the town of Paganica, where it claimed the life of Abbess Gemma Antonucci, head of the Poor Clares' Convent of St. Clare.

In an interview with SIR, Father Dionisio Rodriguez Cuartas, the pastor in Paganica and director of Caritas L'Aquila, said the roof of the Poor Clares' convent caved in.

In the early afternoon April 6, rescue workers were able to recover the body of the abbess and to free another nun from the debris. Two of the dozen members of the community were hospitalized with broken bones; the others were unharmed.

In a telegram the same day to Archbishop Molinari, the Vatican secretary of state said Pope Benedict had asked him to convey his "participation in the pain of the dear population struck by this tragic event."

"In assuring fervid prayers for the victims, particularly the children, His Holiness invokes the Lord to comfort the families, and while he addresses affectionate words of encouragement to the survivors and those involved in the rescue operations, he sends all a special apostolic blessing," Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone told the archbishop.

Archbishop Molinari told SIR that many of the churches in his diocese had been damaged or totally destroyed; his residence and chancery also were heavily damaged.

The region had been experiencing small quakes for weeks, he said.

"Thank God I was not in my room asleep because I did not feel very safe," he said; instead he went to his office to deal with paperwork.

As soon as the quake hit, he left the building with a priest and the nuns he lives with, the archbishop said.

"The most beautiful churches" in L'Aquila and nearby towns were destroyed, he said, listing five buildings.

And, like the Poor Clares' convent the cathedral was damaged when several sections of the roof caved in.

Daring rescue of ship's captain leaves Vermont parish overjoyed

BY CHAZ MUTH
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — When news of the bold liberation of U.S. Capt. Richard Phillips from the grip of pirates off the coast of Somalia filtered through his Vermont Catholic parish April 12, members of his church community felt like their Easter prayers had been answered.

"We're so happy that it turned out the way that it did," said Donna Schaeffler, secretary of St. Thomas Church in Underhill Center, Vt., the parish where Phillips, 53, and his wife, Andrea, regularly attend Mass.

"There is so much media here and we're trying to give the Phillipses their privacy, but we've been praying at Mass for his safe release," Schaeffler said.

INFLUENCING MANY WITH MERCY

Mercy Sister Mary Scullion, co-founder and executive director of Project HOME, reads with a young man at the center in Philadelphia April 3. Sister Scullion has been named a finalist in Time magazine's 2009 annual most influential list.

Mercy nun a finalist for Time list of world's most influential people

PHILADELPHIA — You wouldn't expect to see a Philadelphia nun who works with the homeless on a list of the 100 most influential people in the world.

Mercy Sister Mary Scullion, co-founder and executive director of Project HOME, has been named a finalist in Time magazine's 2009 annual most influential list, which calls her "Philadelphia's Mother Teresa."

As of April 23, she was ranked 49th among 204 nominees in continuing online voting, ahead of the Dalai Lama. The list includes people in government, science, technology and the arts.

On the plus side, according to the citation, she has helped slash the homeless rate in half in the City of Brotherly Love, and 95 percent of those who cycle through Project HOME are never again homeless, "a success rate which has made the program a model for dozens of other U.S. cities."

The only negative, according to the citation: "She's not too well-known outside of Philly."

That's beginning to change.

"It's not about me; we are a community of a lot of people," Sister Scullion said.

She co-founded Project HOME in 1989, along with Joan Dawson McConnon, to whom Sister Scullion attributes as much, if not more, responsibility for the organization's success. HOME stands for Housing, Opportunities for Employment, Medical Care, Education.

Now 55, Sister Scullion, the daughter of Irish immigrants, was a high school senior when she applied to the Sisters of Mercy in 1971.

Living and working among the poorest people in north Philadelphia,

Sister Scullion felt drawn to a ministry more directly involved in alleviating their needs. She joined the staff of Mercy Hospice, a shelter conducted by her congregation for homeless women.

A defining moment for her was the 41st International Eucharistic Congress, held in Philadelphia in 1976, which brought to the city such advocates for the poor as Mother Teresa of Calcutta, India; Father Pedro Arrupe, the Jesuits' superior general; and Dorothy Day, co-founder of the Catholic Worker Movement.

"Father Arrupe said, 'When people are hungry anywhere in the world, the Eucharist is incomplete,'" she said. "The Eucharist is central to my spiritual life, and there is a place for everyone at God's table." The same principle holds for homelessness. "Our vision is that none of us are home until all of us are home," she said.

In 1985 she was a co-founder of Women of Hope, a safe haven that provides permanent housing for mentally ill women.

Since 1989, Project HOME has been her main focus. And under the leadership of Sister Scullion and McConnon, it has grown from transitional housing for 12 men to a multifaceted agency designed to break the cycle of homelessness for the men and women it serves.

A woman of seemingly boundless energy, she usually finds time for a run through Philadelphia's Fairmount Park a couple of times each week and hopes to participate in a May 3 10-mile run in the city. But most of her energy is spent in mission.

The question for Sister Scullion is what is God's vision for the world and what can be done to make it happen, through his grace, prayer and community.

Catholic coalition seeks to influence outcome of climate-change bill

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Led by a coalition of more than a dozen Catholic organizations, religious communities are ramping up efforts to ensure that the legislative debate on climate change beginning April 22 in Congress will not overlook the world's poorest and most vulnerable people.

The effort of the Catholic Coalition on Climate Change and the National Religious Partnership on the Environment came as the House Energy and Commerce Committee opened hearings on a clean energy bill. The Catholic coalition unveiled the Catholic Climate Covenant, a wide-ranging climate-change campaign, during a nationwide teleconference April 21.

Aimed largely at Catholics in the country's 19,000 parishes and 6,250 elementary schools, the campaign integrates the traditional Catholic practice of prayer with specific actions meant to reduce an individual's carbon footprint on the world while influencing public policy.

Several coalition leaders said specific steps involve lobbying Congress and state legislatures about the need to pass prudent legislation that takes into account the needs of the common good, specifically the poor whom they say are affected most by climate change.

While noting that the effort revolves around prayer and reflection, John Carr, executive director of the U.S. bishops' Department of Justice, Peace and Human Development and coalition chairman, acknowledged that working within the political arena will be a necessary part of the campaign's work. "There is going to be a huge debate, in fact a struggle ... and our voice is going to be that voice that puts the poor first," he said.

Bishop William S. Skylstad of Spokane, Wash., honorary chairman of the campaign, said the campaign is "an urgent call with an urgent message."

The campaign is being introduced at a time when a majority of Catholics believe that climate change is a serious problem, according to pollster John Zogby.

Vatican deplores Belgian parliament's criticism of pope on condoms

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has deplored a Belgian parliamentary resolution that criticized Pope Benedict XVI for his remarks about condoms and AIDS prevention.

In an April 17 statement, the Vatican's Secretariat of State said it "deplores the fact that a parliamentary assembly should have thought it appropriate to criticize the Holy Father on the basis of an isolated extract from an interview, separated from its context and used by some groups with a clear intent to intimidate."

The statement said it appeared that those groups were hoping "to dissuade the pope from expressing himself on certain themes of obvious moral relevance and from teaching the church's doctrine."

The Belgian parliament voted overwhelmingly April 2 to have the government relay to the Vatican the parliamentarians' disapproval of Pope Benedict's statement March 17 that distributing condoms was not the key to preventing AIDS. The Belgian ambassador to the Holy See, Frank de Coninck, met April 15 at the Vatican with Archbishop Dominique Mamberti, secretary for relations with states, to formally inform the Vatican of the resolution.

The pope was asked about condoms in AIDS prevention by reporters aboard his flight to Cameroon March 17. After highlighting the church's efforts to help AIDS victims, the pope said: "One cannot overcome the problem with the distribution of condoms. On the contrary, they increase the problem."

The pope went on to explain that true prevention requires a change in sexual behavior and a real effort to befriend and care for those living with AIDS.

In its statement April 17, the Secretariat of State said the pope "also emphasized the commitment of the church in both these areas. Without this moral and educational dimension, the battle against AIDS will not be won."

Vatican officials object to Iranian president's remarks on Israel

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has criticized Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's remarks about Israel at a U.N. conference on racism as "extremist and unacceptable" and said the comments promote an atmosphere of conflict.

At the same time, Vatican officials, including Pope Benedict XVI, emphasized the importance of participation in the conference, which was being boycotted by the United States and several other Western countries.

Ahmadinejad told conference participants in Geneva April 20 that Israel had "resorted to military aggression to make an entire nation homeless under the pretext of Jewish suffering" and had established a "totally racist government in the occupied Palestine."

His comments prompted a temporary walkout by dozens of diplomats in attendance.

The Vatican spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, told Vatican Radio April 20 that "statements like those of the Iranian president do not go in the right direction, because even if he did not deny the Holocaust or the right of Israel to exist, he expressed extremist and unacceptable positions."

"For this reason it is important to continue to affirm with clarity the respect for human dignity against every form of racism or intolerance. We hope the conference can still serve this purpose," Father Lombardi said.

The following day, the Vatican spokesman issued a broader statement, saying that "the Holy See deplores the use of this United Nations forum for the adoption of political positions of an extremist and offensive nature against any state."

"This does not contribute to dialogue and it provokes an unacceptable atmosphere of conflict," it said.

Father Lombardi said the conference was an important opportunity to take new steps toward "effectively combating the racism and intolerance that still today affect children, women, those of African descent, migrants and indigenous peoples ... in every part of the world."

Archbishop Silvano Tomasi, the chief Vatican representative to U.N. agencies in Geneva, said although the Vatican objected to the Iranian president's remarks about Israel, Vatican delegation members did not think walking out was the right response.

On April 19, Pope Benedict underlined the importance of the international conference and urged participants to take concrete steps to combat discrimination and intolerance around the world.

The candidates were Gus Bellia, Mary Joan Bellia, Enid Dunning, Barbara Geiszler, Alice Gottschalk, Howard Kelly, Cosmas Robless, Shirley Robless, Kitty Rodgers and Mary Taylor.

The candidates were in formation and discernment for approximately two years prior to their profession to the order. The fraternity now has 42 active members.

Secular Franciscans, a lay group, are a "third order" of the Franciscans. Priests constitute the first order, and brothers and women religious make up the second. Secular Franciscans are called to make a promise to live the Franciscan rule in their everyday life and work.

ASSISI, Italy (CNS) — Approximately 1,800 Friars Minor, Conventual Franciscans, Capuchins and Third Order Regular Franciscans attended an April 15-18 gathering celebrating the 800th anniversary of papal approval of the Franciscan rule.

It was the first time that many representatives of the four main Franciscan branches had come together in Assisi, Italy.

Many activities centered around or near the Basilica of St. Mary of the Angels, which houses the Portiuncula chapel — the small church where their founder, St. Francis of Assisi, experienced his conversion.

On April 18, participants traveled south for a special audience with Pope Benedict XVI. The trip recalled St. Francis' pilgrimage to see Pope Innocent III in 1209 to receive approval of his rule of life and formally establish the Franciscan order.

for life as priests, seminarians also pray the Liturgy of the Hours.

"It (Liturgy of the Hours) brings a discipline to prayer," said transitional Deacon Benjamin Roberts, a member of St. Philip the Apostle Church in Statesville and a seminarian for the Diocese of Charlotte.

Throughout the hour, the nearly 80 theology division seminarians file in, all clad in traditional clerical cassocks.

"Since we are being formed as priests, in all ways, we begin to live that life as much as possible," says David Miller, a member of St. Aloysius Church in Hickory and seminarian for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"The [clerical] garb is another way to enter into that," he said.

This morning, Deacon Roberts serves as the deacon during the holy hour and Mass. Deacon Roberts rotates the liturgical duties with the 19 other transitional deacons in his class.

After Mass, the seminarians head to breakfast while some spend extra time in prayer or make last-minute preparations for class, which will start at 8:50 a.m.

"The most important thing a seminarian does each day is go into that chapel and pray," said Deacon Roberts.

Five minutes before class begins, third-year theology students — who are only six weeks away from diaconate ordination — file in for the day's first class, "United States Church History."

The 15 men pull out texts and laptops. Miller sits in the back row. The 75-minute class is both academically challenging and pastorally focused, with topics varying from ecumenism to liturgy to popular piety.

Practice and preparation

After class, the seminarians proceed to the chapel, this time for a weekly practicum on the responsibilities of the deacon at Mass.

By now, Miller has attended thousands of Masses in his life; however this is different — the seminarians must master all of the subtleties of their role before diaconate ordination. Miller will be ordained to the transitional diaconate, along with seminarian John Eckert, by Bishop Peter J. Jugis at the Pontifical College Josephinum, a Catholic seminary in Columbus, Ohio, April 26.

Father Patrick Welsh, dean of men and head of liturgy, instructs the seminarians on posture, which is "not rigidity, but a posture that is formal and sacred."

It is Miller's turn to roleplay. He said he is not nervous of the role itself, "but nervous to be a good deacon." He likened the training to earning a driver's license.

"Driving a car and navigating the road is a whole new experience" than riding in the passenger's seat, he said.

After the practicum, the third class period of the day begins. Seminarians have five or six classes per semester, which meet two times per week on Mondays and Wednesdays or Tuesdays and Fridays in the morning.

Afternoons are for study, elective classes, exercise, personal business and preparation for various apostolates. Thursdays are reserved for apostolic work at schools, parishes and agencies around the Archdiocese of Philadelphia.

Richard Worthington, a second-year theology student and seminarian for the Diocese of Charlotte, spends this Wednesday afternoon doing lesson plans.

He is teaching moral theology to sophomores at a Catholic high school. Worthington, a member of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Mocksville, has spent the past several Thursdays on a series of classes explaining the Catholic teachings on marriage, fertility and chastity.

After spending a class giving his vocation story, Worthington said he "taught classes on the problem of contraception."

"I used an approach that started with the premise of beauty ... When contraception is used, the beautiful marital embrace becomes ugly through the trash that we bring into it," he said. "More precisely, one or both of the persons is holding back."

To explain chastity, he said he brought in "some superb chastity educators from Generation Life, [who] delivered a difficult message in a way that was relevant" to the teenagers.

To begin again

Deacon Roberts, Miller and Worthington are all in the seminary's theology division, or the "upper division" of studies.

Seminarians Richard Worthington of Mocksville (seated, right) and Michael Schuetz of the Diocese of Raleigh (seated, left) hear menu options from Msgr. Michael Magee during dinner at St. Charles Borromeo Seminary in Wynnewood, Pa., April 1.

Seminary study begins with two years of philosophical training called "pre-theology," or a four-year college program for those who have not completed an undergraduate degree.

The "lower division" students reside in a separate building with a separate chapel from the theology students.

Each Wednesday, both divisions of men gather in the lower side chapel to chant evening prayer before attending "Rector's Dinner," during which all seminarians and priests gather for a meal and to work on friendships and manners.

Afterward, seminarians are back at their books or in the chapel before retiring usually by 10 or 11 p.m., ready to spend another day in preparation for service of the church as priests.

"We are men like any others," said Miller of his current role as a seminarian. "We need grace just like others do, although we have a higher calling."

"Seminary is a daunting task because of what it's leading to," said Deacon Roberts, who will be ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Jugis at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte June 6.

"Entering takes the same courage that it took Matthew to get up from the tax collector's booth and follow Jesus," he said.

Captain's rescue overjoys Vermont parish

"Our pastor (Father Charles Danielson) also asked everyone to pray for the Phillipses during the Easter morning Mass. We were just so happy to hear the news of his rescue later in the day," she said.

Phillips allowed himself to be taken hostage by four pirates who tried to seize the U.S.-flagged Maersk Alabama April 7 in the Indian Ocean, in order to keep the crew of the 17-ton ship safe.

He was detained by his armed captors on one of the ship's lifeboats for five days. U.S. naval forces surrounded the small boat, and Navy snipers fired three shots to kill a trio of Somali pirates and free the American sea captain, a Navy commander told The Associated Press April 13.

The fourth pirate, who had been aboard the USS Bainbridge for negotiations about the captain's release, surrendered and could face life in a U.S. prison, the AP reported.

President Barack Obama, who told the AP he was pleased with the rescue, said Phillips' courage was "a model for all Americans."

The White House had authorized the Navy to take action to resolve the five-day standoff.

Father Danielson told CNS he prayed with Phillips' wife privately at the couple's Underhill Center home the day before the dramatic rescue, and spoke to "excited and overjoyed" family members April 12 after he learned the captain was safe.

The U.S. sea captain told news reporters shortly after his rescue that he was not a hero, and praised the Navy SEALs for their efforts in securing his freedom.

Bishop Salvatore R. Matano of Burlington, Vt. — who spoke with a member of the Phillips family April 11 and plans to have a face-to-face meeting with them after they are reunited with the captain — said this ordeal has reminded Catholics all over Vermont how much they need the peace that Easter brings.

"I'm sure the Phillips family understands that wonderful peace since their horrible ordeal is over," Bishop Matano said. "They realize the peace of Easter and we hope that continues."

The event that unfolded for the family and citizens of Vermont has helped locals focus on tragedies all over the world and reminded them to pray for the safe return of members of the military serving in war-torn regions around the planet, he told CNS April 13.

"It's been a real eye-opener, I'll tell you that," Father Danielson said. "An event like this really humanizes the news. It really brings home that the faces of people in the news belong to real human beings."

"It's someone in your parish, in your community, and we're hoping and praying for the best," he added.

The ordeal has also shown the priest, who has been pastor of St. Thomas Church since last July, that he has a faith community of people who really care about one another, pray for each other and band together in difficult times.

"This is a small community and everyone here has been concerned," Schaeffler said. "Our office has been flooded with phone messages and e-mails from people who have expressed their well-wishes to Capt. Phillips and his family. When things settle down, I'll make sure they get these messages."

The couple's Catholic parish in Underhill Center, Vt., had prayed for the captain's safe return as he was being held captive by pirates off the coast of Somalia. U.S. Navy SEALs freed him in a dramatic ending to a five-day standoff with U.S. naval forces.

After the tragedy

Family receives support, encouragement from Catholic Social Services

BY DAVID HAINS
COMMUNICATIONS DIRECTOR

ASHEVILLE — Tasha Roby and John Ledbetter recently made their way into the foyer of the Catholic Social Services Western Regional Office in Asheville.

The office, in a converted home a few blocks from the center of town, is the last place the married couple expected to find themselves a year ago.

Both in their late 20s, Roby and Ledbetter are the well-educated parents of six children, three of whom are 5 years old. The parents planned to buy the home they were renting and build a financially-secure future.

Roby's dream was to return to college and finish her bachelor's degree.

But their hopes and dreams were put on hold when John was seriously injured in an automobile accident. He now suffers from multiple injuries that prevent him from working and require the attention of medical specialists.

While Ledbetter was not at fault in the accident, money from his insurance company and the insurance company of the other driver has not been enough to cover his medical costs.

Additionally, Ledbetter's doctors require upfront payments, but his insurance company won't process his claims until he has been treated.

Meanwhile, the national economic downturn has affected Roby's employer who, in an effort to keep from laying off workers, has reduced the work week for all employees from 40 to 25 hours.

Under the stress of losing their home, Ledbetter's physical and emotional pain and their mounting expenses, Roby and Ledbetter turned to CSS for help.

The family received food assistance, Ledbetter received counseling and the couple left with hope and an understanding that there were people in the community who cared about their needs and could help them find solutions to their problems.

In addition to counseling and food assistance, the CSS Western Regional Office offers adoption and immigration services, refugee assistance and pregnancy support.

From despair to hope

CSS provides counseling, assistance with untangling complicated lives

BY ANN KILKELLY

SPECIAL TO THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

Editor's note: Some names have been changed for privacy.

GREENSBORO — Life was becoming complicated for "Hope."

Suffering from the stress of work and a bad relationship, Hope found herself slipping into depression — she ate less, avoided friends, felt her world growing dark.

She realized she needed help and sought counseling through Catholic Social Services' office in Greensboro. Soon she began to turn her life around.

"It was good to realize that I am not crazy. I just needed to clarify my own thinking," she said.

"Without counseling, I probably would be miserable still. I would not be where I am now," said Hope. "I am becoming more self reliant and value relationships."

Hope encourages others in need to seek counseling.

"Find yourself and who you are with the Lord instead of being down all the time. It is worth it," she said.

CSS's Greensboro office receives counseling referrals from local parishes, resource centers and other mental health providers. Counseling is available on a sliding fee scale, so no one who may benefit from the services is turned away.

In addition to counseling, the Greensboro office provides parenting assistance, adoption services, legal immigration and translation assistance, and referrals to community social services.

CSS was a key player in the formation of the Congregational Assistance Network, a coalition of churches and agencies — including Urban Ministry, Salvation Army, the Greensboro Housing Corporation and Department of Social Services — to address the emergency needs of individuals and families in the Greensboro area.

Sandi Hall, a social worker with Gateway Education Center, a nationally recognized school that serves youths with disabilities, worked closely with the CSS office to address the immediate needs of a Gateway client family.

In a letter to the CSS office, she wrote, "I have been most impressed with the professionalism, compassion and tenacity in your work with me and multiple community resources on behalf of this family."

Ann Kilkelly is development director for Catholic Social Services.

Weathering the storm

CSS food pantries see increased need, donations during economic downturn

BY DAVID HAINS
COMMUNICATIONS DIRECTOR

CHARLOTTE — Catholic Social Services offices in Asheville, Charlotte and Winston-Salem have been feeling both the burdens and blessings of the national economic meltdown.

The first signs that the needs for the basics of food, warmth and shelter were rising rapidly began appearing in the summer of 2008, as more and more families showed up at CSS food pantries.

In Winston-Salem, the CSS food pantry typically served 100 or so families per month. By January 2009, the number ballooned to 328 families — who were given a total of 962 bags of groceries containing non-perishable canned goods, frozen meat and even fresh products like bread and eggs.

Like all CSS services, the food was given to anyone in need, regardless of the recipient's faith.

Diane Bullard, director of the CSS Piedmont-Triad Office in Winston-Salem, said she faces "an avalanche of need."

During February, the food pantry was completely depleted.

Bullard said many of those in need have never asked for help before.

"We have people who try and access services but don't know how. They don't know what to do," said Bullard. "People also ask to come during off hours because they are embarrassed."

Bullard, her staff and volunteers work to meet those needs and to provide services in a dignified manner.

The CSS food pantry in Charlotte has also seen an increase in need.

"Demand for the food pantry is off the charts. There are days when it takes the efforts of everybody around here to help meet the need," said Geri King, director of the CSS Charlotte Regional Office.

A majority of the food pantry recipients are refugees — many of whom hail from Asia and Africa and face language barriers at Charlotte's emergency service providers — and Hispanics — many of whom are undocumented and feel safe only when seeking aid from their church.

Jacquie Crombie, director of the CSS Western Regional Office, said much of their outreach is also directed toward Hispanic families.

"Some families face long stretches of unemployment while awaiting deportation hearings," she said.

In February, the Western Regional Office took over operation of a food pantry that had been run for the last 10 years by Diana Riddle, a parishioner of the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville.

The food pantry was struggling to meet the increasing demand of those in need. The week before Easter, the food pantry assisted 155 adults and children.

But all three offices have seen silver linings amid the grim and growing needs.

In Asheville, $10,000 worth of commercial-grade refrigerators were recently donated, which will allow more food to be preserved. The Western Regional Office also recently received a $2,500 grant from the Community Foundation of Western North Carolina. The money will allow the office to help some families pay utility bills.

In Winston-Salem, Bullard said more people are donating to the food pantry than ever before.

"People have been incredibly generous. They bring food because they know the need is greater," she said.

COURTESY PHOTO

Diana McCarthy, a Catholic Social Services volunteer and advisory board member, works in the Western Regional Office's food pantry in Asheville April 15.

Bullard said she has heard of area children who are asking birthday party guests to substitute gifts with canned food donations to the pantry.

A similar act of generosity will take place on April 26, when Deacon Ben Wenning retires from the permanent diaconate at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte. Deacon Wenning has asked that parishioners substitute any gifts they were considering giving him with food donations to the local CSS food pantry.

"As Ben has nurtured the parish through more than 20 years of ministry, he will now nurture the larger community with this gift of food," said Father Frank O'Rourke, pastor.

The Charlotte Regional Office also received a $40,000 grant from the Levine Foundation and the Foundation for the Carolinas. The money is being used to help families meet rent and utility payments.

King said the Charlotte office has experienced a welcomed surge in donations of food and clothing, as well as volunteers to help sort and distribute the items. Bullard said the economic times have both hurt and helped bring out the best in people.

"It goes both ways — we see the need and we see that people are really stepping up to the plate," Bullard said.

'Do unto others ...'

Woman channels gratitude into service, operates food pantry for more than 10 years

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

ASHEVILLE — Diana Riddle was suffering from arthritis and degenerative back problems when she received assistance from the Asheville-area conference of the St. Vincent de Paul Society 10 years ago.

"They were just such wonderful, giving and generous people," said Riddle, who was so moved by the help she received that she decided to become a Vincentian.

Soon after joining the local chapter, Riddle, a parishioner of the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville, felt called to open a food pantry that would serve the poor of Buncombe County.

"I had become disabled and had been in a state of poverty for quite a while," said Riddle, referring to her circumstances at the time.

She was about to lose her home when the Vincentians stepped in and helped her make her payments. "I made up my mind to help give back for what they did for me," Riddle said.

Riddle began operating the food pantry, which served local Vincentian clients and others in need, from her home in Candler. She named the food pantry "Lilies of the Field," from the Bible verse Matthew 6:28.

In that verse, "the Lord tells us that we should live on faith," said Riddle.

As the ministry grew, she was given space in the basement of Catholic Social Services' Western Regional Office in Asheville. When CSS moved to a larger facility, "Lilies of the Field" moved into the remodeled garage next door.

Riddle continued to operate the food pantry until February of this year when she stepped down from her position and its operation was taken over by CSS.

"Thanks to the groundwork laid by Diana Riddle, the transition was smooth and the poor of the county continue to benefit from this loving ministry," said Tom Chmielweski, president of the Asheville-area conference of the St. Vincent de Paul Society.

On April 17, Asheville-area Vincentians hosted a banquet honoring Riddle for her dedication to serving those in need. A plaque in Riddle's honor was placed in the food pantry.

The St. Vincent de Paul Society is an international organization of Roman Catholic lay men and women of all ages whose primary mission is to help the poor and less fortunate. On a local level, the society is broken down into units called conferences.

The conference that Riddle belongs to was formed in 1998 and is comprised of parishioners from the Basilica of St. Lawrence and St. Eugene Church in Asheville, and from St. Joan of Arc Church in Candler.

"The primary focus of the society here in Asheville has been helping families with electric, fuel oil, gas and water bills," said Chmielweski. "We also help with rent, car repairs, bus tickets and food deliveries from the 'Lilies of the Field' food pantry."

The food pantry receives donations of food and money from churches private donors and Manna Food Bank, a private, nonprofit service organization.

"The only money that we have ever received has come from the Catholic community," said Riddle. "Just good Catholic people who want to see it work and help make it work."

Today the food pantry at CSS continues to serve the local Vincentian clients as well as those of the society's St. Margaret Mary Conference in Swannanoa and the clients of CSS.

A refugee's story

Liberian man and children find home in America through CSS

BY DAVID HAINS
COMMUNICATIONS DIRECTOR

CHARLOTTE — Life for Saah Foday Kanda became chaotic and dangerous nearly 30 years ago.

Kanda lived in the West African nation of Liberia. Founded by freed American slaves in the 1840s — its capital, Monrovia, was named for the fifth U.S. president, James Monroe — the nation became torn by years of civil war starting in 1980 and by armed conflicts with its neighbors Sierra Leone and Ghana.

Hundreds of thousands died in the fighting. In 1989, as the civil unrest continued, Kanda, who had been a bank loan officer, began working for the international Red Cross — first as a translator and later as a relief coordinator.

Kanda's wife and three children, along with her parents, fled to New Guinea while Kanda continued to work in Liberia, disseminating human rights information.

When Kanda refused to cooperate with a rebel leader in 1994, he was placed on a wanted list — a death sentence in the almost-lawless country. Kanda was forced into hiding.

He escaped to a refugee camp in Ivory Coast where, after much searching, he was finally reunited with his family. Life in the camp was harsh — the family had nothing but straw to sleep on and were surrounded by misery and sickness with little help from the outside world.

Kanda saw the situation as temporary and as a challenge — he prayed that he would be able to use his experiences to help others in the future.

In the late 1990s, the Kandas began the five-year immigration process to enter the United States. Before it was complete, Kanda's wife suffered a stroke and later died due to lack of medical treatment in the camp.

Kanda and his children had to start the process over, and finally arrived in the United States in 2003.

The Refugee Resettlement Office of Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte provided the Kandas with a home and some food, and assistance with job seeking and accessing social services.

"I once was voiceless, but CSS listened to me and helped me with my needs," said Kanda. "Now I want to do that for others."

By 2005, at 49, Kanda was enrolled at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte. He did not let his age deter his desire for a degree.

"There is no failure in trial. If you never try, you fail," he said.

In December 2008, Kanda graduated and is now pursuing a master's degree in international humanitarian law and human rights from a university in Costa Rica.

Eventually he would like to work for the United Nations helping others who are going through what he and his family experienced. Acknowledging the hazards of international social work, Kanda said he is leaving it to God to help work everything out.

"You know when you ask God, he will provide," he said.

Some military tales engage the reader, while others have little drama

REVIEWED BY BRIAN OLSZEWSKI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

In "God in the Foxhole," Charles W. Sasser gets the obvious out of the way in the introduction when he notes the adage that there are no atheists in foxholes.

For the following 300-plus pages, he demonstrates the validity not only about nonbelievers in foxholes, but also in tents, headquarters, fields, bombers, ground vehicles and anywhere else military personnel serve during combat.

His style allows readers to elicit their own images and sounds from his well-crafted narratives.

In a section regarding Pfc. Desmond Doss, a conscientious objector seen by some of his fellow servicemen as a coward, Sasser lets the dialogue explain the conflicts and heroism of Doss' role as a medic in World War II.

The author's "You Are There" tone in this piece is indicative of what occurs throughout the book. GIs pinned under fire. Growing numbers of wounded. Doss on the top of a cliff, an easy target for the enemy, hoisting the wounded to safety, praying aloud, "Lord, help me get one more. Just one more."

There's a resurrection theme in many of the tales. The captain who deemed Doss unfit for military service said, "He saved my life. The man I tried to have kicked out of the Army ended up being the most courageous person I've ever known."

In another story, readers meet Sgt. Gene Beck, who survived two tours of duty in Vietnam relatively unharmed, but who was severely injured in a car accident.

Once Sasser sets the scene in 1982, he takes readers to Beck's Vietnam in 1968, and then back to 1982. The ebb and flow of that and similar stories keep readers engaged. Each section ends with an epilogue.

Cynics might discount stories, many of which have an Audie Murphy thread in them, and that fall into chapters with such headings as "Prayer," "Doubt," "Why Me, Lord?" and "The Unexplained."

Yet, who can explain faith? In many of the stories, there are no logical explanations as to what happened or didn't happen to those involved.

What they do have is a faith-at-work element meshed with patriotism capable of inspiring believers and nonbelievers, hawks and doves.

Where "Foxhole" is a series of engaging stories, "War in the Garden of Eden" reads like a series of military reports — very thorough with its "just-the-facts" tone, but dry.

Although it is Rev. Frank E. Wismer III's account of his experiences and about people he met while serving as a chaplain in Iraq, the stories have little drama. They are good reflections, but for the most part tedious reading.

However, "War in the Garden of Eden" serves a purpose in that it provides a religious perspective on a war whose devastation readers are familiar with. His perspective, while staid, is one that might not be read elsewhere.

Olszewski is executive editor of the Catholic Herald, a publication of the Archdiocese of Milwaukee.

Priest not surprised by Scottish woman's performance on British TV

LONDON (CNS) — The audience snickered and the judges of "Britain's Got Talent" expressed bemused skepticism as the awkward-looking middle-aged woman told them she wanted to be as famous as the popular British actress and singer Elaine Paige. Then Susan Boyle began to sing, and they were spellbound and shocked by the beauty of her voice and rose to their feet in applause.

But Father Basil Clark, who watched the show on television at his home in Broxburn, Scotland, was not surprised.

He has seen the situation unfold many times before, having regularly accompanied Boyle, 47, on the annual Legion of Mary pilgrimage to the Marian shrine in Knock, Ireland.

"When I watched the judges' faces reminded me of what I was like when I first saw Susan singing — absolutely blown away by the quality of the singing and by that fantastic voice," said Father Clark, dean of West Lothian.

Boyle first appeared before judges on the ITV1 sister show of "America's Got Talent"; it was broadcast April 11.

Her fame spread on the Internet, and in just five days she had attracted more than 15 million YouTube viewings of her rendition of "I Dreamed a Dream," from the musical "Les Miserables."

Part of Boyle's attraction is that she appears to be such an unlikely candidate for stardom. She said on TV that she has "never been kissed" and has lived alone with her cat since her mother died in 2007.

Boyle has learning disabilities as a result of being starved of oxygen at birth. She is unemployed and, as a churchgoing Catholic, her social life revolves around her family and her parish of Our Lady of Lourdes Church.

"In a sense, there is a beautiful voice trapped in this damaged body," said Father Clark. "It is an absolute contrast. There she was on television acting very peculiarly and the audience was expecting peculiar things to happen and then a voice of an angel comes out — and that's Susan."

He described Boyle as "a woman of great faith" who was often "very gentle and very caring."

Christ is like a shepherd, tending his flock

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Mary was not just a hired hand.

True, she had been employed by my friend Barbara and her siblings to care for their enfeebled father Scott in his last years of life. But caring for the elderly man was more than a job to Mary — not because of any stipulation in her contract, not because she set high standards.

It was simply because of who she was, and who he was to her.

Barbara told me Mary seemed to know what her father wanted or needed before he said so. Indeed, she cooked, cleaned and helped him shave and dress.

But she also attended to more than his physical needs. She knew what foods he liked and prepared them to please him. She knew how to arrange his things to make him comfortable and happy.

She also learned about Scott's past life, his family and what interested him. They talked all day long. She recognized how he felt and helped him deal with his deepest concerns.

In short, her greatest interest was him.

Barbara said that when she came to visit and Mary took time off, she was never gone as long as expected. She preferred to be there to care for Scott. In fact, the only time she spent a night away was when her own granddaughter was sick and needed her.

For his part, although he loved his children, Scott was most at ease when Mary was nearby. Their relationship of mutual caring was gratifying to Barbara and her brothers and sisters.

When Scott died, Mary came to the funeral. Afterward she sat with the family and shared stories about him with his children and grandchildren. She grieved with them.

For Scott and his loved ones, Mary was like the good shepherd described in this weekend's Gospel. He has true concern for each member of his flock and they know he has their best interests at heart. He prefers to be with them.

Because they know they have his unselfish love, they trust and prefer his care.

Far beyond the interests of a normal hired caregiver, Mary chose to give herself over fully to concern for Scott. Likewise, Jesus the good shepherd reminds us that he freely chooses to give his life for our sake.

Questions:

Whose life and concerns do you care for as much as your own?

How does this help you understand and trust Jesus as your good shepherd?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Beloved: See what love the Father has bestowed on us that we may be called the children of God. Yet so we are" (1 John 3:1).

Ministry awards contest winners

HICKORY—The African American Affairs Ministry of the Diocese of Charlotte has named the winners of the ministry's first diocesan-wide essay contest for students in sixth- through 12th-grade.

Out of 42 entries, six winners — three in the sixth- through eighth-grade and three in the ninth- through 12th-grade divisions — received cash awards and certificates of achievement from the ministry.

Five of the winners read their essays during the ministry's Family Day of Reflection at the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory March 21.

Contest participants were required to research and write about either St. Benedict the Moor, Bishop James Augustine Healy or St. Josephine Bahkita. Entries were evaluated by the ministry's contest committee on content, grammar and punctuation.

Students of St. Mark School in Huntersville cheer March 23 as the school receives national honors from the American Diabetes Association for the most money raised by a school in the 2008 National Walk for Diabetes.

School wins national award in fight against diabetes

Walk for Diabetes.

For raising $52,000, an award from the ADA was presented to St. Mark School in Huntersville by local WCNC weatherman Larry Sprinkle March 23.

Sprinkle served as master of ceremonies at an assembly to kickoff this year's two-week campaign, which culminated with the walk for diabetes April 3.

"I think our school is passionate about the fight against diabetes because in one way or another most families have been affected by it," said Megan Findley, physical education teacher and faculty coordinator for the event.

"We also have several students attending St. Mark who struggle with diabetes," she said.

The school has participated in the event for the past six years.

Each year, students raise money by collecting pledges from friends, family and neighbors.

Other fundraisers include selling raffle tickets and an in-school "penny wars" competition, in which classes compete to see which one can collect the most pennies.

On the day of the walk the classes take turns covering 45 minute shifts, so that between 8:30 a.m. and 2:15 p.m. there are always students walking.

Throughout the two weeks prior to the walk, the school teaches the students about the disease and the importance of maintaining a healthy and active lifestyle as a means for preventing some forms of diabetes.

"We really use this opportunity to teach the students about making healthy lifestyle choices," said Janis Boone, public relations coordinator for the school.

Another reason that the fundraiser is so popular is because the money collected is used on a local level.

"All of the money raised goes to help kids with diabetes go to Camp Carolina Trails," said Findley.

Camp Carolina Trails is a special camp for kids with diabetes. Along with regular camp activities, such as sports and arts and crafts, campers are educated on ways to manage their diabetes and learn skills to help them become more independent.

The camp also helps them "realize they are normal children because most of the other campers have diabetes as well," Findley said.

For the past three years, St. Mark School has been the highest money-raiser for the National Walk for Diabetes in the Southeast.

This was their first time winning the national title.

Lament for Notre Dame

Presidential invite forsakes Catholic identity, causes grave scandal

Any good lawyer has a disclaimer, so here is mine: I love the University of Notre Dame.

My wife received her undergraduate degree there and I proudly graduated from the law school.

My three years at "Our Lady's University" were some of the most wonderful of my life. From the campus' Grotto of Our Lady of Lourdes and Bookstore Basketball tournament to the House that Rock Built stadium, I love it all.

But my favorite place is the university's Basilica of the Sacred Heart. As a student I served at Mass there every week, including Monday-noon Mass for then-university president Holy Cross Father Edward "Monk" Malloy.

On Sunday nights, I would sit in wonder as the liturgical choir sang vespers in the Lady Chapel. And at the end of each Lent, I would marvel at the beauty of the Triduum celebration. The basilica truly is the heart of the university's Catholic identity.

It is because I love Notre Dame so much that the university's recent decision to honor President Barack Obama as its 2009 commencement speaker, and to award him an honorary doctor of laws degree, has caused me so much pain.

Don't misunderstand — this is not a political position. Rather, it is a moral one; in fact, the most important moral issue of our time — namely, the dignity of life.

As the U.S. Conference of Bishops said in its 2007 statement "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship," the right to life is "the most basic and fundamental right" and "is not just one issue among many."

Obama does not respect this fundamental right. He is unquestionably the most radical, pro-abortion president ever.

Within the first few months of office, he already has approved federal funding for abortions on foreign soil and for research involving the destruction of human embryos.

He has expressed support for the Freedom of Choice Act, which would eliminate all state restrictions on abortion and require the use of U.S. tax dollars to kill the unborn.

The list goes on and on.

By inviting Obama, Notre Dame has turned its back on the most innocent among us.

One of the key lessons I learned at Notre Dame was the importance of the human person in the eyes of the law. The law school's mission statement addresses this by stressing a "commitment to the relationship between law and social justice."

GUEST COLUMNIST

However, as Pope John Paul II said, any outcry "on behalf of human rights — for example, the right to health, to home, to work, to family, to culture — is false and illusory if the right to life ... is not defended with maximum determination."

Notre Dame has now publicly proclaimed that honoring the president for his positions on "racial equality" is more important than standing up for the unborn. As Bishop John M. D'Arcy of Fort Wayne-South Bend has said, Notre Dame has thus chosen "prestige over truth."

It has publicly rejected the U.S. bishops' 2004 prohibition on Catholic institutions awarding honors to those who reject fundamental Catholic beliefs. In short, it has forsaken its Catholic identity; betrayed its students, alumni and faculty; and caused grave scandal.

Please join me in praying that the university will recognize its error and revoke the invitation. It is not too late.

"For what doth it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and suffer the loss of his own soul?" Matthew 16:26.

Thirty pieces of silver is no price for the souls of the unborn. Mary, our mother, tender strong and true, pray for us.

It's not only Obama who needs to examine conscience

Surveys indicate abysmal lack of catechization of many Catholics

The alarm, criticism and concern surrounding the choice by the University of Notre Dame of President Barack Obama to be its commencement speaker overwhelms a much more serious matter.

As the Obama flap captured the headlines, the release of a Gallup poll should be of equal — or greater — concern, for it deserves as much attention for its long-lasting impact: the abysmal lack of catechization of many Catholics.

Gallup's 2006-2008 Values and Beliefs surveys indicate that fewer Catholics in the United States believe in the Catholic position on a number of moral issues than do non-Catholics.

Critics of the Notre Dame selection of the president to receive an honorary degree and deliver the commencement address say his support of legal abortion and embryonic stem cell research makes him an inappropriate choice for a Catholic university.

The controversy reached such a point that the superior general of the Holy Cross order, which founded Notre Dame, sent a letter from Rome to Obama, asking him to rethink his position on abortion and life issues.

Father Hugh W. Cleary asked the president to "rethink, through prayerful wrestling with your own conscience, your stated positions on the vital 'life issues' of our day, particularly in regard to abortion, embryonic forms of stem-cell research and your position on the Freedom of Choice Act."

Certainly it is a worthwhile invitation to an examination of conscience — and one that should be extended to all Catholics in the United States. There should be as much concern about what Catholics believe as what Obama believes.

One defuser would be to make clear that the university is providing a locus for a speech by the president of the country but avoiding any indication of approving his views by not awarding him an honorary degree.

As arguments swirl about what his appearance connotes, consider this: The Gallup poll revealed 40 percent of Catholics found abortion morally acceptable compared to 41 percent of non-Catholics.

Even without comparison to non-Catholics, the Catholic score on moral acceptability of various issues is atrocious.

Here are the percentages of what Catholics find morally acceptable: having a child out of wedlock, 61 percent; divorce, 71 percent; premarital sex, 67 percent; embryonic stem cell research, 63 percent; the death penalty, 61 percent.

Little comfort can be taken in believing that those figures are diluted by the "twice-a-year" Catholics.

Gallup distinguished regular churchgoing Catholics and non-Catholics from nonregular churchgoing Catholics and non-Catholics.

Consider This

Of weekly church attendees, 24 percent of Catholics found abortion morally acceptable, 53 found embryonic stem-cell research acceptable, 53 percent found premarital sex acceptable and 48 percent felt having a baby out of wedlock was acceptable too.

To paraphrase the warden in the movie "Cool Hand Luke": "What we have here is a failure to catechize."

In commenting on the implications of its findings, the Gallup organization said: "Catholic leaders' objections to the Obama situation could themselves be at least partly a reflection of the leaders' awareness of and concern over the fact that in today's contemporary American culture, there is little differentiation between Catholics and non-Catholics in terms of adherence to conservative Catholic church positions on moral issues."

Father Cleary's invitation to "rethink, through prayerful wrestling with your own conscience, your stated positions on the vital 'life issues' of our day" should be extended beyond President Obama.

One critic of Notre Dame officials said they "didn't understand what it means to be Catholic."

Unhappily, that criticism appears to be too true for too many Catholics.

PUBLISHER'S NOTE

It is evident that action on the important issue of defending unborn human life must proceed along various fronts simultaneously.

Public outcry over Notre Dame's decision must be accompanied by ongoing catechesis in our parishes, public witness by the entire Catholic Church and involvement in the political process in order to promote a culture that protects the sanctity of unborn human life.

The problem of the lack of respect for the right to life of the unborn is so serious in our society that this multi-front approach is essential.

This is a task for laity, clergy, religious, parents and teachers — in short, for everyone.

Oz pulls back the curtain

Embryonic stem cell research advocates put politics, money ahead of sound science

"Pay no attention to that man behind the curtain," mutters the ordinary man posing as the great and powerful Oz in the classic movie "The Wizard of Oz."

This scene recently became reality on "The Oprah Winfrey Show" when Oprah's star doctor and regular guest, Dr. Mehmet Oz, appeared alongside actor, Parkinson's disease victim and embryonic stem cell research proponent, Michael J. Fox.

As Dr. Oz explained how Parkinson's disease affects the brain, he broke from Fox's normal talking points by embracing scientific integrity and said:

"I think, Oprah, the stem cell debate is dead, and I'll tell you why: The problem with embryonic stem cells is that embryonic stem cells come from embryos, like all of us are made from embryos, and those cells can become any cell in the body, but it's very hard to control them and so they can become cancer."

Oz then informed the stunned Fox and Winfrey that with recent advances in adult stem cell research, including the use of induced pluripotent stem (iPS) cells (embryonic-like stem cells reverted from their adult state), Parkinson's disease may be cured in the next decade.

Unfortunately, Dr. Oz is not entirely correct: cures can be expected but the debate over destroying embryos in medical research is not dead. It should be, however, for many important reasons.

After decades of research transplanting embryonic stem cells in animal models, no disease has been treated successfully.

In contrast, evidence of more than 73 diseases and conditions successfully treated with adult stem cells continues to build.

Yet many researchers continue to conduct, and more to advocate, destructive embryonic stem cell research, putting politics, research contracts and job security ahead of sound science.

Scientists who pursue embryo-destructive research despite the noteworthy successes with adult stem cells violate the rights of their week-old human victims by taking their lives.

They also fail in their responsibility to the millions awaiting effective treatments for a vast array of diseases and conditions.

Of course, even if embryonic stem cell research produced successful treatments, the Catholic Church could never advocate its use because it destroys a human person in his or her first week of life.

Each of us began life as a human embryo, and we are, as the Declaration of Independence acknowledges, "created equal" and possess a God-given right to life.

Every child deserves to be conceived and protected within the shelter of a husband and wife's loving embrace.

The fictional Wizard of Oz lacked the courage to be honest with the Emerald Kingdom, but the real Dr. Oz courageously threw back the curtain on false promises.

Let us pray that others in the medical profession and scientific community will have the heart to embrace intellectual honesty and advance cures that we can all live with.

Pope says greed — the root of all evil — triggered economic crisis

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Greed lies at the root of all evil and is the source of the current global economic crisis, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"It is precisely greed that insinuates to us that having is the highest good" in life and yet it is greed that distorts the purpose of material goods and destroys the world, he said April 22 during his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square.

The pope's catechesis dealt with early Christian writers of the East and West, and his talk focused on a little-known, eighth-century Benedictine monk, Abbot Ambrose Autpert.

This French-born abbot lived during a time marked by strong political tensions, nationalism and tribalism, which affected life within the monasteries, he said.

The pope said Abbot Autpert wrote a very popular treatise titled "Conflict Between the Vices and the Virtues" as a way to help his monks combat temptation and face their daily spiritual struggles.

"For each of the 24 vices threatening the soul, he indicated the corresponding virtue that would help the Christian overcome temptation," said the pope.

The abbot taught that greed is the root of all the vices, he said.

"I underline this because in light of the current worldwide economic crisis it reveals itself as being (a) timely (message). We see that this crisis arose precisely from this root of greed," he said.

Abbot Autpert foresaw that the wealthy and the powerful would defend their way of life, saying they were not monks and therefore were not obligated to follow the austere life of an ascetic, the pope said. The abbot said their excuse was valid, but he explained that God offers humanity just two paths and two doors in life: a door that is narrow or wide and a path that is steep or easy, the pope said. God did not point to a third way that was both easy and led to salvation.

"There are many different ways to live, but people, including the rich, must fight against greed, against the desire for appearances, and be against the false sense of freedom," which leads people to think whatever they desire is at their disposal, he said. Everyone, rich and poor, "must find the right path of truth, of love and therefore of the principled life."

The ascetic lifestyle of contemplative religious does not reflect a disregard for the world, creation and beauty, he said.

That would reflect "a disregard for the false vision of the world greed presents to us" and distort "creation and destroys the world."

Spirituality of adults: What is it, exactly?

Joy is living out God's love in everyday life

As winter was coming to an end, I felt it was time for my days to have an infusion of what I simply call "something sunny."

Then I saw an ad in America magazine for a program at Wisdom House, a retreat center not far from where I live.

Elizabeth Dryer, a professor at Jesuit-run Fairfield University in Connecticut, was scheduled to give a program on "Spirituality for Catholic Women."

I signed up. But first I bought her book, "Making Sense of God: A Woman's Perspective."

I immediately knew I was in the right place when I read that "spirituality is the joy of falling in love with God and living out that love in everyday life."

That sentence was something worth meditating on!

At the program, I sat down next to two lovely women, Felicia and Barb, surprised to learn that they lived in my own town and are members of a former parish of mine.

We were actually neighbors!

Felicia and Barb were sponsoring a "ministry of mothers" meeting on Friday mornings. They invited me to join them when I could, which I did a week later.

It was a joyful encounter!

Felicia, a mother of teen triplets, spoke of their mothers ministry as having evolved into a meeting of "companions who share a grounding in faith and a commitment to see all of our life experiences through ministry."

She added, "Now we have re-fallen in love with God."

Barb said, "Our moms ministry has given us the strength to survive what life throws at you all the time."

I cannot justly describe the joy that was in that room, but I knew the source of it.

Often I've been reminded by my Catholic teachers that, where two or three are gathered in his name, God — the source of all joy — is in their midst!

Another book I was reading that week also gave me a spiritual boost.

In "Listening to God's Word," award-winning Catholic author Alice Camille explains in her introduction that her book is "to facilitate that holy crossing from the world of the Bible to the world in which we live and move and have our being."

And she adds a truth as only someone deeply immersed in the study of our religious history could:

"If our citizenship in the reign of God does not influence our citizenship in this world, we may well be holding a false passport."

Camille begins her book by telling of a time when she suffered from a depression she said she couldn't shake.

She asked God "testily": "So what do you want from me?" and told him, "Forget happiness. ... I'd settle for meaning. I long for a reason to do something, anything," to get away from the future that "yawned so empty."

What she learned is that "God works in mysterious ways." She picked up a dust-covered red Bible and read it "from cover to cover."

Her life was changed, and she has ever since affirmed: "We need the Bible. We need it not just as a record of salvation history, but for the sake of what we might call salvation present."

Nothing is better "for the God seeker to read" than this book, she affirms, for it is the story of God's journey and ours.

Camille's book is in a series called "Catholic Spirituality for Adults."

These experiences I've just shared have told me that it truly is about time that spirituality for adults continues to make good headway in our church!

SHEPHERDING CHANGE, ONE PASTRY AT A TIME

Volunteer Meghan Hurley, 23, of Medford Lakes, N.J., takes an order from a customer at the Good Shepherd Bakery in Cusco, Peru, March 24. The bakery, started 10 years ago by Good Shepherd nuns, financially supports the education of its young Peruvian waitresses.

Good Shepherd-run bakery opens doors for Peruvian women

CUSCO, Peru (CNS) — It's midmorning and the Good Shepherd Bakery is bustling. Customers sip coffee and snack on pastries served by teenage girls in spotless aprons. Most do not know that each purchase puts the waitresses a little closer to finishing their education.

"We educate with just the bakery," said Good Shepherd Sister Irene Roman Aranibar. "Every customer who comes in is a benefactor."

All income from the bakery, which the sisters started 10 years ago in this tourist center, is used to support the 20 young women who have come from remote rural areas to finish their studies.

For the past year and a half, Meghan Hurley, 23, a Good Shepherd volunteer from Medford Lakes, N.J., has worked with the young women in the bakery, helping them with their studies and lending a friendly ear.

Hurley's mission vocation was sparked while at Cabrini College in Philadelphia. An internship at Catholic Relief Services, the U.S. bishops' international relief and development agency, was followed by a six-month volunteer stint in rural El Salvador.

"I learned so much," she said. "It taught me about myself and what I wanted to do with my life. I really liked the cross-cultural experience and the chance to help people develop themselves and get out of poverty."

She also discovered that change comes slowly and cannot be driven by outsiders. "You have to go and listen to what people really need," she said. "Sometimes it's not what you do, but the relationships you build."

An emphasis on building cross-cultural relationships and understanding was one of the things that attracted her to the Good Shepherd volunteer program.

"You come (to another country) and don't know anything. You have to start from the bottom," she said.

Young women in rural areas around Cusco, in Peru's southern highlands, face many difficulties. Some are lured to the city with offers of work in hotels or restaurants, but end up virtually enslaved by employers who invent reasons to withhold much of their pay.

For others, waiting tables in bars or restaurants is the first step into prostitution. Girls as young as 12 and 13 have been found in brothels in Cusco, where tourism drives the sex trade. Drugs, street crime and gangs are other risks for young people arriving in the city from rural areas.

Amid the problems, Sister Aranibar sees the Good Shepherd Bakery as a beacon of hope, although it cannot reach all the young women who need assistance. The bakery takes in females ages 14-20 and helps them learn marketable skills.

"We'd like to be able to accept more, but we don't have the capacity and the cost is high," Sister Aranibar said.

Income from the bakery and coffee shop does not always stretch to cover the girls' expenses. Nevertheless, Sister Aranibar said, "We never lack the Lord's providence."

When Hurley returns home in November, she said she will look at international issues differently.

People in the United States "need to think more about how their actions affect people here," she said. "It's not just politics. (Things like) what you buy, where you go to dinner affects people here more than we ever realize. I don't think people realize where their clothes come from or where their coffee comes from. But the people here know."

Despite the difficulties, she recommends volunteer programs like hers for laypeople her age.

"It's a growing experience and a learning experience," she said. "If you're thinking about doing it, do it."

Cardinal urges House members to co-sponsor Pregnant Women Support Act

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Whatever their position on abortion, any House members who agree that "no woman should ever have to undergo an abortion because she feels she has no choice" or alternatives should co-sponsor the Pregnant Women Support Act, said Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia.

The legislation "provides an authentic common ground, an approach that people can embrace regardless of their position on other issues," said the cardinal, chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Pro-Life Activities, in an April 24 letter to House members.

"An abortion performed under ... social and economic duress meets no one's standard for 'freedom of choice,'" he added.

The bill provides "many kinds of life-affirming support for pregnant women and their unborn children," Cardinal Rigali said, adding that it "reaches out to women with a helping hand when they are most vulnerable, and most engaged in making a decision about life or death for their unborn children."

The Pregnant Women Support Act would include providing grants to support centers offering alternatives to abortion; assisting colleges and universities in providing support for pregnant and parenting students; increasing support for adoption programs; and requiring abortion facilities to get informed consent, including providing information about alternatives to abortion.

Cardinal Rigali praised the legislation for not raising "the entirely separate issue of seeking to reduce pregnancies through government promotion of contraceptives."

"That issue raises serious questions regarding priorities in health care as well as the conscience rights of patients and health care providers, which demand a serious debate of their own," he said. "In the meantime, pregnant women need our assistance now so that abortion is not promoted to them as their only choice."

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope meets Britain's Prince Charles, duchess of Cornwall

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — On a European tour to promote ecological initiatives, Britain's Prince Charles and his wife, Camilla, met April 27 with Pope Benedict XVI.

The three spent 15 minutes speaking privately before the prince introduced members of his entourage and exchanged gifts with Pope Benedict.

The pope gave the prince a set of medals marking the just-entered fifth year of his pontificate and an etching of St. Peter's Basilica from the 1500s.

Presenting his gift to the pope, Prince Charles said, "I don't know that these will be of any help to you."

The gift was a set of 12 dessert plates with paintings of flowers grown at his Highgrove Estate.

The plates are part of a collection of items the prince sells at his Highgrove shop to raise money for charity.

"Thank you very much," the pope said after receiving the plates.

The prince and the duchess of Cornwall also gave the pope an autographed photo of themselves.

Prince Charles, along with his first wife, the late Princess Diana, met Pope John Paul II at the Vatican in 1985. He postponed his 2005 marriage to Camilla Parker-Bowles in order to attend Pope John Paul's funeral. As Pope Benedict walked him out of the library April 27, Prince Charles was overheard to say, "Such a wonderful man; we miss him terribly."

In a statement issued after the meeting, the Vatican said, "The cordial discussions provided an opportunity for an exchange of views on certain questions of mutual interest, including the human promotion and development of peoples, environmental protection and the importance of intercultural and interreligious dialogue for furthering peace and justice in the world."

Holly Rd., in Grace Auditorium on the 3rd floor of St. Leo Hall, May 3 at 7 p.m. Featured speakers will include Legion of Christ Father Todd Belardi, Formation Director for Pinecrest Academy Boys School in Atlanta, and Peter Freissle, President of Polydeck Screen Corporation which provides screening equipment to the mining industry. Father Belardi will speak on the topic "Faithful Catholic Fathers and Their Children." Freissle will speak on the topic "Christian Values in the Workplace." LCWR officers meet with Vatican officials, including Cardinal Levada

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Four top officers of the U.S. Leadership Conference of Women Religious met at the Vatican in late April with the head of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, who had ordered a "doctrinal assessment" of the group's activities.

The president, president-elect, past president and executive director of the organization of superiors of most of the women's religious orders in the United States met April 22 with U.S. Cardinal William J. Levada, prefect of the doctrinal congregation.

They also met April 24 with officials of the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, said Sister Annmarie Sanders, a member of the Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary and LCWR director of communications.

The leaders, who had been planning their Vatican visit before they learned of the doctrinal investigation, also met with officials of the Congregation for Eastern Churches and the pontifical councils for Justice and Peace, Migrants and Travelers, and Interreligious Dialogue.

In a Feb. 20 letter, Cardinal Levada informed the LCWR about the investigation, which will be headed by Bishop Leonard P. Blair of Toledo, Ohio, a member of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Doctrine.

Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, Vatican spokesman, said Cardinal Levada asked Bishop Blair "to undertake in the coming months a study regarding doctrinal problems that have presented themselves in the area of female religious life in the United States."

The doctrinal assessment was presented as a follow-up to a 2001 meeting between LCWR leaders and officials of the doctrinal congregation. At the 2001 meeting, the women religious were asked to report on "the initiatives taken or planned" to promote acceptance of Vatican teachings on "the problem of homosexuality," the ordination of women to the priesthood and the 2000 declaration "Dominus Iesus."

A statement issued April 23 by the four LCWR officers who were in Rome did not mention any of the subjects discussed with the Vatican officials.

The members of the conference, which is based in Maryland, represent about 95 percent of the 67,000 women religious in the United States.

Sebelius confirmed, sworn in as Health and Human Services secretary

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The Senate confirmed Gov. Kathleen Sebelius of Kansas as secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services by a 61-35 vote April 28 and she was sworn in to the post hours later.

During the Senate debate, Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., who is Catholic, attributed the delay in confirming Sebelius to "petty politics" and praised the Obama administration for its commitment to base department decisions "on the best available science, not the political ideology of the moment."

But Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., expressed fear that the health care reform plan promoted by President Barack Obama and Sebelius would lead to a government-run health system and reduce consumer choice.

Sebelius, who is Catholic, has drawn strong criticism from Archbishop Joseph F. Naumann of Kansas City, Kan., who said in 2008 that she should not present herself for Communion until she publicly repudiates her support for abortion.

The archbishop said his decision was based on Sebelius' "30-year history of advocating and acting in support of legalized abortion."

Even before Sebelius' nomination was formally announced in early March, a group called Catholics for Sebelius launched a Web site touting the governor's Catholic background and her actions in support of "the common good."

Face masks are seen on a man and a statue of St. Jude, patron of desperate situations, during a prayer service outside San Hipolito Church in Mexico City April 28. Most churches in the city remained closed because of the swine flu outbreak. Cardinal Norberto Rivera Carrera of Mexico City had canceled Masses in the archdiocese April 26.

SWINE FLU SYMPTOMS

Symptoms of the swine flu are similar to those of the common flu and include fever, runny nose, sore throat, body aches, fatigue, lack of appetite, nausea, vomiting and diarrhea.

WANT MORE INFO?

Continuously updated information about the swine influenza virus is available online from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention at www.cdc.gov/flu/.

As swine flu spreads, Mexican cardinal prays doors in the Metropolitan Cathedral for about 50 people who had been permitted to enter. In his homily, he called on the Mexican people to never lose hope and to assist each another during the crisis. He also prayed to Our Lady of Guadalupe for intervention, noting that she had helped during pandemics four times since 1554.

"We beg for your protection and help for quickly overcoming the epidemic that has affected our nation," Cardinal Rivera prayed. "Cover us with your cloak; free us from this evil."

Later in the day, an image of Christ on the cross — known as the "Lord of Health" — was removed from its spot in the cathedral for the first time since 1850 and carried in a procession around central Mexico City. The "Cristo," as the image is known, has been credited with past miracles, including intervention in an 1850 cholera outbreak.

In Mexico City, as the disease spread, face masks were common, traffic was light and many businesses stayed closed. The swine flu forced the closure of schools, universities, museums and several other tourist attractions throughout the country.

As the United States confirmed the flu-related death of a 23-month-old in Texas April 28 and more than 60 cases of the illness, Catholic bishops suggested ways that pastors could alter the celebration of Mass in an effort to prevent the spread of the virus.

Bishops in the dioceses of Dallas and Austin, Texas, encouraged pastors to avoid Communion under both species and offer only the host. They also highlighted the importance of good hygiene among eucharistic ministers.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, at press time it was up to individual pastors to determine if changes during Mass were necessary in their parishes. At least one Charlotte-area church was encouraging parishioners to not shake hands during the sign of peace and to not hold hands during the Lord's Prayer.

While it remained up to individual bishops to decide whether or not they wanted to make changes to the Mass, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Secretariat of Divine Worship said in a statement in late April it did not feel that widespread liturgical adaptations were necessary at that time to prevent the spread of the swine flu.

In England, where at least three cases have been reported, the Diocese of Lancaster April 29 published an online booklet called "Sustaining Pastoral Presence: Influenza Outbreaks," with information about the swine flu and preventive measures for chaplains and clergy.

Cases have been confirmed in Canada, Germany, Austria and Israel. Although no cases have been reported in Egypt, the government there announced April 28 that it would begin slaughtering pigs as a preventive measure.

According to the World Health Organization, the swine flu cannot be contracted by eating well-cooked pork products. The WHO's pandemic alert level is phase 4, two levels below a full pandemic outbreak.

No cases had been confirmed in Asia as of April 29.

Initially, New York City's cases were related to St. Francis Preparatory School, which closed the week of April 27 "because of the number of students with flulike symptoms," the school said on its Web site.

"The New York City Health Department is working closely with your school's administration to ensure that measures are in place to provide you with up-to-date information on how to protect yourself from infection," the department said in a note to students distributed by the school.

Tapestries depicting five new saints hang from the facade of St. Peter's Basilica during a Mass of canonization led by Pope Benedict XVI April 26 at the Vatican.

part of our planet," the pope said.

The pope celebrated the canonization Mass in St. Peter's Square April 26, joined by tens of thousands of pilgrims who held up photos or drawings of the saints. Four of the new saints were Italian and one was Portuguese.

In his homily, the pope said the saints' life stories hold valuable lessons for modern Christians. Each of the newly canonized had a special devotion to the Eucharist, and each transformed that spiritual power into social action, he said. The five new saints are:

— St. Arcangelo Tadini, a parish priest from the northern Italian area of Brescia, who preached strongly in defense of workers' rights during the industrialization period of the late 1800s. He organized an association to help factory workers, established a spinning mill to give young girls of the area gainful employment, and eventually founded a religious order of sisters who worked alongside women in the factories.

Pope Benedict said his Gospel-inspired social activity was "prophetic" and is particularly relevant in the current economic crisis. He said the saint taught people that a deep personal relationship with Christ is the key to bringing Christian values into the workplace.

— St. Bernardo Tolomei, who, inspired by his love for prayer and for manual labor, founded a unique Benedictine monastic movement in Italy in the 14th century.

Born in Siena, he was forced by an onset of blindness to give up a public career, and he decided to found a small hermitic community. He later founded the monastery of Santa Maria di Monte Oliveto Maggiore, and died in 1348 of the plague while helping victims of the disease; his burial place, in a common pit, has never been found.

The pope called him "an authentic martyr of charity" and said his service to others was an inspiration to all.

— St. Nuno de Santa Maria Alvares Pereira, a Portuguese army hero in the late 1300s, who, after the death of his wife, abandoned his military career and gave up his wealth to enter a Carmelite monastery. In particular he helped the poor. He fasted in Mary's honor three days of the week.

The pope said he was happy to canonize a person whose faith grew while in the military, a context generally viewed as unfavorable to holiness. It demonstrates that the values and principles of the Gospel can be realized in any situation, especially when they are employed for the common good.

— St. Geltrude Comensoli, born in the mid-19th century, who established a religious institute dedicated to the adoration of the Eucharist. In approving the institute in 1880, Pope Leo XIII asked her to include as part of its mission the education of young female factory workers. Pope Benedict said this connection of contemplative charity with "lived charity" was particularly important "in a society that is lost and often wounded like our own."

He said the saint's life shows that adoration takes precedence over acts of charity, because "from love for Christ died and resurrected, and truly present in the Eucharist, comes that evangelical charity that pushes us to consider all men as brothers."

— St. Caterina Volpicelli, who founded a community of sisters centered on Eucharistic adoration and service to the poor, especially young orphans, in the slums of Naples in the mid-1800s.

The pope said she correctly saw that in order to bring the Gospel to bear on society it was necessary to "liberate God from the prisons in which man has confined him."

The pope said he hoped the new saints would inspire people to witness the Gospel courageously in their daily lives.

Vatican-Israeli commission reports progress ruled out the possibility that an agreement could be reached before Pope Benedict XVI makes his Holy Land pilgrimage in mid-May.

The Vatican and Israeli members of a bilateral working commission met April 23 in Jerusalem and reported in a joint communiqué, that "meaningful progress was achieved after receiving a report from a working group."

The commission scheduled another meeting at the plenary level on April 30 and reaffirmed its "joint commitment to conclude the agreement as soon as possible."

Vatican sources said that although there was room for optimism in the talks, there was technically no way to finalize an accord before the pope makes his May 8-15 pilgrimage to Jordan, Israel and the Palestinian territories.

The announcement of the papal visit late last year put "wind in the sails" of the negotiations, said one source, but the issues have proven too complicated to rush an agreement in time for the pope's arrival in Jerusalem. That was never the aim of the papal visit anyway, the source said.

Both sides have avoided any comment on the substance of the talks, which began in 1999. But knowledgeable church sources said that the issues discussed in the negotiations included:

— Protection of church properties, especially holy places, from government appropriation.

— Restitution of some properties that have been confiscated, including the site of the shrine church in Caesarea, which was expropriated and razed in the 1950s.

— Consolidation and confirmation of historic tax exemptions that have existed for church institutions in the Holy Land.

The sources emphasize that the church needs these exemptions in order to survive, and that they are comparable to tax breaks offered religious entities in the United States.

— Access to the Israeli court system for church institutions whenever property disputes arise.

Vatican, Arab League sign new agreement

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican and the 22-member League of Arab States have signed an agreement to strengthen joint projects to promote peace and dialogue, especially on political and cultural levels.

The official memorandum of understanding was signed April 23 at the Vatican by Archbishop Dominique Mamberti, secretary for relations with states, and Amr Moussa, secretary-general of the Arab League.

Pope Benedict XVI met privately with Moussa, a former foreign minister of Egypt, at the Vatican April 24.

According to a Vatican statement, the new agreement "further consolidates the bonds of collaboration existing between the Holy See and the League of Arab States, especially on a political and cultural level in favor of peace, security and regional and international stability."

The agreement also "proposes instruments of consultation between the two parties with attention also to initiatives of interreligious dialogue."

Women religious from seven Dominican communities formalize their merger with a service April 14 in St. Louis, Mo.

Seven communities of Dominican sisters merge to form one congregation

BY MARNIE McALLISTER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — Seven communities of Dominican sisters formally merged April 12 to form a new congregation called the Dominican Sisters of Peace.

The congregation will be based in Columbus, Ohio, home to the former Dominican Sisters of St. Mary of the Springs, one of the founding communities.

The sisters gathered April 14 for a ceremony in St. Louis to formalize the merger.

"There is a great sense of hope, great energy and great commitment to the mission" among the 265 sisters who gathered in St. Louis, said Sister Joan Scanlon, who has been elected to the new congregation's leadership council.

Her community was the Dominican Sisters of St. Catharine, Ky.

"It is very historic when seven congregations have ended and committed to come together," she said. "We have hundreds of years of ministry behind us."

The new congregation is comprised of Dominican communities from five states.

In addition to the 187-year-old St. Catharine community and the Columbus Dominicans, it is made up of the Dominican Congregation of St. Rose of Lima in Oxford, Mich.; the Dominican Sisters, Congregation of Mary, and the Eucharistic Missionaries of St. Dominic, both of New Orleans; the Dominican Sisters of Great Bend, Kan.; and the Sisters of St. Dominic of Akron, Ohio.

The Dominican Sisters of Peace has about 650 sisters serving in 29 states and in Honduras, Nigeria, Peru, Tanzania and Vietnam. The congregation also has about 500 associates — lay men and women who are partners in ministry with the sisters.

More than a third of the Dominican Sisters of Peace attended the first chapter meeting April 15-21 in St. Louis to elect leaders and articulate their mission.

Sister Margaret Ormond, formerly of St. Mary of the Springs in Columbus, was elected prioress during an April 19 election. Other sisters were elected to serve as councilors. They will take office Aug. 8 on the feast of St. Dominic.

In the meantime, the former leaders of the founding communities have formed a transition team, said Sister Joye Gros, who was president of the St. Catharine community during the formation of the new congregation.

She said the congregation's leadership will work in central offices located in Columbus. Campus buildings at St. Catharine College, near Springfield, Ky., will also host some offices.

Each of the motherhouses belonging to the founding communities will remain in use because sisters are living there.

In determining how the new congregation will serve the church, the sisters pledged to devote themselves to studying Scripture, promoting nonviolence and justice, and creating welcoming communities.

Sister Scanlon said the work of the newly formed congregation will focus primarily on the Dominican charism "to preach the truth."

"The call to preach the truth and give to others the fruits of our contemplation are at the heart of our Dominican life," she said.

Since 2002, Toribio has volunteered in Hispanic ministry in Charlotte and Winston-Salem while discerning her vocation as a Sister of St. Francis. Toribio will minister in Chiapas, Mexico, with Franciscan Sister Linda Scheckelhoff, a former Hispanic minister in the Diocese of Charlotte, until August, when she will then take formation classes and work with the poor of Mexico City.

Answering God's call to religious life is based on trust, says pope

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Embracing a religious vocation is not about feeling worthy or strong enough to be one of God's privileged ministers and witnesses, said Pope Benedict XVI.

It is about trusting God so much that one can answer God's divine call without hesitation, he said in his message for the World Day of Prayer for Vocations.

"What is asked of those who are called, for their part, is careful listening and prudent discernment, a generous and willing adherence to the divine plan, and a serious study of the reality that is proper to the priestly and religious vocations, so as to be able to respond responsibly and with conviction," he said.

The papal message for the day of prayer, which will be observed May 3 in most countries, was released March 31 at the Vatican. The 2009 theme is "Faith in the Divine Initiative — The Human Response." In his message, Pope Benedict said it is God who chooses some to follow his Son, Jesus, more closely and to put themselves fully at the service of the church.

Answering God's call "is never patterned after the timid self-interest of the worthless servant who, out of fear, hid the talent entrusted to him in the ground," the pope said, citing Matthew's Gospel parable of the talents.

Rather, it is a prompt and "ready adherence to the Lord's invitation," which is rooted in complete trust in God's plan, he said.

The pope acknowledged the "worrying shortage of priests" in some parts of the world as well as the difficulties and obstacles the church can encounter. However, God's children can find strength in their unshakeable faith that God is firmly guiding the church toward the fullness of the kingdom and it is the Lord "who freely chooses persons of every culture and of every age and invites them to follow him according to the mysterious plans of his merciful love," he said.

While God calls some people to special forms of service, all Catholics have a duty to keep God's appeal for vocations to the priesthood and religious life constantly in their prayers.

"We must pray that the whole Christian people grows in its trust in God, convinced that the 'Lord of the harvest' does not cease to ask some to place their entire existence freely at his service so as to work with him more closely in the mission of salvation," he said.

Heeding the call

Desire to enter religious life a lifelong ambition

On a crisp and cloudy fall day last year, I stood atop the lighthouse in Cape May County, N.J., with my new boyfriend.

The view was limited — all I could see was the retreat center for the Sisters of St. Joseph on the beach below.

I burst into tears.

"I was supposed to be a nun!" I exclaimed through sobs. My boyfriend was shocked, but I was relieved.

Within two weeks, we broke up. I quit my job at a daily newspaper in Philadelphia and I headed back to North Carolina to answer a call that I had been pondering and praying about for about a year; a call that I sensed since childhood — the call to religious life.

I started that year of discernment with a weeklong silent retreat and then went cross-country to visit five religious orders.

At Easter, I heard from a friend's brother about a monastery of nuns that "might move to North Carolina." It took nearly six months to track down these cloistered sisters, who are currently living in Ohio.

Upon discovering their phone number, I called and blurted out to the unsuspecting nun on the other end of the line, "I'd like to enter your convent!"

After I made the required visit, I asked for entrance. When I walked back into the chapel before the Blessed Sacrament, gratitude to God and his Blessed Mother overwhelmed me.

Only one obstacle remained: student loans. I had been careful to manage my money well, yet I still had about $10,000 remaining.

Alas, I had to go back to work and got a job I had wanted since college graduation — writing for a diocesan Catholic newspaper!

So, now at the "top of the game" in my writing career, I was working only to make the money to pay off a loan and quit the job!

It reminds me of all that God calls us to detach from in order to hear his voice and answer his call. Car, clothes, vacations, Facebook — exchanged for a 5 a.m. wake-up call and the floor-length brown habit of St. Clare with coordinating hip-length black veil.

Naturally, my suborned will and pride will be the hardest to forgo. I could clutch to some of it, like my goal of publishing a book one day, but a small voice beckons, "Is it worth your vocation?"

Guest Column

MARY B. WORTHINGTON
GUEST COLUMNIST

"No," I answer.

I'll take none of these things with me when I die, so I'll take none with me when I enter the Poor Clares of Perpetual Adoration.

For the past eight years, I have been active in the pro-life movement on local and national levels. Through my work, I realized it is prayer that is the most effective means of saving souls and ending abortion.

I never imagined that would lead to a life of prayer in a contemplative, cloistered monastery.

My mission territory will become the whole world. Praying and sacrificing for the salvation of souls — out of love for Jesus, my mystical spouse — is the "work" of a cloistered nun.

The 1999 Vatican document "Verbi Sponsa," the Instruction on the Contemplative Life and on the Enclosure of Nuns, describes the cloistered vocation as "a silent emanation of love and superabundant grace in the pulsing heart of the church."

To young women and men who are considering calls to the religious life, don't be afraid to say "yes" to God first! Don't fall for the pressure of our society to chase other dreams and goals first, especially if they may result in the loss of your soul.

Most religious orders and dioceses accept young people at the age of 18 or 19 to begin formation. And if you're not sure, talk to a priest, or read a book such as "Come and Follow Me" by Father Stefano Maria Manelli, founder and minister general of the Franciscans of the Immaculate.

Please pray for me, that I will be a good and holy nun. Our diocese will be close to my heart!

Mary B. Worthington, a correspondent with The Catholic News & Herald, will enter the Poor Clares of Perpetual Adoration on May 3.

engage in theological discussions with students and faculty.

"What brings me light and joy is being in dialogue with Divinity School students on theological issues," she said.

"She makes Catholicism 'user friendly,'" said Ginny Ireland, director of admissions and student services for the Wake Forest University School of Divinity. "She is able to communicate the faith across denominational and cultural lines."

Catholicism is actually the largest denomination represented among undergraduate students on the WFU campus, according to Sister Rivera-Williams. There are approximately 100 to 150 students who attend weekly Catholic campus ministry meetings.

However, within the School of Divinity, the religious representation is predominantly Baptist, followed by Methodist and Episcopalian. Within that realm, Sister Rivera-Williams is definitely the exception.

However, as the only African American sister in the state of North Carolina, she is used to being somewhat of a novelty.

Intrinsic yearning

Sister Rivera-Williams celebrated her jubilee anniversary as a Sister of Mercy during a Mass at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte in 2008.

She believes her calling to religious life was intrinsic, dating back to the time "when I was being formed in my mother's womb," she said.

A North Carolina native, Sister Rivera-Williams was born in Winston-Salem, where she attended Catholic school as a child.

She remembers playing church with her friends in the neighborhood when she was 5 years old.

"There was something in me way back then that was calling me to church ministry," said Sister Rivera-Williams.

"When I look back I can really see God's finger on all of that," she said.

In middle school, she lived across

When she was in seventh grade, there was one sister who used to play basketball and football with the students. That was when her perception of women religious began to change. That was when she realized they were human.

on the Wake Forest University campus in Winston-Salem April 24. Sister Rivera-Williams is a pastoral resident in the school office and got to know the Sisters of St. Joseph, who ran the school at the time.

During her junior year, one of the sisters asked if she had ever considered a vocation to religious life.

At that point, she still had never seen a black sister.

"I didn't think it was something I could do," she said.

After high school, she attended Sacred Heart College in Belmont. It was there she met Mercy Sister Pauline Clifford.

"Everyone went to her room on Saturday mornings to eat cereal and watch cartoons," said Sister Rivera-Williams. "She seemed so alive, so real. That was the first real experience I had with a Sister of Mercy."

In terms of role models, she said that there wasn't one particular sister who had an influence on her.

However, she does have a deep appreciation for the role of women religious in the history of the church in North Carolina.

"A lot of the workings in the church would not have matured nor manifested had it not been for the sisters," she said.

Eight years after she graduated from college, Sister Rivera-Williams entered the convent of the Sisters of Mercy.

Now, almost 26 years later, she feels confident in her decision to pursue her calling to religious life.

"There is always something in every day that makes me grateful for what I'm doing," she said.

Education and ecumenism

This year marks Sister Rivera-Williams' seventh year on the WFU campus. However, she's been an educator for much of her time as a Sister of Mercy.

She taught religion at her alma mater, Bishop McGuinness High School, from 1980-1982 and at Charlotte Catholic High School from 1986 to 1996. In 1995, she was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis (MS), which resulted in her having to step down from her teaching position.

"I no longer had the energy to move around," she said.

It was at that point that she asked to come home to Winston-Salem.

She returned to her home parish, St. Benedict the Moor Church, where she served as a pastoral associate.

"I was the first Sister of Mercy to come to the Winston-Salem area," said Sister Rivera-Williams.

While she was working at the church, she began taking a course in clinical pastoral education.

As part of her certification, she served as the weekend volunteer chaplain at Wake Forest Baptist Medical Center.

With her MS in remission, she began teaching a course on the art of ministry at the WFU School of Divinity.

From there, she took a position as a pastoral resident in the School of Divinity, where she served as "a liaison between students and faculty."

Then three years ago, she took the position as assistant chaplain of the university. She said she likes this position because it has provided her with "access and availability to the whole campus," where as before, with her pastoral residency, she was limited to working with the 100 students in the School of Divinity.

As assistant chaplain, she provides spiritual direction and counseling, or what she likes to refer to as "compassionate listening."

"She has a great sense of humor and she is a great listener," said Anne Jones, a first-year Divinity School student. "We all come here and dump our worries on her and we leave laughing."

"She has been a true friend and a good mentor," said Reggie Mathis, a third-year Divinity School student.

"The space she creates with her presence is a wonderful respite," like "a breath of fresh air," he said.

Powerful presence

There isn't anything typical about Sister Rivera-Williams.

"She breaks every stereotype of a Catholic sister," said WFU's Ireland.

"To witness and to live out the Gospel values, which I think were modeled and articulated by what we can grasp from Scripture," that is the role of women religious in the church today, said Sister Rivera-Williams.

"There is no wrong way, there is no right way," she said, but "I'm constantly striving and hoping that we're doing it God's way."

In terms of her role at WFU, she said, "I feel that my being here has given people a whole different appreciation for the Catholic Church."

In that respect, her presence alone is one of the biggest parts of her ministry.

"You can't change or make an impression on anyone if you leave or walk out," she said.

Bird's-eye view: Children's book portrays personal side of pope

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — A new children's book offers a bird's-eye view of Pope Benedict XVI's pontificate, with insider tidbits on his daily routine and his personal interests.

Published with the Vatican's blessing, it's the latest effort to humanize a pope who may seem a remote figure to many people around the world — and even to some inside the Vatican.

"Max and Benedict: A Solitary Sparrow Recounts the Pope's Day" was released in Italian and German to coincide with the fourth anniversary of Pope Benedict's election April 19. The book's narrator is a sparrow named Max who nests on St. Peter's dome and eavesdrops from the pope's window ledge.

Illustrated with watercolors, the book's 52 pages contain no startling revelations. But its sympathetic tone and its charming array of details provide a portrait of the pontiff that is largely missing from news coverage.

This is a pope who listens to each of his guests with great attention, who strolls through the Vatican Gardens daily with friends and who, in the evening, enjoys a piece of apple strudel before sitting down to play the piano.

Pope Benedict is timid and reserved by nature, something "that can be mistaken for coldness," our narrator informs us. But in fact, he says, the pope has a subtle sense of humor that surfaces throughout the day.

"He's not the type of person who tells one joke after another, but he sees the amusing aspects of life," according to Max the sparrow.

One point hammered home early in the book is that the pope spends most of his day surrounded by people and is rarely alone. That echoes the words of Pope Benedict himself, who twice in recent weeks has rejected speculation about his supposed isolation and joked about the "myth of my solitude."

This seems to be a message the pope and his aides want to get out.

In 2007, the book's author, Jeanne Perego, wrote a similar account of Pope Benedict's election as seen through the eyes of a cat, with the help of the pope's personal secretary, Msgr. Georg Ganswein. The latest book includes a preface by Father Damiano Marzotto, who worked with the pope for 23 years at the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

"I can say he was a tireless worker, but was above all a likable and cordial person. I hope reading this book will help many people, especially children, to know the pope better," Father Marzotto wrote.

It may in fact be easier for a curious sparrow to track the pope's day than for the thousands of Vatican employees who rarely, if ever, see the pontiff at work.

A watercolor from the children's book, "Max and Benedict: A Solitary Sparrow Recounts the Pope's Day," shows Max the bird narrator eavesdropping on Pope Benedict XVI at the Vatican.

The pope spends most of his time in his apartment or in his adjacent working studio, and access is strictly limited.

The book outlines the pope's average day: He rises at dawn and prays in his private chapel, followed by breakfast. At 8 a.m., he looks at important mail and peruses some daily newspapers, then turns his attention to important documents.

Later in the morning begins a series of private audiences with visiting bishops and cardinals, world dignitaries and various groups. By 1 p.m. the pope is ready for lunch, which is a modest affair, and then he goes up to walk on his private rooftop terrace.

At 3 p.m. he's back at his desk, preparing documents and speeches. At 4 p.m., he takes a brisk afternoon walk with a few aides in the Vatican Gardens where, beneath the chatter of parrots, he prays the rosary and stops briefly at the Grotto of Lourdes at the far end of the gardens.

Then at 5, he returns to his desk to write — these days, he's working on his upcoming second volume of "Jesus of Nazareth." He stops frequently to pull a book from the shelf of his private library.

Later in the evening there are occasionally more private audiences with top Vatican officials. Finally, dinner arrives, and the pope can relax a bit. He watches some TV news, reads a book and plays the piano — "music is his great passion."

The feathered narrator reports that the pope is sometimes baffled by the gifts he receives from visitors and groups, which have included a racing bicycle, a portable pizza oven, a steering wheel from a Formula One race car and a traffic-ticket book.

This is also a pope who loves animals. Presented with four hens at a general audience, the pope now keeps them at his villa outside Rome, where they are presumably safe from culinary dangers.

Editor's Note: Ignatius Press plans to publish an English-language edition of this book in the fall.

Catholic's actions must be consistent with faith

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

When our 16-year-old daughter first earned her driver's license, it was an occasion of great rejoicing on her part and more than a little anxiety on ours.

As we watched her drive away by herself, we realized that she would fully exercise her newfound independence out of the range of our immediate supervision. We had to trust that she was going where she said she would, in the company of persons she knew we would approve of.

When an incident in her senior year of high school tested those boundaries, it took several weeks of responsible behavior for her to prove she was trustworthy enough to regain driving privileges. Even then I had to renew my faith gradually in her integrity, that her future words would be consistent with her actions.

Building, maintaining and sometimes regaining trust applies to other kinds of relationships as well — husband/wife, employer/employee, friend/friend, public servant/constituent — and it is human nature to be cautious once that trust is violated.

In the first reading, the Jerusalem disciples had plenty of reason to distrust Saul. After all, he had fanatically persecuted other followers of Jesus, and the account of his conversion, while compelling, was not immediately reassuring.

But as Saul "spoke out boldly in the name of the Lord," even to the point of endangering his own life, they were gradually convinced of the truth of his story and the depth of his conviction.

The necessity of visible proof of one's faith in Christ leads the writer of John's epistle to admonish: "Children, let us love not in word or speech but in deed and truth."

In the Gospel, Jesus speaks to his disciples about the importance of remaining in him and producing visible signs of his love in the same way that a branch attached to a vine bears much fruit.

Historically, the behaviors of some who have called themselves "Christians" have given humankind many reasons to doubt the validity of their message. Only by fully uniting ourselves with Christ can we love with integrity — thereby regaining the trust of a world that desperately needs to see the evidence and know the truth of God's love.

Questions:

In what way have your actions been inconsistent with your profession of faith? What would help you grow in your integrity as a follower of Christ?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Let us love not in word or speech but in deed and truth. Now this is how we shall know that we belong to the truth" (1 John 3:19).

Student turned filmmaker tells story of Columbine shootings

BY JOHN GLEASON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

DENVER — Filmmaker Andrew Robinson hopes the movie he has made about the shooting tragedy at Columbine High School 10 years ago will have a positive impact on students who see it.

Robinson's film, "April Showers," deals with the violence, death and recovery Columbine's victims went through.

It is a fictional account of an attack on a Midwestern high school and events that take place in the week that follows, as everyone deals with the trauma of loss, being a survivor and trying to make sense of something so senseless.

Robinson was a student at Columbine when, on the morning of April 20, 1999, two fellow students entered the high school in the Denver suburb of Littleton with weapons and began firing on their classmates.

By the time the two youths had taken their own lives, 12 other students and a teacher were dead and more than 20 other people had been wounded.

Ranked as the fourth most deadly school shooting in the United States, Columbine remains the worst mass shooting to have taken place at an American high school. The massacre spurred debate on everything from gun control to violence among youths.

On the eve of the 10th anniversary of the shootings, hundreds of people gathered at a park near the school to remember the victims with a candlelight vigil.

Robinson's film stars Tom Arnold, Illena Douglas, Kelly Blatz and Daryl Sabara. Robinson, who wrote and directed the film, said the dramatized retelling of what it is like to be a Columbine survivor is a story he just couldn't keep inside.

"Truthfully, this came about by accident," he told the Denver Catholic Register, the newspaper of the Denver Archdiocese, prior to an advance screening of the film for media and school officials in March.

"I didn't intend to write it," he explained. "I was working on another project when it kind of wrote itself. Seventy-two hours after I began, the first draft of the script was finished."

Robinson showed the script to some friends who said it was about time a person with the point of view of someone who'd actually been at Columbine told the story.

"I like to think I was healed enough to write this story," he said. "But what I've discovered is the impact it's had on people outside of Columbine."

"I heard from students who never went through a Columbine-like experience, but who have had losses in their life," he said.

"They're now getting something out of this film; they're opening up to friends and parents about things they've never been able to talk about before. That wasn't what I'd intended but I'll take it," he said.

digital services.

Robinson said that all of the film's proceeds from the first week the movie is released will be donated to schools in districts where the movie is shown, as will a dollar from every download of "April Showers" online.

"Schools need our help now more than ever and if a film like 'April Showers' can help turn a negative into a positive by shedding light on aspects of a story never told and also give back to the community that supports it, then it's a win-win," Robinson said.

"We want the movie to be a success of course, but we want it to have a positive impact on the students who see it," he added.

Signis awards film prizes at film festival

WASHINGTON (CNS)—Signis, the international Catholic communications organization, has given the Signis Award to a Japanese film, "Departures," at Filmfest D.C., an annual film festival in the District of Columbia.

The Signis jury cited "Departures" for its "reverence for human dignity," according to an April 27 announcement by jury chairman Frank Frost.

The film's title is derived from its Japanese title, "Okuribito," or "one who sees people off."

The movie combines serious drama with human-foibles comedy to tell the story of an orchestral musician who loses his job in an economic downturn. Returning to his ancestral village, he stumbles into a job assisting a man who "encompasses" the dead. The practitioner he assists educates him in the meticulous rituals that lend dignity to the dead and consolation to the bereaved.

The Signis jury also chose to honor two of the 70 other movies shown at Filmfest D.C., which ran April 16-26, with special commendations.

"The Necessities of Life," a Canadian film directed by Benoit Pilon, tells the story of an Inuit man torn from his family in his Arctic home to be hospitalized for tuberculosis at a Catholic hospital in Quebec, and the cultural gulf that must be bridged by both sides.

The other film, a Japanese entry called "Kabei" directed by Yoji Yamada, tells the story of a man in 1940 Japan who is imprisoned for criticizing the country's "crusade" against China. The problems that beset his family and relatives in the ensuing war years give a fresh perspective on the destructiveness war inflicts on the human fabric.

St. Matthew "YOU"niversity presents – From the Pope to St. Paul to our Priests – and now to YOU!

Pope Benedict XVI had three reasons for proclaiming 2008-2009 the year of St. Paul. He hopes to encourage a scholarly study of the Pauline corpus. He hopes this will lead to an increase of daily study of Paul, deep spiritual reflection on his life and writings, and an explosion of desire on the part of all of us to pattern ourselves after Paul, as Paul patterned himself after the Lord.

In union with our Pope, in communion with our Church, the priests of St. Matthew offer these lectures as part of St. Matthew "YOU"niversity adult enrichment.

Note: In order for you to get the very most out of these lectures, you are invited to read prior to the lecture the designated St. Paul letter and the appropriate chapter from Father Raymond Brown's "Introduction to the New Testament": Anchor Bible Reference Library, Doubleday (available in St. Matthew Gift Shop).

I leave a Legacy Through an Endowment

When you establish an endowment with the diocesan foundation, you...

- Enable Perpetual Support. Every year, your "legacy" flows with financial aid to the ministry you choose.
- Ensure a Strong Future. Allow a parish, school, agency or the diocese to look ahead and plan with confidence.
- Enact a Lasting Legacy. Provide your loved ones with a continuing reminder of your values – your faith and the mission of the church.

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

For the month of May, here is a look at some of the closed Catholic missions in North Carolina

A mission, or quasi-parish, is under the care of a local parish and is a "definite community of the Christian faithful in a particular church, entrusted to a priest as its proper pastor but not yet erected as a parish because of particular circumstances" (Canon 516-1). While a mission may eventually become a parish, some missions are not so fortunate and close.

Some known closed N.C. missions not highlighted below are Bessemer City mission, St. Agnes of Greensboro, Liberty mission, St. Patricia of Linville, St. Benedict of Lowell, Sts. Mary and Joseph of Mount Holly and St. William chapel of Texana.

Charlotte, Our Lady of Providence Mission
Originally a mission of Our Lady of Consolation Church, Our Lady of Providence started in 1964 and was located at 2640 S. Tryon St.

A daycare, Little Folks Nursery, operated as part of the mission. In 1972, the mission was assigned to St. Patrick Cathedral. The daycare closed in 1978, followed by the chapel closing in 1979 and the property being leased.

Cherryville, Immaculate Heart of Mary Mission

The mission's first building was purchased in 1950 while Gaston County remained under the jurisdiction of Belmont Abbey. A new chapel was needed and it was transferred to the Diocese of Raleigh in 1960.

By October 1962, priests celebrated Mass in the newly constructed chapel and the mission came under the custodial care of Christ the King Church in Kings Mountain.

In 1966, St. Therese Church in Mooresville took over the care of the mission. Due to declining attendance and the shortage of priests, it was no longer considered a mission — it became a station whereby only weekday Mass was offered. By the late 1960s, the mission closed and the property eventually leased.

Dallas, St. Vincent Mission

Belmont Abbey monks began ministering in Dallas in the late 1930s. By the time diocesan priests from Christ the King Church in Kings Mountain began serving the mission in the early 1960s, Mass was held in the private family chapel belonging to the Lay and Withers families. Sunday Mass was discontinued in Dallas in the summer of 1963.

Elk Park, Sacred Heart Chapel

Located near the Tennessee border in Avery County, Elk Park was a major station of the East Tennessee and Western North Carolina Railroad. Hence, Elk Park became a "boom town" in the early 20th century. This expansive growth led to the construction of Sacred Heart Chapel through funds from the Catholic Extension Society.

Sacred Heart was dedicated in 1916 but fell into disuse by the late 1920s, and its altar was later placed in St. Bernadette Chapel (predecessor of St. Lucien Church) in Spruce Pine.

Ghio, St. Francis Xavier Mission

St. Francis Xavier Mission dates back to around 1890, when Francis Scholl, a German emigrant, donated three acres of land on the Scotland/Richmond county border for the establishment of a church and cemetery. Throughout its 60 year existence, St. Francis Xavier was a mission of various parishes, including St. James the Greater Church in Hamlet. The mission's chapel burned down in 1948 and was never rebuilt; however, the cemetery (now known as the Scholl Family Cemetery) still exists.

Fontana, Our Lady of the Lake Mission

With the construction of Fontana Dam in the early 1940s, priests from St. John the Evangelist Church in Waynesville periodically visited the village constructed near the dam to minister to the Catholics among the 5,000 workers.

About a decade later, Our Lady of the Lake became an official mission of St. John the Greater Church. St. William Church in Murphy became the caretaker of the mission by mid-1950, when Fontana was becoming a popular tourist destination. Our Lady of the Lake was later re-assigned as a mission of Holy Redeemer Church in Andrews, and priests continued to periodically serve the area through the summer of 1989.

Lance Cove, Immaculate Heart of Mary Mission Chapel

The first Lance Cove chapel was established in 1955 in an abandoned home near the banks of the Hiwassee River, seven miles outside the town of Hayesville. Glenmary priests assigned to St. William Church in Murphy served the Lance Cove mission area. In 1958, a different house was used as a chapel by the growing but poor Lance Cove community. Masses were discontinued in the chapel in September 1960, and the house reverted to being a private residence.

Revere, Chapel of the Little Flower

Constructed in 1931, the Jesuit priests stationed in Hot Springs served the Little Flower chapel. Approximately 30 people attended the first Masses offered in the chapel.

The two priests having the greatest impact on the growth of the Catholic presence in Madison County were Jesuit Fathers L.L. Toups and Andrew Graves. In the beginning, Father Toups and his flock encountered much opposition from the mostly Protestant population. They made attempts to add a school and convent to the property, but due to financial limitations, the project never officially started.

Father Graves served the people of Revere almost continuously from 1937 to 1984. Afterward, Masses were occasionally offered in Revere through the 1980s.

The chapel property sold in 1997.

Sisters of Mercy celebrate renovation of 1899 chapel

Hundreds took vows in Sacred Heart Chapel

BELMONT — With memories still vivid and cherished, the Sisters of Mercy in Belmont celebrated April 15 the renovation of the 110-year-old Sacred Heart Chapel, where a number of sisters worshipped and made their vows.

Taking part in the celebration — which included prayer, Scripture and reflection — were Mercy Sister Paulette Williams, Mercy Sister Michel Boulus, Mercy Sister Mary-Andrew Ray and Mercy Sister Kathy Green, as well as Benedictine Abbot Placid Solari of Belmont Abbey and Dr. William Theirfelder, president of Belmont Abbey College.

"When I walk into the chapel now, I remember the way we were," said Mercy Sister Rosalind Picot, who took her perpetual vows in the chapel in 1960.

"I relive the ceremonies, rituals and prayers, and I relive the sense of community of being together in prayer," she said. "The chapel represents the exterior symbols of internal realities to which we espouse."

Built in 1899, Sacred Heart Chapel, along with the original convent it adjoins, is the oldest building on the campus of the Sisters of Mercy in Belmont. The construction of the chapel and convent was funded by Susie Burns, who later became Mercy Sister Mary Mercedes Burns.

Monks from Belmont Abbey helped clear the land and, according to legend, made the bricks. Until 1962, when a new convent and chapel were built, an estimated 200 sisters took their final vows in Sacred Heart Chapel.

Students at Sacred Heart College continued to use it for the next 25 years.

Sister Ray, who took her final vows in the chapel in 1958, is the North Carolina archivist for the sisters.

"I remember the beauty, the closeness and the many events that took place there," she said. "The history delights me as an archivist. We want to preserve as much as possible of its memory and its heritage."

Sister Jerome Spradley, who took her final vows in 1956, reflected upon how times were different back then.

"We didn't have air conditioning. In the summer, we had two huge fans that almost blew you away, and of course, the windows were open," she said. "In that time, all of us were in the traditional habits."

Fully restored, Sacred Heart Chapel contains many of its original features, including three altars, the hardwood flooring immediately surrounding them, stained glass windows and wooden pews.

"You always want a place like that chapel to continue forever," said Sister Spradley. "To have it restored to its original state is a wonderful thing to all of us who remember it."

"To go into that chapel brings back the commitment I've made to God and community," said Sister Picot. "I remember the sisters who are now deceased who prayed in that chapel and with whom I prayed."

Thank God for Susan Boyle

She gave us a little taste of resurrection joy at Easter

Thank God for Susan Boyle.

Just when we need it, she gives our spirits a lift with a taste of "resurrection joy" in this Easter season.

Unless you have been on retreat with the Trappists, you probably know about Susan Boyle. She is the 47-year-old spinster from Scotland. She is unemployed "but still looking."

She won the hearts of the world singing on Easter weekend on "Britain's Got Talent." In the two weeks following her performance she set a record for the most page views ever on the Internet, with more than 85 million "hits" to see her sing.

Boyle is the most improbable of celebrities. She has the solid figure of a woman whose exercise is household chores. Her hair has rarely, if ever, seen a stylist. She does not own a car or have a driver's license.

She walks everywhere in her village of Blackburn. In 10 minutes she can reach all the essentials of her world: the grocery store, the Happy Valley pub where she sings karaoke, and Our Lady of Lourdes Catholic Church, where she sings in the choir.

Susan lives alone with her cat, Pebbles.

Until her mother died two years ago, she was the caregiver for her elderly parents. The youngest of nine children, Boyle lives in the rented rowhouse where she grew up.

She told Scottish television that she has no boyfriend, had never been on a date and, sadly, has never even been kissed.

The children of the neighborhood admitted on television that they tease her when she walks out in the village. Maybe that is why she kept her dignity when she walked out on that stage in Glasgow before a mocking audience.

The lions. They were ready to tear her apart.

The camera captured teenage girls in the audience rolling their eyes. The judges had smirks on their faces.

Simon Cowell, the professional serpent on these shows, asked her why she had not achieved her dream of becoming a professional singer.

She said simply, "I've never been given the chance, really."

He puffed.

Then she sang.

What a voice!

Boyle sang "I Dreamed a Dream" from "Les Miserables," a sad song about lost innocence and shattered optimism.

Cowell's eyebrow went up. He leaned back in shock. The same smartaleck teens who had rolled their eyes were suddenly on their feet, cheering.

Piers Morgan, one of the judges said, "When you walked out on that stage, everybody was laughing at you. Nobody is laughing now."

Amanda Holden, the third judge, said, "Everybody was against you. That was the biggest wakeup call ever."

I watched the tape over and over again. I cried each time.

The whole world is cheering for Susan Boyle now.

But we aren't cheering just for her.

We're cheering for all the girls who have never been kissed.

For all the people who live alone with their cats.

For all the unemployed people who are "still looking."

For every child who gives up youth and dreams to take care of elderly parents.

For everyone who sings in church choirs for nothing more than the love of God.

We are cheering for all the lonely people around the world who have never "been given a chance, really."

Boyle burst on the scene on Easter weekend. She gave us a little taste of resurrection joy when the impossible happens, when hope is renewed and dreams are realized.

When the Brits are surprised, they say they are "gobsmacked."

I think the whole world was really "God-smacked."

Thank you, Susan.

Public faces and private hearts

Church is place to share struggles, kindness with those in need

Plato said: Be kind, for everyone you meet is fighting a hard battle. What a world it would be if we all kept that in mind.

My friend's husband was recently diagnosed with a heart problem that requires surgery. It was an unexpected diagnosis, falling into their lives like lightning on a still night.

On top of the challenge of open-heart surgery, they were told it would be best to travel to a distant hospital where the procedure is done frequently. So they'll leave home and their local support system and journey to a strange city.

These are both people of faith and generosity, and as soon as they wrestled the news to the ground privately, they openly shared it with our church community.

Yesterday this friend and I helped out with a welcoming reception for new parishioners at our church. At the end of the reception we talked about sharing our lives with others, not just perfunctorily but on the deeper level where we all fight our private struggles.

My friend observed that it's hard having their medical news disseminated far and wide because everyone who sees them inquires about the issue, and sometimes it's wearying, repeating details and answering questions.

Yet, she said, what she has discovered is that the predicament facing her and her husband has a positive aspect: Their trial and their openness prompt others to share their stories.

During the reception, for example, a woman shared with my friend that one of her sons will be admitted to an assisted-living residence for a debilitating illness and another is dealing with a tumor.

Imagine, we both thought, what an ordeal this is for this mom. Yet all I knew of her was her smiling face at church.

Like all of us, she has a public face and a private heart.

That's why I love Plato's quote. It reminds me that each person I meet has a story I really don't know completely.

For the Journey

EFFIE CALDAROLA
CNS COLUMNIST

It doesn't sound like a quote from a Greek philosopher, does it? It sounds so earthy and Christian that I had to look it up again just to make sure Plato said it.

Keeping that quote in mind helps me deal with a grumpy salesclerk or a moody teenager. How little I know of their battles or even those of my own teenager, who picks and chooses what she shares of her heart's struggles.

I've been in my parish for years, and I know a lot of people. So when I look around the church sometimes I can peek behind a facade: I see the man who recently fought a battle with colon cancer and the woman who is faithfully caring for her husband with dementia.

I see a friend who suffered a devastating miscarriage and another whose daughter had a baby as an unmarried teen.

I pray for them as we together receive the body and blood of Christ.

But what I don't see makes me lift my heart in prayer as well: Who struggles with a marriage that is falling apart? Who deals with depression on a daily basis?

Who is battling alcohol or eating disorders? Whose child is at home, refusing to come to church?

My church is the place where I should be able to find someone with whom I can share my private struggle, someone who will listen to my story.

And it's certainly the place where I should encounter people who are kind, because they know everyone is fighting a hard battle.

Earth Day every day!

Caring for God's created world is a Catholic duty

What did you do on Earth Day (April 22)? I took the pledge: the St. Francis Pledge to Care for Creation and the Poor.

Promoted by the Catholic Coalition on Climate Change (www.catholicsandclimatechange.org) in partnership with the U.S. bishops, the St. Francis Pledge asks us to:

— Pray and reflect on the duty to care for God's creation and for the poor and vulnerable.

— Learn about and educate others on the moral dimensions of climate change.

— Assess how we — as individuals and organizations — contribute to climate change (i.e., consumption and conservation).

— Act to change our choices and behaviors contributing to climate change.

— Advocate Catholic principles and priorities in climate change discussions and decisions, especially as they impact the poor and vulnerable.

Caring for God's created world, giving special attention to the poor and vulnerable, is Catholic duty. And no one in the history of the church has lived this duty more faithfully and joyfully than St. Francis of Assisi. So naming the pledge after St. Francis is most appropriate.

Thomas of Celano, a contemporary follower of the saint, wrote that everything of the natural world that met Francis' eyes made him immensely happy!

Making a Difference

TONY
MAGLIANO
CNS COLUMNIST

Proclaiming St. Francis the patron saint of ecology, Pope John Paul II called the church's attention to St. Francis' "genuine and deep respect for the integrity of creation."

Sadly, far too many corporations, political leaders and Christians do not strive to emulate the great saint.

According to Greenpeace (www.greenpeace.org), a leading environmental organization, industrial facilities continue to contaminate our air, water and food with dangerous toxic chemicals.

Forty percent of our nation's rivers are too polluted for fishing or swimming.

But the greatest threat to the natural world is climate change, caused principally by global warming.

Burning fossil fuels — oil, gas and coal — for energy produces huge amounts of heat-trapping gases in the lower atmosphere, the main human source of global warming. The second principal source is deforestation.

According to the respected Union of Concerned Scientists (www.ucsusa.org), since preindustrial times the atmospheric concentration of heat-trapping carbon dioxide has increased 31 percent.

It warns: "This increase in trapped heat changes the climate, causing altered weather patterns that can bring unusually intense precipitation or dry spells and more severe storms."

Increased droughts, floods and catastrophic storms are hurting many people, especially the poor of the world, whose governments often have little resources to assist them.

Please ask your congressional delegation to move forward legislation supporting deep reductions in global-warming gases. Urge new additional funding to help poor nations cope with the painful effects of climate change.

And encourage your legislators to aggressively advance clean alternative energy sources: wind, wave, geothermal and solar.

Starting at the top, the Catholic Church is taking climate change seriously.

Last November the first saplings of the Vatican Climate Forest were planted in Hungary. Some 125,600 trees will be planted to offset Vatican emissions of global-warming carbon dioxide, making it the world's first carbon-neutral nation.

St. Francis proclaimed, "Praised be you, my Lord, for our Sister Mother Earth."

But unlike Francis, we haven't been giving our planet the respect due a sister who cares for us like a mother.

Make a difference! Take the St. Francis Pledge to Care for Creation and the Poor.

Let's make every day Earth Day!

People can learn to see God in world, in others, pope says at audience

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — People can get a glimpse of God in the world and in other people, but they must learn how to recognize it, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"There is a certain visibility of God in the church and in the world, and we must learn how to see it," the pope said April 29 at his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square.

"God created humankind in his image, but this image is covered with so much dirt from sin that it is almost impossible to see," the pope said.

The pope's reflection on images of God in the world flowed from his talk about the writings of St. Germanus, an 8th-century patriarch of Constantinople.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In our catechesis on the early Christian writers of East and West, we turn to St. Germanus, bishop and patriarch of Constantinople, whose feast day is celebrated in the Greek church on 12 May.

In 717, while Constantinople was under siege by Saracen armies, Germanus led a procession with the venerated image of the Theotokos, the Mother of God, and relics of the Holy Cross. The siege was lifted, convincing him that God had responded to the people's devotion.

Some time later however, Emperor Leo III initiated his campaign against the use of sacred images, judging them to be a source of idolatry. When Germanus opposed the emperor publicly in 730, he was forced to retire in exile to a monastery, where he later died. His memory was not forgotten, and in the Second Council of Nicea, which restored devotion to sacred images, his name was honored.

The writings of Germanus, steeped in an ardent love of the church and devotion to the Mother of God, have had a wide influence on the piety of the faithful both of the East and the West.

He promoted a solemn and beautiful liturgy and is also known for his insights in Mariology. In homilies on the presentation and the dormition of the Virgin Mary, Germanus extols her virtue and her mission.

A text which sees the source of her bodily incorruption in her virginal maternity was included by Pope Pius XII in his apostolic constitution, Munificentissimus Deus.

I pray that through the intercession of St. Germanus, we may all be renewed in our love of the church and devotion to the Mother of God.

Letters to the Editor

Restraint, prudence needed with profits

While not purporting to defend Tony Magliano's entire message in "During Lent: What would Jesus do?" (Perspectives, March 20), I find Jack James' criticism of it lacking and fallacious ("Magliano misinterprets greed, solutions," letters to the editor, April 3).

James seems to take the position that it doesn't matter how you get it (profits) as long as you use some of it for the poor.

This sounds like the faulty "ends justify the means" argument to me.

James also likens "the drive to maximize profits" as "striving for excellence." Perhaps germane here is that several popes' encyclicals have for good reasons (some moral) severely criticized both unbridled capitalism as well as communism as economic systems.

Obama does care about nuclear annihilation

There has been much criticism directed at Notre Dame University for inviting President Obama to speak at its commencement ceremony. I understand the criticism as it centers around the president's view on the life issue of abortion.

But recent events offer a wider perspective.

The president recently addressed an almost forgotten moral issue — the threat of nuclear annihilation. Obama wants an immediate end to nuclear tests, confirmed he would seek Senate approval of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty and would hold a global summit on nuclear security within the next year.

His goals closely resemble the ideas expressed in a U.S. bishops' 1983 pastoral letter, "The Challenge of Peace: God's Promise and Our Response."

Obama does differ with Catholic teaching on the issue of abortion, and because of that difference he is called "anti-life."

But he agrees with Catholic teaching on the issue of removing a threat that could destroy the lives of billions of people on this planet.

Obama fails life test

President Obama's speaking abilities get an A+ in my grading book, but his moral perception cannot possibly get a passing grade.

Nor can I give the administration at Notre Dame University a passing grade.

I find it difficult to believe, let alone accept, the administration's choice to invite an individual who has very little affinity for human life.

I realize most of the students welcome such a choice, but sensitivity to wisdom supersedes youth.

'Like a burning ember hidden beneath the ashes'

Pope visits quake zone to strengthen survivors' faith, hope for future

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ONNA, Italy — In a visit aimed at strengthening people's faith and hope for the future, Pope Benedict XVI called for concrete and immediate measures to rebuild towns and villages devastated by a deadly earthquake.

The pope told survivors it had been his desire to come see them from the very moment the earthquake struck this mountainous Italian region April 6.

"I would have liked to have gone to every town and every neighborhood, to all the tent cities and to have met everyone if it had been possible," he said in the makeshift tent encampment a few miles outside L'Aquila.

The pope's April 28 visit took him first to Onna — a tiny village that had once been home to some 300 people. The magnitude 6.3 earthquake reduced buildings in the town to rubble, killing some 40 people and rendering the entire population homeless.

Poor weather conditions forced the pope to travel to the affected areas by car instead of by helicopter.

The severity and extent of the damage was evident even when viewed from the highway encircling L'Aquila. The city and its outskirts have become ghost towns, with streets and parking lots empty of cars and entire apartment buildings dark and shuttered. Several buildings had enormous holes blown out of their walls, looking as if they had been bombarded with rocket fire.

The quake and its aftershocks left some 65,000 people homeless, nearly 300 people dead and another 1,500 injured, according to authorities.

Half of Onna's residents relocated to hotels along the seaside or moved in with relatives. The other half stayed behind, living in government-issued tents. Many of them are elderly, preferring to tend to what little they have left: their chickens, farm animals and vegetable gardens.

At the tent encampment in Onna, the pope expressed his sympathy for those living away from their homes and those living out of their cars or tents, especially with such cold and rainy weather.

"Dear friends, my presence among you is meant to be a tangible sign that the crucified and risen Lord has not abandoned you," he said.

He said God is present and not deaf to their cries for help and their worries after having lost their homes, savings, jobs and loved ones.

The pope said those who lost their lives are with God and that they would want to see their surviving friends and relatives go forward with courage and hope, and the outpouring of help and support cannot end with just emergency.

Efforts must continue and "become a steady and concrete project" so that the city and surrounding towns can rise again, he said.

The pope expressed his concern for the many young people who have been "suddenly forced to tackle a harsh reality," children who can no longer go to school and elderly deprived of their homes.

The pope then warmly greeted residents and aid workers. Mothers brought their babies and toddlers to the pope to be blessed. He then rode through the devastated village in a white civil defense minibus.

One resident of Onna said 99 percent of the buildings are uninhabitable and need to be torn down.

The pope then went on to L'Aquila to visit the severely damaged Basilica of Santa Maria di Collemaggio.

Surrounded by firefighters wearing helmets, the pope went inside to venerate the remains of St. Celestine V, a 13th-century pope who abdicated just a few months after his election. Heaps of debris were still sitting on the floor inside the basilica.

Firefighters warned the papal entourage that it was too dangerous to linger inside. The pope was visibly taken aback by the level of destruction.

The pope then visited the site of a university dormitory that collapsed and claimed eight students' lives. He met with about a dozen students, blessing them and talking with them. He told those who were majoring in engineering to help the town build good homes.

The pope also called for an appropriate solution to be found soon for the thousands of people still living in tents. He made the comments during an outdoor gathering at a military school and barracks just outside L'Aquila. It was the same courtyard where a funeral Mass was celebrated April 10 for some 200 victims of the quake.

To an audience that included local bishops, religious men and women, government authorities, aid workers, rescuers and survivors, the pope said he was deeply moved by their hospitality.

He praised their unified and well-coordinated efforts not only for dealing with the disaster and its aftermath quickly and efficiently, but also for having been motivated by love.

Emergency efforts should never just be a well-oiled machine, he said, but should display "soul and passion."

Solidarity with those in crisis gives a sign of hope amid the darkness "like a burning ember hidden beneath the ashes," he said.

CLOSET FULL OF DREAMS

Mariel D'Andrea, a sophomore at Father Ryan High School in Nashville, Tenn., operates the Becca's Closet charity from her house. She provides donated prom dresses and accessories to young girls who can't afford to buy their own. D'Andrea is one of hundreds of volunteers with the charity that has chapters in at least 30 states.

Catholic teen finds reward in helping girls in need get prom dresses

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (CNS) — Although Mariel D'Andrea's first high school prom is a year away, the Catholic high school sophomore has a closet full of prom dresses, shoes and makeup — all the necessary trappings for that special occasion.

Well actually, none of these items belong to her. They've been donated to D'Andrea for her Becca's Closet initiative, a national program with local chapters that collects donated formal wear and accessories and makes them available to girls who can't afford to buy their own.

It all started three years ago, when D'Andrea's mom, Jo Ann, read the Ms. Cheap column in The Tennessean daily newspaper about a girl in Franklin, Caroline Davidson, who was collecting and giving away prom dresses through her own Becca's Closet chapter.

"We e-mailed her, and said we'd love to help out in any way we could," said D'Andrea, who is a student at Father Ryan High School in Nashville. "We didn't hear back from her for a year. Then she e-mailed us, said she'd kept our e-mail and that she was graduating and needed someone to pass this on to."

Becca's Closet originated in Davie, Fla., in 2002, when a high school freshman, Rebecca Kirtman, launched a drive to provide prom dresses to disadvantaged high school girls.

During the spring of her sophomore year, Kirtman single-handedly collected and donated more than 250 formal dresses throughout south Florida. Tragically, the 16-year-old Kirtman was killed in a car accident that same year, but her vision continues through other girls' efforts across the country.

"We thought it was a great thing that we'd like to get involved with, but we didn't know how much work it was going to be," D'Andrea said. "We also didn't realize how many people it would affect, and how many great people we would meet."

Davidson packed up all the dresses and shoes, and delivered them to the D'Andreas' house. Jo Ann and Mariel unpacked them upstairs in their attic workout room.

Word about D'Andrea's effort has spread through people who come in for dresses and those who donate them.

"It's kind of a touchy thing," she said. "Some girls may be embarrassed about needing to get a dress from us, so we try not to make it too public. And they know we're not going to say anything. We're not here to judge, just to help."

Her "clients" visit from all over Tennessee and beyond, including many from Kentucky. Those who are hoping to get a dress have to call or e-mail D'Andrea to set up an appointment. There's no financial eligibility to get a free dress; it's all on an honor system.

"I guess I always took for granted that everyone could afford a prom dress," said D'Andrea. "But many girls can't even afford their prom tickets. So us helping them with a dress is a huge deal."

Poll shows Catholics have mixed reaction to Obama's Notre Dame invite WASHINGTON (CNS) — In a nationwide poll, half of U.S. Catholics overall supported the University of Notre Dame's decision to invite President Barack Obama to address college graduates while 28 percent opposed it.

But when the Catholics polled were divided into categories of those who attended weekly Mass and those who did not, the numbers shifted.

Thirty-seven percent of those attending weekly Mass supported the Indiana university's decision while 45 percent opposed it.

The poll, conducted by the Pew Research Center's Forum on Religion & Public Life, was released April 30. It was based on telephone interviews April 23-27 with 2,003 adults and has a margin of error of plus or minus 2.5 percentage points.

The overall Catholic response to the survey was similar to the nationwide views on the issue: 48 percent approved, 25 percent disapproved and 27 percent said they didn't know.

Of Catholics who attended Mass less than once a week, 23 percent found fault with the university's decision and 56 percent favored it.

The survey also asked if respondents were even aware of the controversy surrounding Obama's scheduled May 17 graduation speech and his acceptance of an honorary degree from the university.

Critics say the president's support of legal abortion and embryonic stem-cell research make him an inappropriate choice for a commencement speaker at a Catholic university.

In the group of Catholics who had not heard about the controversy, 45 percent sided with the university's decision to invite Obama and 18 percent opposed it.

Of the Catholics who were familiar with the issue, 54 percent agreed with the university and 38 percent disagreed.

Vatican reaffirms support for nuclear nonproliferation treaty at UN

UNITED NATIONS (CNS) — The Vatican's chief representative to the United Nations has set forth a series of steps that will move the world toward the goal of eventual nuclear disarmament.

Speaking at the U.N. May 5, Archbishop Celestino Migliore, papal nuncio to the world body, reaffirmed the Vatican's support for the nuclear nonproliferation treaty in offering five "concrete, transparent and convincing" steps to demonstrate the world's willingness to end the threat that nuclear weapons pose. He called for:

— Adherence to the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty, which outlaws nuclear weapons testing.

— The immediate opening of negotiations on a Fissile Material Cutoff Treaty that would prohibit the further production of weapons-grade uranium and plutonium.

— An end to reliance on nuclear weapons as a part of military policy among nuclear states.

— Giving oversight of the peaceful use of nuclear energy to the International Atomic Energy Agency and expanding the agency's role to include the nonproliferation side of the treaty.

— Developing an agreement on the production of nuclear fuel to meet growing energy needs, with the international atomic agency taking a leading role to ensure safety, security and fair access for all countries.

"All these measures are necessary to promote trust, transparency, confidence and cooperation among nations and regions," Archbishop Migliore said at the second session of a 12-day preparatory committee meeting called in advance of a conference to review the treaty in 2010.

With 26,000 nuclear warheads remain in the world's weapons stockpiles, the archbishop said the nonproliferation treaty remains "a cornerstone of nuclear disarmament."

Networking and one-on one coaching sessions will follow speaker. To register, contact Bill Conwell at SGIT@bellsouth.net.

It is a 'shameful tragedy' people go hungry in the world, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — One of the most urgent and critical social problems afflicting the world today is the "shameful tragedy that one-fifth of humanity still goes hungry," Pope Benedict XVI told members of the Pontifical Academy of Social Sciences.

"Assuring an adequate food supply, like the protection of vital resources such as water and energy, requires all international leaders to collaborate in showing a readiness to work" toward eliminating social inequalities between countries and communities, he said in an address May 4.

"For Christians who regularly ask God to 'give us this day our daily bread,' it is a shameful tragedy" that so many people go hungry and are malnourished, he said.

Some 25,000 people die from hunger every day and one child dies every six seconds of malnutrition or starvation, according to the United Nations' World Food Program.

World Food Program.

The pope made his remarks during an audience with about 55 participants attending a plenary assembly of the Pontifical Academy of Social Sciences.

The academy, headed by the former U.S. ambassador to the Vatican, Mary Ann Glendon, was meeting May 1-5 to discuss Catholic social doctrine and human rights.

The meeting was specifically addressing rights that are currently under assault, such as the right to life, the right to build a family, freedom of conscience and religion, and the right to decent subsistence.

The pope said there is "a flagrant contrast between the equal attribution of rights and the unequal access to the means of attaining those rights."

If the ethical underpinnings of human rights are ignored, then those rights will remain fragile since they would be deprived of their solid and sound foundations, he said.

Israel, Vatican officials deny reports about control of holy sites

JERUSALEM (CNS) — Israeli and Vatican officials denied reports that Israeli President Shimon Peres had asked the government to relinquish sovereignty over several holy places as a gesture of good will for Pope Benedict XVI.

Reports abounded in the Israeli press in early May claiming internal discord between Peres and officials from the Tourism and Interior ministries after the president allegedly had urged them to yield key Christian holy sites to the Vatican.

"What was published was taken out of context," a spokeswoman for the president's office said May 6. "The Israeli media published it as if the president was asking to give up sovereignty over holy sites, and there is a great distance between that and the reality."

The spokeswoman said Israel already has pledged to the Vatican that it will not confiscate land around six Christian sites for any sort of national development purpose such as the widening of roads.

She said Peres had asked the ministries, as a gesture of good will before the pope's May 8-15 trip to the Holy Land, to confirm the pledge and to speed up the negotiations.

Archbishop Antonio Franco, papal nuncio to Israel, said the reports were a "big mess, a confusion of things."

Parish estate planning seminars applicable, informative

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Approximately 70 people attended an estate planning seminar sponsored by the Foundation for the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte April 28.

Father Frank O'Rourke, pastor of St. Gabriel Church, opened the seminar with a prayer and spoke briefly about stewardship and planned gifts.

"Gathering for the will seminar at St. Gabriel's made me mindful of how fortunate we are in the Diocese of Charlotte to have professionals in this area who share information that is so helpful," said Father O'Rourke.

"Infusing stewardship principles into estate planning, wills and end of life issues is a blessing," he said.

John Engler, parishioner and co-chair of the parish planned giving committee, introduced the speakers, who included Don Hodgens, parishioner and co-chair of the committee; and Judy Smith, director of planned giving for the Diocese of Charlotte.

Topics covered included wills, powers of attorney, trusts and bequests.

There was also a presentation on the Catholic Heritage Society — an honorary society open to anyone who agrees to make a planned gift to the foundation, the Diocese of Charlotte or any of its parishes, schools, agencies or organizations.

"A question and answer period follows each seminar and gives those attending an opportunity to have many of their questions answered by an attorney in a relaxed environment," said Smith.

Hodgens, a retired estate planning attorney, was available to answer legal questions.

"The foundation office conducts these free seminars on a regular basis to help raise awareness of parishioners on the importance of taking care of their loved ones and continuing their stewardship to the church through the process of estate planning," said Smith.

All attendees received packets of take-home materials, including an estate planning toolkit.

State Senate passes bill despite opposition of bishops, Catholics

BY DAVID HAINS
COMMUNICATIONS DIRECTOR

CHARLOTTE — Despite receiving hundreds of e-mails from concerned Catholics, the N.C. State Senate narrowly passed the School Violence Protection Act.

The bill, known as SB 526, passed May 5 by a vote of 25-22.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte and Bishop Michael F. Burbidge of Raleigh had urged Catholics to oppose the bill through Catholic Voice NC, their nonpartisan political initiative and Web site.

In a letter e-mailed to site subscribers three days prior to the vote, the two bishops stated support for the concept of a bill that would protect students from bullying and harassment.

"All students and school employees should be free of bullying or harassing behavior. This is in accord with their fundamental dignity as human beings," the bishops' letter said.

The bill requires school employees who witness harassment or bullying, or have reliable information about such incidents, to report them to school authorities. The measure identifies more than a dozen reasons children are harassed.

"The section in question ... includes gender identity and sexual orientation," the bishops said.

The bishops believe supporters of the bill were laying legal groundwork for gay marriage in North Carolina.

"In three states that have a law similar to SB 526, the law was used as part of a lawsuit to persuade a judge or court to mandate same-sex marriage," the bishops said. "This would be contrary to our fundamental teaching and understanding of marriage."

A total of 771 individuals contacted their senators through the Catholic Voice NC Web site. The bill now goes to the House for a vote.

A sign of faith

Discalced Carmelite Father Anthony Haglof officiates the clothing ceremony of Sheryl Peyton (left) with the assistance of Elizabeth Pantas during a Mass at St. Barnabas Church in Arden March 14.

Secular Order of Discalced Carmelites clothes member in brown scapular

ARDEN — Sheryl Peyton is now wearing a visible sign of her faith.

Peyton, religious education director at St. Barnabas Church in Arden, was clothed in the ceremonial brown scapular by the Flower of Carmel Community of the Secular Order of Discalced Carmelites during a Mass at the church March 14.

The clothing of the brown scapular, the habit of the order, was the result of 18 months of study and discernment by Peyton and the community.

Discalced Carmelite Father Anthony Haglof, prior of Christ on the Mountain Monastery in Hinton, W.Va., and the community's first spiritual assistant, celebrated the Mass and officiated at the ceremony. Elizabeth Pantas, Carmelite formation director, assisted on behalf of the community.

Peyton now begins a five-year period of study, prayer and discernment that may lead her to make lifelong promises of poverty, chastity and obedience to the community and to the superiors of the Teresian Carmel.

"For me, Carmel provides the contemplative counterweight to my active ministry in the church," said Peyton. "While my parish work comes from and is guided by my spiritual life, I do have a tendency to let it dominate my time and attention. My commitment to formation in Carmel and the daily prayer it calls for helps me to keep the two balanced."

"I feel called to Carmel because the spirituality that it embodies fits me. I love that in the Carmelite tradition Elijah is revered as its founder because he, like the hermits on (Mount) Carmel, sought God in the desert and in silence," she said.

Peyton added that being a part of the Flower of Carmel community will be beneficial to her.

"It is nice to be on the receiving end of the teaching and the insight provided by those who have been in Carmel longer than I have," she said. "It is also an opportunity for me to witness the many ways God works through his followers."

The Secular Order of Discalced Carmelites is an order of diocesan priests and laity who embrace the spirit and ideals of the Order of Discalced Carmelites.

the Word, "to proclaim and teach with conviction" the teachings of Christ and the church; and the ministry of charity, marked with "the indelible spiritual character which configures him to Christ the servant."

Bishop Jugis urged the deacon candidates to "be men of good reputation, filled with wisdom and the Holy Spirit, as were those once chosen by the Apostles."

Following the homily, the candidates made commitments to permanent celibacy, and each stated his willingness to perform what the church requires of deacons — humble and loving assistance given to the bishop, proclamation of the mysteries of the faith as taught by Christ, a deepening commitment to ecclesial prayer and a continued renewal of life in the example of Christ.

The Litany of the Saints followed, during which the candidates lay prostrate before the altar.

Bishop Jugis completed the act of ordination in a prayer of consecration after the laying on of hands, a Scriptural gesture that signifies a special outpouring of the Holy Spirit, by which men are configured to Christ in holy orders.

"Believe what you read, teach what you believe and practice what you teach."

— Bishop Peter J. Jugis

Each new deacon was then presented with a Book of the Gospels, and was charged by Bishop Jugis:

"Receive the Gospel of Christ, whose herald you have become. Believe what you read, teach what you believe and practice what you teach."

Ordination to the diaconate traditionally takes place toward the end of the seminarians' third year of graduate study and marks the final stages of preparation for the priesthood.

The deacons are authorized to baptize, proclaim the Gospel, preach, officiate at weddings and funerals, administer sacramentals and care for the dying.

Deacons Budzinski, Eckert and Miller will continue their studies during the 2009-10 academic year, after which they will be ordained to the priesthood upon completion of the master of divinity degree program.

Catholic churches take preventive measures against spread of flu

In Mexico City, the epicenter of the outbreak, preventive measures outlined by the church have included instructions to both priests and parishioners on church behavior during a public health outbreak.

The recommendations urged priests to limit homilies to five minutes and wear masks while hearing confession.

Parishioners were advised to not bring young children and the elderly to Mass, to wear face masks and to wait to put money in the collection plate until after they receive Communion.

The Archdiocese of Mexico City also announced that weddings, "quinceaneras" and baptisms would be postponed, but could be conducted in private if a priest deemed that adequate health safeguards were being taken.

Some Catholic churches across Mexico City reopened for Mass, despite admonishments from the local government for residents to avoid large gatherings to prevent the spread of swine flu.

In other parts of the country, however, churches remained closed and pilgrimages were canceled.

As cases of swine flu were confirmed in various countries, Catholic officials issued cautions.

In New Zealand, the bishops temporarily suspended the reception of Communion on the tongue and from the chalice and shaking hands at the sign of peace.

In an April 30 statement, the bishops called these restrictions precautionary and said they would issue an update if stronger action was needed.

Various bishops in the United States issued similar guidelines.

As of May 7, the United States had more than 600 swine flu cases with one flu-related death.

According to Centers for Disease Control statistics, there has been seven confirmed cases of swine flu in North Carolina (in the eastern part of the state) and 17 in South Carolina.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, it is up to individual pastors to determine if changes during Mass were necessary in their parishes.

The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Secretariat of Divine Worship said in a statement in late April it did not feel that widespread liturgical adaptations were necessary at that time to prevent the spread of the swine flu.

In England, the Diocese of Lancaster published an online booklet called "Sustaining Pastoral Presence: Influenza Outbreaks," with information about the swine flu and preventive measures.

The diocese said the booklet was designed to "ensure that Catholic parishes and chaplaincy teams maintain their presence as agents of pastoral care during a flu epidemic or pandemic in a way that both protects those engaged in pastoral ministry and protects those who need their help."

Pope prays for those hit by swine flu pandemic

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI encouraged the people of Mexico to keep their faith in God, who will help them as they face a deadly flu outbreak.

Speaking to pilgrims gathered in St. Peter's Square May 3, the pope expressed his spiritual closeness to all those hit by the swine flu, which is spread by human contact.

He said he was praying "for the victims of the influenza that is affecting Mexico and other countries."

Speaking in Spanish, the pope called on Mexicans to "stand firm in the Lord; he will help you overcome this difficulty."

He invited families to pray together to Our Lady of Guadalupe, asking that she assist and protect them.

According to the World Health Organization, there were 1,085 confirmed cases of the H1N1 virus, which causes swine flu, in 21 countries, as of late May 4.

Mexico had 590 confirmed cases of the virus and 25 flu-related deaths. The outbreak originated in Mexico, but officials there said the number of new infections was dropping.

As of May 4, the United States had more than 280 swine flu cases with one flu-related death.

Cases have been confirmed in Canada, Latin America, and parts of Europe and Asia.

Local Catholic attends private audience with pope

Buckley shares mission for Scripture ministry

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

VATICAN CITY — Local Catholic Gail Buckley accompanied members of the U.S.-based Papal Foundation to a private audience with Pope Benedict XVI at the Vatican May 2.

The Papal Foundation, established in 1990 in the name of the pope, raises money for the building of churches, seminaries, schools, hospitals and other projects for the care of the poor around the world.

The foundation invited Buckley, founder and executive director of Catholic Scripture Study International, because of her work in promoting the study of sacred Scripture within the context of Catholic Church teaching.

Also in attendance was actor Eduardo Verastegui, star of the movie "Bella," who too was invited to attend as a guest of the foundation.

During the audience, Buckley, a parishioner of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte, presented the pope with Scripture study materials and told him the Lord had called her to start a Catholic Bible study program.

Buckley said she got a big smile from the pope when she told him the goal of Catholic Scripture Study International is "for laity to study Scripture in community and in light of the church's teaching."

"It was an awesome experience, being so close to, touching and speaking with the Vicar of Christ on earth," she said. "Certainly an experience I will treasure forever."

In a recent address to members of the Pontifical Biblical Commission the pope said that the interpretation of sacred Scripture cannot be subjective, but must be interpreted within the church community.

Pope Benedict also said that the topic of Scripture study is of great importance to him.

It is "a concern that lies very close to my heart because the interpretation of sacred Scripture is of fundamental importance for Christian faith and the life of the church," the pope said.

During the private audience, Pope Benedict praised the members of the Papal Foundation for being the kind of Christians "who continue to meet the challenges we face with courage and trust."

"At moments such as these it is tempting to overlook those without a voice and think only of our own difficulties," said the pope, speaking in terms of the current economic conditions.

"As Christians we are aware, however, that especially when times are difficult we must work even harder to ensure that the consoling message of Our Lord is heard," the pope said during the meeting at the Vatican.

"Even though the economy has been bad, the Papal Foundation was able to contribute even more than they had in previous years," said Buckley.

Cardinal William H. Keeler, retired archbishop of Baltimore and vice president of the foundation, spoke on behalf of the group, which presented the pope with the list of 84 specific projects and dozens of scholarships funded this year for a total of more than $7.5 million.

In the midst of the financial crisis, the pope told the benefactors, "rather than turning in on ourselves, we must continue to be beacons of hope, strength and support for others, most especially those who have no one to watch over or assist them."

The foundation, he said, ensures that assistance continues to be carried out in the name of Christ and of his church.

Pope's pilgrimage will take message of peace

the pope can expect to find his every word and gesture under scrutiny by the world's media — especially when it comes to relations among Christians, Muslims and Jews and the Israeli-Palestinian crisis.

Although the world may measure the success of the visit in terms of international or interfaith diplomacy, Pope Benedict is going to the Holy Land first and foremost as a religious pilgrim.

"The priority is to witness to the truth of the Incarnation by visiting, as head of the church, the places where the events of our redemption took place. That's the point," Franciscan Father David Jaeger, an Israeli priest and adviser to the Vatican, told Catholic News Service.

The pilgrimage has a special focus on peace. The pope, in announcing the visit, said he would be going to the Holy Land to pray for "the precious gift of unity and peace for the Middle East and all humanity."

Father Jaeger said that's extremely important at a time when hopes for peace among the population are the lowest in many years.

"The worst thing that can happen is the loss of hope for peace. So for him to speak openly of the possibility and the necessity of peace and reconciliation should thrust those values into the fore," Father Jaeger said.

"It's not a political negotiation of course; he's not going to produce a peace treaty or try to. But the fact that he keeps the value of peace in front of the people of the region, that will be a tremendous contribution by the church," he said.

In Jordan

The first leg of the pope's trip will take him to Jordan for a series of carefully chosen liturgies and encounters, including a visit to a mosque in Amman.

That event, and the fact that Pope Benedict is spending several days in Jordan, reflects his aim to reach a wide Muslim audience.

In 2006, Pope Benedict prayed in a mosque in Turkey, a gesture that spoke volumes to the Islamic world.

In Amman, the pope will deliver a speech outside the mosque to Muslim leaders, diplomats and rectors of the University of Jordan. The audience and the setting make it likely that the pope will revisit the themes of his speech in 2006 in Regensburg, Germany, but this time making sure his remarks on reason and faith do not unintentionally offend his listeners.

For Jordan's Catholic faithful, who number about 75,000 in a population of 6.2 million, the big event will be the papal Mass in an Amman soccer stadium May 10.

Two smaller papal events in Jordan should not go unnoticed.

His first appointment in Amman is at the Regina Pacis center, a special needs facility that has inspired Christian-Muslim dialogue and collaboration. Here the pope is likely to emphasize the importance of the "dialogue of life" and social cooperation among followers of the Abrahamic faiths.

The pope also will lay the cornerstone of the University of Madaba, which is being built by the Latin patriarchate; blessing cornerstones is a common activity in papal visits, but establishing a Catholic-run university in a predominantly Muslim country makes this one special.

Much of the pope's itinerary follows in the footsteps of Pope John Paul II's Holy Land pilgrimage in 2000.

Pope Benedict, for example, will pray at Mount Nebo in western Jordan, where Moses glimpsed the Promised Land before dying. And, like his predecessor, he will visit the Jordan River where Jesus was baptized — the setting of the opening chapter of Pope Benedict's book, "Jesus of Nazareth."

In Israel

The pope travels to Jerusalem May 11 and later that day visits the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial, in what Vatican aides view as a central event of the trip.

When Pope John Paul spoke at the memorial in 2000, Israelis reacted with warm appreciation; many considered it a turning point in his pilgrimage.

Pope Benedict has spoken eloquently about the Holocaust, and as a German has recalled growing up as a witness to the brutality of the regime that targeted Jews for extermination.

Vatican sources said, however, that the pope will not be going to Yad Vashem to apologize as a German, but to invoke a wider lesson on the dangers of racism and anti-Semitism.

On May 12, his first full day in Jerusalem, the pope visits sites sacred to Islam, Judaism and Christianity.

He begins at the Dome of the Rock, one of Islam's holiest shrines, and proceeds to the Western Wall, sacred to Jews. The two sites lie adjacent to each other and in the past have been the scene of bitter skirmishes between Palestinians and Israelis.

The same day the pope will meet separately with the city's two chief rabbis and the grand mufti.

The pope will make a daylong visit May 13 to the West Bank city of Bethlehem, the birthplace of Jesus and today a key administrative city of the Palestinian Authority, whose officials will welcome the pontiff at the presidential palace.

The main religious event of the day is a Mass in Manger Square.

That afternoon, the pope will visit the Aida Refugee Camp, where some 5,000 Palestinians live. The visit is already politically charged.

Latin Patriarch Fouad Twal of Jerusalem said recently that the camp, which has a giant key installed atop one of the camp's gates, symbolizes the "right to return," the principle that Palestinian refugees have a right to return to the homes in Israel that they have been forced to leave at various times since 1946, when the war for Israeli statehood began.

In addition, Israel has objected that the platform being built to host the Aida event is too close to the Israeli separation wall, which Israel has designed as a 400-mile-long security barrier through the West Bank and which Palestinians see as an instrument of repression.

The pope will celebrate Mass May 14 in Nazareth, the city where Jesus grew up, and later visit the Grotto of the Annunciation and hold a prayer service with Catholic leaders of Galilee.

Like his Mass earlier in the week in the Josafat Valley near the Garden of Gethsemane, these liturgies are central to the pope's pilgrimage, offering moral support to the dwindling Christian population in the land where the church was born.

U.S. Cardinal John P. Foley, grand master of the Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulcher of Jerusalem, said the pope's visit would underline the importance of maintaining the Christian presence in the Holy Land.

"He will do what Peter always does: encourage the faithful, recognize them, give them a renewed sense of worth and let them know how much the universal church appreciates them and the importance of their faith," the cardinal said.

Pope asks for prayers for Holy Land trip, peace for region's people

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Preparing to visit the Holy Land, Pope Benedict XVI asked for prayers for his trip, for peace in the region and for the suffering Palestinian people.

Reciting the "Regina Coeli" prayer May 3 with thousands of visitors in St. Peter's Square, the pope said he would make the May 8-15 trip to Jordan, Israel and the Palestinian territories as a "pilgrim of peace, in the name of the one God who is father of all."

Pope Benedict said he wanted to show the region's people how committed the Catholic Church is to supporting everyone engaged in dialogue and reconciliation and working "to reach a stable and lasting peace with justice and mutual respect."

Addressing English-speaking visitors, the pope asked for prayers for "the afflicted people" of the Holy Land.

"In a special way, I ask that you remember the Palestinian people who have endured great hardship and suffering," he said.

Pope Benedict prayed that God would bless the Palestinians and all the region's people "with the gifts of unity and peace."

In his main talk, the pope said that in addition to going to encourage peacemaking he wanted to follow in the footsteps of Pope Paul VI, who visited the region in 1964, and Pope John Paul II, who made his pilgrimage in 2000.

Pope Benedict said he would visit the "principal holy sites of our faith" and, as the successor of the apostle Peter, he would "confirm and encourage the Holy Land's Christians, who face difficulties every day."

The pope also spoke about his trip May 2 when he met donors from the U.S.-based Papal Foundation.

Today's world, he told foundation members, is in need of God's peace, "especially as it faces the tragedies of war, division, poverty and despair."

Telling foundation members that he wanted to be "a pilgrim of peace" in the Holy Land, the pope explained that "for more than 60 years this region — the land of Our Lord's birth, death and resurrection; a sacred place for the world's three great monotheistic religions — has been plagued by violence and injustice."

"This has led to a general atmosphere of mistrust, uncertainty and fear — often pitting neighbor against neighbor, brother against brother," he said.

Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, Vatican spokesman, told reporters May 4 that for several reasons the trip is taking place in "a context not easy in terms of peace and serenity."

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the Gaza Strip occurred just five months ago, Israel has a new government, members of the Palestinians' Fatah and Hamas factions have been negotiating for months without success to form a new unity government, and the new U.S. foreign policy of Barack Obama has just begun to take shape, Father Lombardi said.

In such a complex situation, he said, "the pope's trip presents itself as an act of hope and of trust that he can make a contribution to peace and reconciliation. It seems to me to be a decidedly courageous act."

Author offers eyewitness accounts, history galore about exorcisms

REVIEWED BY NANCY L. ROBERTS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

In modern life, the concept of evil personified in Satan and his minions may seem a superstitious anachronism.

After all, we now have a sophisticated grasp of the neurological and psychological causes of epilepsy, schizophrenia, dissociative identity disorder and the like — all conditions whose treatment, in earlier times, often consisted of casting out the devils within.

Yet the church maintains that demons are not just metaphorical, but can, if rarely, actually inhabit the physical bodies of human beings, and to this day practices a rite of exorcism to dispel them.

And while it may take months or even years of exorcisms to “liberate” a person from a demonic presence, the church’s solemn ritual of exorcism can be a formidable weapon against such evil.

These are key ideas in Matt Baglio’s book, “The Rite: The Making of a Modern Exorcist.” In it he recounts the experiences of Father Gary Thomas, a likable California pastor, who answered his bishop’s call to take a course in Rome about demonic possession and took part in more than 80 exorcisms along with veteran Italian exorcists.

Baglio, a reporter who has written for The Associated Press and the International Herald Tribune and lives in Rome, met Father Thomas there in the fall of 2005. The two developed a warm friendship that led to the priest’s full cooperation with the reporter as he progressed through his apprenticeship as an exorcist.

The article Baglio had originally planned to write grew into a book that delves not only into eyewitness accounts of Father Thomas’ journey as he learned to cast out demons, but also the history of exorcism’s rites and rituals, portraits of those said to be possessed by demons and a discussion of the role of angels, devils, satanic cults and curses.

Many people think that exorcists see demons everywhere, but as Baglio writes in a fascinating chapter, the opposite is much more likely.

The church’s guidelines urge prudence and emphasize the importance of “discernment of spirits,” which is considered to be a gift of the Holy Spirit.

The church further “gives three signs that indicate the possible presence of a demon: abnormal strength, the ability to speak or understand a previously unknown language, and the knowledge of hidden things,” Baglio continues.

Because many mental illnesses could be mistakenly interpreted as evidence of possession, it is typical, Baglio reports, “that an exorcist will have a team of individuals (a psychiatrist, psychologist and perhaps a neurologist) that he trusts to help him with discernment.”

Baglio has good storytelling instincts and avoids sensationalizing his topic. Still, his description of dramatic changes in a possessed person’s vocal intonation during one of Father Thomas’ “apprentice” exorcisms is chilling:

“As Father Carmine continued with the prayers, a low guttural growl began to emanate from Sister Janica. Father Gary studied her, trying to determine its source. ... It sounded like the noise a dog makes when it’s getting ready to bite someone.

“From his reading he did know that it was possible for a demon to attack an exorcist during the ritual. ... He had no idea what he would do if something violent like that occurred.”

Father Thomas is shown here in all of his initial skepticism that eventually gave way to a deeper understanding of the nature of evil. Indeed, his experiences led him to a profound change in his approach to his calling, because they “expos(ed) him to a level of human suffering that he never knew existed.”

At the same time, he emerged with a great sense of hope, because he found that the exorcism ritual truly worked: “Even though evil existed in the world, there was a way to defeat it.”

In the end, “The Rite” won’t quell all skepticism about this subject; consider that physicians still use a specialized term, “demonomania,” to describe a mental illness in which the patient has a delusion of being possessed by evil spirits.

But overall the book illuminates one of the world’s most long-standing and mysterious phenomena.

Interestingly, writing the book occasioned a profound change in the author, who credits the experience with turning him from being a “cultural” Catholic back to a practicing one.

In many ways, Baglio writes, this is what exorcists themselves aim to accomplish: to help the demon-possessed return to the sacraments and so, by strengthening the practice of their faith, empower them to resist evil.

Roberts is a professor of journalism and communication at the University at Albany, State University of New York, and the author of several books.

God is a friend who loves us always

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Junior high is one of the hardest times in life. Try, if you can, to remember those awkward times.

I remember craving attention but being mortified when I received it. I wanted girls to like me but had no idea what to do when one smiled at me.

I desperately wanted friends and would do almost anything to be seen as cool.

Those days were filled with a deep longing to fit in and be loved.

It is with this in mind that our parish offers a junior high overnight retreat on Good Friday.

The reading of the Passion and veneration of the cross set the scene for this spiritual exercise.

After the solemn services we head into a lock-in that focuses on the sacrifice Jesus offered for us on the cross.

As we go through life, we discover that Jesus is many things to us. Who he is to us and the role we see him in varies with our need.

Sometimes we need him as our Lord, such as when we really need someone to take care of us. Other times we feel our need for a savior or a healer.

Sometimes we revert back to those early adolescent days of greatly needing a friend.

It is this last aspect of Jesus that we zero in on at our overnight retreat.

In this week’s Gospel, Jesus reveals the depth of his friendship when he says, “No one has greater love than this, to lay down one’s life for one’s friends. You are my friends.”

Armed with these words we lead the youth through a series of reflections, activities and testimonies aimed at helping them see the love Jesus has for them and the lengths to which he will go to be their friend.

The evening culminates with a chance for them to sign their name on a large wooden cross as a sign of accepting Jesus’ offer of friendship.

Whether we are in eighth grade or 80 years old, we all need a reminder from time to time that Jesus is not only the God who created everything seen and unseen, but he is also the God who is a friend who loves us to death.

Questions:

What characteristics of a true friend do you think best describe Jesus in his role as a friend?

In what ways do you experience Jesus’ friendship?

How does it feel to know that Jesus calls you a friend?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

“No one has greater love than this, to lay down one’s life for one’s friends. You are my friends” (John 15:13-14).

'Angels and Demons' fails to generate Vatican outrage

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — On the eve of its world premiere, "Angels and Demons" was a film in desperate search of controversy.

At a press conference in Rome May 3, director Ron Howard tried to pick a fight with the Vatican, suggesting that the long arm of the Holy See was somehow behind unspecified problems in shooting the film, a pseudo-religious thriller based in Rome.

The Vatican wasn't taking the bait, though. The only real criticism in Italy on the eve of the film's premiere came from a 102-year-old Italian bishop — not exactly the kind of publicity storm that marketing gurus dream about.

Tom Hanks, the film's star, put his finger on the problem at the press conference when he was asked if the movie's marketing people might try to exploit potential conflict with the Vatican.

"Every movie is exploited by the marketing people. There's no such thing as a movie that is not exploited by the marketing people," Hanks said.

"The marketing department of any studio would love to be able to create controversy over their films. But they can't do it on their own; they need a partner," he said.

The movie, based on a novel by Dan Brown, was set to premiere in Rome May 4, and was to open in the United States May 15.

It tells the tale of a secret society that kidnaps papal candidates at the start of a conclave, forcing the Vatican to turn to the mystery-solving symbolologist Robert Langdon, played by Hanks.

Howard began the press conference with a string of vague accusations against the Vatican. It seemed, he said, that "sort of through back channels and so forth, the Vatican had exerted some influence" to prevent the crews from shooting scenes in a couple of areas where a particular church was in the background.

"I suppose we could have contested this. We didn't," he said.

He added that a screening of the film — or a reception, he wasn't quite sure — was moved away from a venue near St. Peter's Square, "and I suppose the Vatican had some sort of influence over that."

"Was I surprised? No. Am I a little frustrated by it at times? Sure," Howard said.

The Vatican spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, declined to comment on Howard's accusations, saying they were merely designed to generate publicity for the film.

Howard also cited the case of retired Italian Bishop Antonio Mennonna, 102 years old, who has signed a legal complaint saying the movie is full of historical inaccuracies and misrepresentations of Christianity.

Howard said his company had earlier offered to screen the film for some bishops and others, but that the invitation was never taken up. In any case, he said, if anyone feels the film will be offensive to them, they shouldn't see it.

That prompted Hanks, who had tongue in cheek throughout the press conference, to interject: "No, no, don't even go! Stay away please! We beg of you!"

Hanks had fun with other inquiries designed to provoke debate with the church. After a reminder to keep questions germane to the film, one reporter asked Hanks if he were a spiritual person and what he thought about the recent controversy over the pope and condoms.

Hanks responded: "Oh, that's germane to the film. I am a spiritual man and because I'm happily married for 21 years, I really don't know what a condom is anymore."

Howard, who directed "The Da Vinci Code," also based on a Dan Brown novel, said that whatever church leaders may think of these books and films, many people find that it gets them thinking about what they believe.

As a result, he said, church attendance swells and Bible study groups spring up.

"I think that's a positive and constructive thing," he said.

Brown, who made a rare public appearance at the press conference, said he first got the idea for "Angels and Demons" while on a tour near the Vatican.

The tour guide mentioned that popes once had to flee along a Roman passageway to escape their enemies, and that got Brown thinking about the scientific "enemies" of the Vatican, which he said "seemed like too good an idea to let go."

In the book "Angels and Demons," modern members of a secret society called the Illuminati plan to destroy the Vatican with antimatter.

The Illuminati were a group formed in Bavaria in the late 1700s that historians say survived for only nine years. Conspiracy buffs have speculated that the Illuminati exist yet today, secretly controlling world events.

Brown was asked whether he really believed the Illuminati still exist.

"Did they ever?" he said abruptly. Then he added a defense of his approach to his novels.

"These are fictional stories built around real-world topics. And these stories, it is my hope, spark a lot of interest and research on people's own, to figure out what in these stories is fictional, what is real," he said.

Several weeks ago, Archbishop Velasio De Paolis, president of the Prefecture for the Economic Affairs of the Holy See, signaled that the Vatican would not be jumping into a debate over "Angels and Demons."

He said people should be cautious about "the boomerang effect" of calling for a boycott because it could translate into unintended publicity for the movie.

He said the Vatican wasn't worried about people of faith falling for the book and movie's anti-Christian inventions.

"The Vatican believes Christians are strong — inoculated by centuries of persecution and testimonials of faith," he said.

Catholic high school wins visit from pop star in text-message contest

ALEXANDRIA, Va. (CNS) — Sweat pouring down his face and an "I heart TS" tattoo on his upper arm, Geoffrey Oldland touched the hand of country and pop sensation Taylor Swift not once but twice, as she bid the students of Bishop Ireton High School in Alexandria a heartfelt goodbye after a 70-minute private concert.

"It was awesome," said Oldland, a senior who sat in the third row for the show Swift did April 28 for the school that won a Verizon text-messaging contest.

Deafening cheers erupted from the students as they welcomed the 19-year-old star onto their auditorium stage and proceeded to jump up and down for the better part of the next hour.

Even teachers got into the show, clapping along and taking pictures on their cell phones as Swift played a list of hits, many off her second and most recent album, "Fearless."

"I can't believe it was real," said Fiona Carroll, following the show.

Principal Tim Hamer said Swift's song, "The Best Day," was true for the school. "This was very much the best day for us," he said. "It's very much a David and Goliath story," with a Catholic high school winning a contest in which thousands of schools — many of them much larger — participated.

As Bishop Ireton students waited for the concert to begin, they could hone their texting skills even further by sending messages to their friends via their cell phones and having them appear on a screen behind the stage.

That's all part of Swift "going mobile" on her U.S. tour, with opportunities for fans to win additional texting contests, download songs and virtually sing with the star.

In the nearly three years since Swift released her first single, "Tim McGraw," the artist has experienced a dramatic rise to fame. Swift was nominated for a 2008 Grammy Award for best new artist and won album of the year for "Fearless" at the 44th annual Academy of Country Music Awards in April.

Her first single from that album, "Love Story," has earned accolades from both country and pop audiences — and got wild applause at the end of her show at Bishop Ireton.

As one student said: "It's Taylor Swift! We all love her."

Confirmation candidates at Our Lady of the Annunciation Church in Albemarle prepare food Jan. 18 for Stanly Community Christian Ministries' Community Table, which provides hot meals to those in need. The community service was part of the youths' Jan. 18-19 "Called by Name" retreat, which focused on being disciples of Christ in the world and active members of the Catholic community.

After providing meals for approximately 60 people, the youths participated in group activities at the church, including eucharistic adoration, Mass and games.

First Communion candidates at St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte create "monstrances" with their parents during a retreat April 4. During the retreat, the children learned about the transforming power of the Eucharist, and about the vessels and vestments used during Mass.

Forty-one children celebrated their first Communion during Mass at the church May 2. Augustinian Father Russell Ortega, pastor, celebrated the Mass; Augustinian Father Anthony Tomasulo, parochial vicar, concelebrated.

I've got schoolwork, volunteer work and my crown duties," she said.

Her duties include an upcoming tea at a Charlotte orphanage, where the winners from all divisions of the American National Teenager Scholarship Organization will meet with girls at the facility and "adopt" little sisters for the day.

"It makes me feel good when I see people smile," Lauren said. "When I would go out with this one woman at the Life Care Center, we would read and I could see how doing the smallest things to help people makes a difference."

Life Care Center offers services for the elderly.

In addition to volunteering at the center, Lauren assists with her parish's Children's Church, which shares Sunday's readings with 3-, 4- and 5-year-old kids, and at the Mainstay resale shop, which benefits domestic abuse victims.

Last year Lauren and her mother spent a week working with a multid denominational summer camp program in which Immaculate Conception Church participated with other local churches.

Her father, Larry, recently accompanied Lauren to an audition at Hendersonville Little Theatre, where Lauren won a role in "Gypsy." And at her urging, Larry found himself onstage performing for the first time since high school.

Lauren also has worked at the Flat Rock Playhouse in their production of "Orphan Train" and hopes to continue studying acting with the playhouse.

"In high school I would like to be part of the conservatory group at the playhouse. You get a taste of what it's like to be an equity actor," she said.

Lauren's goals also include studying for her bachelor's degree in musical theatre at Elon University. She is currently an honor student and Beta Group member at Rugby Middle School, and her mother, Mary, hopes the academic achievements continue to be important.

Additionally, Lauren will compete for the national crown in July.

Lauren's family offers her continuous support.

"Her brother Christopher acted as her escort for one of the gown portions of a previous pageant," she said, "and both her brothers are very proud of her. And her dad is busting at the seams."

"We are a loving family, and I think that has a lot to do with our faith," added her mother. "We try to raise our children with the same Catholic values we were brought up with."

"Church keeps me going," said Lauren, who is currently studying for her confirmation in the fall.

When she won the North Carolina Junior National Teenager title and scholarship, Lauren also won the talent portion of the program and won for her speech about setting good examples for other teens.

Following in the footsteps of the Franciscans at Immaculate Conception Church, Lauren said her work within the community follows the admonition of St. Francis himself: "Preach the Gospel at all times, and if necessary, use words."

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. — The Mecklenburg Area Catholic School (MACS) Academic Games national team received top awards at the 2009 Academic Games National Tournament in Knoxville, Tenn. April 24-27.

Twelve students from four schools (St. Patrick, St. Gabriel and Our Lady of the Assumption elementary schools and Holy Trinity Middle School) qualified to represent MACS in the elementary division of the tournament.

Academic Games League of America (AGLOA) is a nonprofit organization which provides a series of Academic Games competitions throughout the nation resulting in a National Championship Tournament in late April each year. Academic Games tournaments challenge students to use higher order thinking skills in the subjects of Language Arts, English, History and Mathematics.

AGLOA welcomes any student in grades 4-12 to join and play Academic Games. A student may play as an individual but most play in teams of five.

The MACS team traveled to Tennessee under the supervision of Allana-Rae Ramkissoon, MACS Academic Games league head coach and principal of Our Lady of Assumption School, and Mary Morales, MACS Academic Games league national team head coach and parent volunteer.

The MACS team was divided into groups and competed in three competition categories within the elementary division: presidents, propaganda and equations. They placed highest in the presidents and propaganda games with groups placing first and fourth in the presidents game and first in the propaganda game.

They also received many of the top 10 individual awards for both competitions in which they competed against 300 students from leagues across the country.

"The time and dedication to studying facts about our presidents, as well as learning about propaganda, is inspiring," said Linda Cherry, superintendent of Catholic schools in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"These young people, representing grades three through six in MACS, brought pride to themselves, the MACS system and our entire diocese," Cherry said. "We look forward to expanding Academic Games within MACS and the other areas of our diocese."

ASHEVILLE — Students and adults took part in Asheville Catholic School's third annual Shamrock Run March 14.

The Shamrock Run, which consists of 10K, 5K and 1K "fun run" races, raises funds for the school's drama and physical education departments.

Mercy Sister Maria Goretti Weldon, who serves as the mission and values advocate for Sisters of Mercy Services Corporation, started the races. Father John Schneider, pastor of St. Eugene Church in Asheville, led the race on his bicycle while Irish music played over a loudspeaker.

New this year was a contest with prizes for the best Irish, Leprechaun or shamrock-themed race outfit. Prizes include certificates and gear from local restaurants and venues.

The common denominator in murder-suicides, mass killings

Some people are not mindful that God is the ultimate provider

A man whose wife was one of the victims of the April 5 massacre in Binghamton, N.Y., that left 14 dead asked, "What is it about American society that keeps turning out these kinds of people (mass murderers)? What is it about our society that keeps driving people to do things like this?"

Following the Binghamton murders, fingers pointed in all directions: too many guns, the recession, foreigners unable to cope with culture shock, copycats stimulated by high-profile killings.

As much as we'd like to understand the workings of evil or anticipate it through homeland security or other precautions, we cannot.

Evil becomes manifest when a heart ceases to resist it; it is a person-by-person choice not restricted to race or gender.

But there is, I believe, a common denominator in all incidences of mass killings and murder-suicides: self-sufficiency that is not mindful that God is the ultimate provider.

People who are overwhelmingly self-sufficient may not always be conscious of it. They simply do what they have to do to live.

They work, manage their homes, provide for dependent family members, indulge in recreation where possible, save for a rainy day.

There is nothing wrong with this. In fact, there is a degree of comfort in the ebb and flow of routine that caters to one's flesh, that offers rest and sanctuary at the end of a grueling day.

Self-sufficient people may even go to church, acknowledging God.

Eventually, however, they betray that they don't truly "depend" on almighty God, who can make a way out of no way.

This becomes evident when they are cornered by a problem they can't see a way around without giving up even the most modest of lifestyles.

They know no other way to live.

There are other aspects of self-sufficiency that are less apparent but nonetheless destructive.

The dependency of family members on a self-sufficient man, for example, can feed his ego so much that he cannot bear to fall from grace in their eyes, even if his fall was not because of something he did wrong.

I dismiss the possibility that those who commit murder-suicide do so to spare their families pain.

What do they know about another's pain when the only pain that seems to matter is their own?

For that matter, what do they know of love when genuine love gives life?

It doesn't snuff it out.

Then there are the self-possessed who are impatient with others in society who do not view life as they view it, who would rather terrorize and destroy lives rather than allow the seeds of truly worthy ideas to take root and grow.

What is the antidote to crippling self-sufficiency?

A crash course in humility before God, coupled with thankfulness.

It is freeing to acknowledge our God-dependency over self-sufficiency, offering gratitude for blessings often taken for granted: family, caring neighbors, loyal friends, health, safety, the freedom in the United States to worship God wherever and whenever, the kindness of strangers, the opportunity to give more than we take, hope that help will come, the unfathomable possibilities of each new day.

There is a lot on our horizons that is scary: the flu pandemic, the domino effect of the recession, Internet predators, threats of escalating wars, to name just a few.

But only one response matters, however: putting down our "to do" lists and humbling ourselves before our powerful, loving, merciful, magnanimous and unpredictable God who has said all along, "The battle is mine."

Why Catholics leave the church

Those who return often seek a spiritual home

There are many reasons why Catholics leave the church.

More than 90 percent leave because of the human element of the church. The other 10 percent probably never believed in the divine element in the first place.

Faith is a gift. If you try to bring back lapsed Catholics, be careful. As a rule, they don't like any kind of pressure.

For instance, if you say jokingly, "When are you coming back to the church?" you might hear, "Back to what, the same old stuff?"

Many of them have been hurt, offended or scandalized by priests and bishops; some may have had a scrupulous parent who smothered them.

Better to "speak more to God about them, than to them about God." This was the advice St. Ambrose gave to St. Monica, the mother of St. Augustine, when he lapsed into heresy as a young man.

She persevered in her prayers, and he eventually became a saint.

Many estranged Catholics are totally indifferent to Mary, the mother of Jesus. Jesuit theologian Father Karl Rahner once said, "For too many people, Christianity has become another 'ism,' an ideology, an abstraction, and abstractions have no need of a mother."

Those who do return after years of estrangement often tell us that they did not come back because of prodding or intellectual arguments. Rather, they found themselves looking for something that was missing in their lives; namely, a spiritual home.

This is where Mary comes in to play; a home needs a mother in it.

When people experience hard times they often say a Hail Mary, and when their prayers are answered the seeds of faith begin to bloom again. The contempt they once felt for the institutional church seems to become inconsequential.

They soon realize that the Catholic Church is the only organization in the world that truly honors the mother of Jesus as he wants her honored. Mary is the mother of the mystical body of Christ and therefore our spiritual mother.

"Honor thy mother" is a divine commandment, and Mary had a two-fold

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST

vocation; namely, to receive Jesus into her body, and then to give him away to the world for our salvation.

This is essentially our vocation too.

After the Second Vatican Council, many priests began preaching that the council eliminated our so-called "exaggerated devotion" to Mary, but what they failed to explain was all that Mary really means to us.

To the objection of our Protestant brothers — namely that Christians do not need Mary because Jesus alone is Lord — we have this answer from the pen of Cardinal Leo Jozef Suenens:

"It is true, Mary plays no role in the transmission of sacramental grace, i.e., she never interferes in the priest's absolution; however, in Lourdes and elsewhere, she gently urges the pilgrims to go to confession and receive holy Communion."

In Scripture, Mary says, "Do whatever he tells you" (Jn 2:5). Far from getting in the way, she points us to Jesus. The cynicism of disbelievers does not affect the truth.

I have been broadcasting 30-second radio spots on more than 1,000 radio stations carried on the Westwood One radio network for about 20 years. My sole purpose in creating this ministry called St. Jude Media is to tell my listeners from Maine to Hawaii that God loves them and that they can trust him, especially when he says, "Be not afraid."

This is the good news of the Gospel.

Jesus said, "There will be more joy in heaven over one sinner who repents than over 99 righteous people" who never strayed (Lk 15:7).

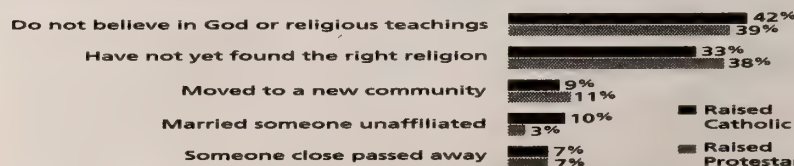

I take him at his word.

Keeping the Faith

More than two-thirds of U.S. Catholics stay in the church. The rest turn to Protestant denominations or become unaffiliated with a church altogether.

It is not without precedent

Greed is root of all evil, source of current global economic crisis

Treasury Secretary Timothy Geithner, in a recent speech to the Economic Club of Washington, said the global economic crisis is unprecedented.

No, it is not.

"Never before in modern times has so much of the world been simultaneously hit by a confluence of economic and financial turmoil such as we are now living through," Geithner said.

There is precedent for almost any event, a point oft overlooked in an era when nostalgia begins where the last decade ends.

It has happened, but until communication made it known, it wasn't known.

A person could live and die in Europe, never knowing of a catastrophic failure of silkworms in China; a drought in Africa would never be known to a settler on the prairies of the United States.

Now, with the exponential increase in the speed of communication, a flu outbreak in Mexico can topple the stock prices in Mumbai, India, within minutes.

Even Pope Benedict XVI admits to difficulty in keeping up with the rapid change.

The pope has been preparing an encyclical on the economy that some reports said was to be published in March or by Easter.

The pope said the complexity of the current situation is the reason for delay, and that he did not want to give simplistic answers to questions of global economy.

"We must denounce this with courage, but also with concreteness because moralizing will not help if it is not supported by an understanding of reality, which also will help us to understand what can be done concretely to change the situation," he told a group of priests in February.

While bankers and financiers look for the cause in such things as securitization, mortgage-backed assets and derivatives, expect the papal encyclical to be based on the institutional memory and historical understanding offered by the church.

The cause: greed.

The solution: justice.

Greed is the root of all evil, the source of the current global economic crisis, Pope Benedict said in an April audience.

Earlier in February he said the crisis proves original sin really exists.

"If it did not exist we could appeal to reason, lucidly with arguments that are accessible to all and incontestable, and to the good will of everyone," he said.

Consider This

STEPHEN KENT
CNS COLUMNIST

Expect the encyclical to address more than the economic system. Things can be better but not perfect. Change will result not from new laws but from just people.

"Justice cannot be created only with economic reforms, which are necessary, but it also requires the presence of just people," the pope said. "As long as original sin exists we will never have a radical and total correction, but we must do all that we can to achieve at least a provisional, sufficient correction that would permit humanity to live and would be an obstacle to selfishness."

"People, including the rich, must fight against greed, against the desire for appearances and against the false sense of freedom," he continued. Everyone, rich and poor, "must find the right path of truth, of love and therefore of the principled life."

The encyclical will be new but not unprecedented.

The precedent for that teaching can be found over 2,000 years ago.

Pope, at audience, says he wants to promote peace, unity in Holy Land

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Using the media present at his weekly general audience to address the people of Jordan, Israel and the Palestinian territories, Pope Benedict XVI said that he hoped to promote peace and unity during his eight-day visit to the region.

"I am eagerly looking forward to being with you and to sharing with you your aspirations and hopes as well as your pains and struggles," the pope told the region's people May 6, just two days before he was to begin his trip.

After his main audience talk about the teachings of St. John Damascene, Pope Benedict turned directly to the cameras to tell the people of the Holy Land that he would make his visit as a pilgrim of peace.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

St. John Damascene was a towering figure in the history of Eastern theology.

He was born into a wealthy Christian family at a time when his native Syria was already under Arab rule. He left a promising career in government in order to enter monastic life.

His best-known works are his Discourses against the Iconoclasts, which offer an important contribution to the proper theological understanding of the veneration of sacred images.

St. John Damascene was among the first to distinguish between adoration, which is due to God alone, and veneration, which can rightly be given to an image in order to assist the Christian to contemplate him whom the image represents.

It is true that in the Old Testament, divine images were strictly forbidden. But now that God has become incarnate and has assumed visible, material form in Jesus, matter has received a new dignity.

The wood of the cross, the book of the Gospels, the altar of sacrifice: all have been used by God to bring about our salvation.

Matter now serves as a sign and sacrament of our encounter with God. When we participate in the sacraments, when we venerate icons, if we do so in faith and in the power of the Holy Spirit, they truly become a means of grace.

Despite human sinfulness, God has chosen to dwell within men and women, making them holy, making them sharers in his infinite goodness and holiness. Let us welcome him with joy into our hearts.

Story captures sister's spirit

I was delighted to read the story about Mercy Sister Larretta Rivera-Williams ("Like nun other: Mercy sister breaks mold, brings Catholicism to unlikely venue," May 1).

Although my family now belongs to Our Lady of Mercy Church in Winston-Salem, when we first moved here we went to St. Benedict the Moor Church in Winston-Salem and Sister Larretta was one of the first people we met.

She was a pastoral associate there at the time, and she was very welcoming and friendly, and made us feel at home even though we didn't know anybody there.

Your story about her work at Wake Forest was extremely well written. I felt that it gave the reader a good insight into what Sister Larretta does for the students, and a good feel for the kind of person she is.

Thank you for the wonderful human interest story.

Courage to protect all is needed

In response to the letter to the editor that "Obama does care about nuclear annihilation" (May 1), let us be mindful that the instinct for self preservation is present in all of nature from animals to man. Even the communist or atheist who has no belief in God do not desire their own nuclear annihilation.

Letters to the Editor

The moral issue is the protection of all human life from the tiny embryo to the elderly. So let us be careful on how much admiration and honor we are willing to give to those who do not desire to protect human life in all its forms.

How many times our human nature rationalizes something is good for some convenience when it is really not. Courage for the truth is what is needed.

Love and forgiveness — the Christian way

The right to life is fundamental to all other rights. Some people disagree, however. Can we not learn to forgive them as Jesus did while he was on the cross and his life was being taken away from him?

He said, "Father, forgive them; they do not know what they are doing" (Luke 23: 34). As Christians, can we not follow his example of forgiveness?

When Corrie Ten Boom was confronted with forgiving the concentration camp prison guard who had, during her interment at Auschwitz, abused her, she said, "I cannot forgive him, Lord, but you can."

By giving the situation over to him, she was able to forgive.

Let us therefore not quench the spirit (1 Thessalonians 5:19). Before we confront or address a wrong, could we not find it within ourselves to forgive the perpetrators and heed the Holy Spirit Jesus sent us for our guidance?

Bishop visits Catholic families who lost homes in S.C. wildfires

BY CHRISTINA LEE KNAUSS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NORTH MYRTLE BEACH, S.C. — Joseph Gosiewski removed a carefully folded tissue from his pocket. Inside it, he said, were symbols of his Catholic faith.

They are among the few possessions remaining after a fire destroyed the home he shared with his wife, Nancy.

"There's the rosary I got for my first holy Communion, and the St. Joseph and St. Patrick medals that were put on my baby's crib," said Gosiewski, pointing to a singed but still recognizable rosary and two scorched medals held together by a safety pin.

The Gosiewskis' home was one of about 150 that were destroyed or seriously damaged when wildfires tore through the coastal beach area of South Carolina April 22-23.

The retired couple, members of Our Lady Star of the Sea Church in North Myrtle Beach, was one of seven families at the parish whose homes were destroyed. No one was injured or killed in the fires.

Bishop Robert E. Guglielmone of Charleston, S.C., speaks with Joseph Gosiewski as they stand in the ruins of the Gosiewski family's home in North Myrtle Beach May 1. The home was destroyed by wildfires that raged through the South Carolina town in late April. The Gosiewskis, members of Our Lady Star of the Sea Church, are one of seven families from the parish who lost their homes in the blazes.

Our Lady Star of the Sea families spent the afternoon of May 3 with Charleston Bishop Robert E.

Guglielmone, who visited the parish to celebrate Mass, meet with parishioners and tour the burned areas of nearby Barefoot Resort which was particularly hard-hit by the wildfires.

Father Robert Higgins, pastor of Our Lady Star of the Sea Church, said the parish has received and contributed to funds to help the fire victims. The parish community raised $21,000 through special collections, Catholic Charities supplied $10,000 and St. Andrew Church in Myrtle Beach collected $3,000.

Donations of food, clothing and furniture have also poured in to the church. Father Higgins said furniture and other items originally slated for the parish's annual garage sale will instead be given to the fire victims.

At the beginning of the May 3 Mass, Bishop Guglielmone told the congregation he "simply wanted to come and be with you where there was a loss, such fear and such trauma with these terrible fires."

He said he wanted to offer his own support and the support of the diocese.

"It is a very fearful thing to see fire approaching and not know what is going to happen," he added.

In his homily he urged parishioners to take to heart the image of Jesus as a shepherd. "Jesus presents himself as a model for his disciples ... we all need to shepherd each other, to seek out those who are lost and suffering," he said. "We are all in this together."

After Mass, Bishop Guglielmone met with some of the families and attended a private luncheon. He also visited the Gosiewskis' damaged home and other destruction in the area with the couple and their pastor.

The Gosiewskis moved into their home last year after they retired. The couple, who had lived in Delaware, decided to live in a coastal community after Nancy survived two bouts with cancer.

"When she got a clean bill in 2006, we decided to make a fresh start, because life's too short," Joseph Gosiewski told The Catholic Miscellany, diocesan newspaper of Charleston.

They were awakened the night of April 23 by a warning signal. They looked out and saw a wall of flame approaching from the thick woods behind their three-bedroom, one-story home.

The couple fled the area by car as soon as they saw the fire.

"To me, it was the most horrific thing I've ever experienced ... to see the fire so close," Nancy Gosiewski said.

They lost everything, from important papers and photographs to furniture, clothing and keepsakes.

"Losing the pictures is what hurts, but there's nothing you can do," she said, adding she has found comfort in keepsakes that were spared from the flames. She found a locket her father had given her and a collectible figurine.

She and her husband said the material losses can be replaced. They are thankful they survived and for the help they've received from their church and the community.

"Every morning when I open my eyes, I say thank you to God that I'm alive and my friends are alive," Joseph Gosiewski said. "It's also the last thing I say at night."

BETHLEHEM, West Bank — Visiting the Palestinian city of Bethlehem during his Holy Land pilgrimage, Pope Benedict XVI called for an independent Palestinian state and urged young people to reject acts of violence and terrorism.

The pope celebrated Mass May 13 in the city of Christ's birth and encouraged Christians to help rebuild their homeland's "spiritual infrastructure."

"Be a bridge of dialogue and constructive cooperation in the building of a culture of peace to replace the present stalemate of fear, aggression and frustration," he said in his homily.

Earthquake survivors stand at Donghekou Earthquake Site Park, a memorial to victims of the 2008 Sichuan earthquake, in Qingchuan county, China, May 11. China was marking the one-year anniversary of the May 12 Sichuan earthquake that devastated parts of the country's southwest.

A year later, suicide risk remains high among Chinese quake survivors

SHIJIAZHUANG, China (CNS) — One year after the deadly Sichuan earthquake, Catholic workers are focusing on the psychological needs of tens of thousands of survivors at risk of suicide.

The church-run Jinde Charities in Shijiazhuang — which sent the first group of medically trained nuns to the disaster area after the May 12, 2008, quake — is counseling survivors and helping them to rebuild their homes, reported the Asian church news agency UCA News.

Psychologists believe the quake's first anniversary could trigger more suicides than traditional celebrations of Chinese festivals that remind survivors of their families.

Father Paul Han Qingping, Jinde's deputy director, told UCA News that his agency is providing counseling and other services at several makeshift schools and shelters.

Two local government officials in Beichuan have killed themselves — one last October and another in April — according to media reports. No one knows exactly why, but the two men, ages 33 and 40, were grieving over the deaths of their sons in the quake and were working on the reconstruction of the area.

A Catholic nun who helped with relief work following the disaster said that some survivors had hanged themselves at their homes or from trees or had jumped from cliffs or buildings.

Chinese psychologists estimate that 3 percent to 5 percent of the victims — about 360,000 to 600,000 people — are suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder. Up to 10 percent of survivors would have suicidal tendencies, according to psychologists.

Catholic nuns and agency workers have responded by providing regular counseling to victims.

Father Han said quake-related suicides "make us more conscious of the significance and urgency of our work."

"Even if our intervention helps only one person, it would be a success," said Father Han, who visited Sichuan several times after the quake struck.

Jinde staff members often work with the local government and other nonreligious agencies. They also cooperate with the Institute of Psychology of the Chinese Academy of Sciences by offering psychological counseling courses for local officials and teachers to help them in their efforts to aid quake victims and students.

Father Han said that Jinde workers do not explicitly express their religious identity while helping in relief work, but when "we get in touch with and accompany the psychologically wounded victims, our faith would be shown naturally."

As of March 31, Jinde had given 23.3 million yuan ($3.4 million) for earthquake relief work. The Vatican and the Caritas network, the church's international relief arm, are among those providing aid.

Bishops launch new campaign against embryonic stem cell research

WASHINGTON (CNS) — As the National Institutes of Health continued to gather comments on the draft guidelines that would permit federal funding of embryonic stem cell research, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops launched a new campaign urging support for ethical cures and treatments "we can all live with."

The "Oppose Destructive Stem Cell Research" campaign at www.usccb.org/stemcellcampaign also encourages Web users to contact Congress and NIH to express opposition to the draft guidelines.

May 26 is the NIH deadline for public comment on the draft guidelines, which would allow the use of federal funds for stem cell research on embryos created for reproductive purposes at in vitro fertilization clinics and later discarded.

Donald Raibovsky, a NIH spokesman, said a total of 13,503 comments on the stem cell guidelines had been received as of May 8.

The home page for the bishops' new campaign outlines the reasons that the proposed guidelines are considered unacceptable and provides links to USCCB resources on stem cell research in English and Spanish.

In a video on the site, Cardinal Justin Rigali, chairman of the USCCB Committee on Pro-Life Activities, said the U.S. bishops "will be writing to Congress and the administration about the need to restore and maintain barriers against the mistreatment of human life in the name of science, and we urge other concerned citizens to do the same."

"Even if, like the embryos targeted by the NIH policy, an embryo may be at risk of being abandoned by his or her parents in a fertility clinic, that does not give researchers or the government a right to kill that human being — much less a right to make the rest of us subsidize that destructive agenda," the campaign materials say.

Pope thanks Swiss Guard for dedicated, loyal service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI underlined the Swiss Guard's important task of protecting the pope and watching over the Vatican.

The Guard must keep watch over the Apostolic Palace and be vigilant and kind to all those who enter, the pope said.

But, most importantly, the Guard must "faithfully, loyally and honorably serve the supreme pontiff and sacrifice, if necessary, their lives for him," he said.

The pope's comments came May 7 during a special audience with Swiss Guards and 32 new recruits.

New soldiers are sworn in during a colorful ceremony at the Vatican every May 6 to commemorate the day 150 Swiss Guards died saving Pope Clement VII's life during the sack of Rome on that date in 1527.

Today, the Swiss Guard numbers 110 men, but that may someday change.

The Swiss Guard's new commander has reiterated that he is open to the possibility of allowing female recruits.

Col. Daniel Anrig, who was named by the pope in December to head the Guard, told Italian television May 5 that letting women join the elite papal guard "may be possible."

Anrig said if the corps were to include women it would happen in the distant future.

The main problem, he said, is logistical: Where would the female guards be housed when there is only one barracks?

Having young men and women share the same living quarters "could create problems, but every problem can be solved," he said.

'Angels and Demons' is harmless entertainment, Vatican newspaper says

ROME (CNS) — The newly premiered movie "Angels and Demons" is little more than "harmless entertainment," with many factual errors and little cultural value, according to the Vatican newspaper.

Two dispassionate articles in L'Osservatore Romano May 7 may disappoint the film's promoters, who had sought a conflict with the Vatican of the type that surrounded "The Da Vinci Code" in 2006. Both films are based on books by author Dan Brown.

An editorial in the paper called both the film and the book "modest" and "rather innocuous." An accompanying review said that viewers "must face two hours of harmless entertainment that has little to do with the genius and mystery of Christianity, without getting beyond the usual stereotypes."

The review said the film was "pretentious" but actually complimented the "dynamic direction" and "splendid photography," and said the computer and studio reconstructions of the Vatican,

Sistine Chapel and St. Peter's Basilica, which were off limits to filming, were "magnificent."

The film, an action mystery involving the kidnapping of cardinals from a papal conclave by a secret Catholic sect, is the second collaboration between director Ron Howard and Brown, with Tom Hanks again in the starring role. It was shown May 4 at a glitzy affair at Rome's Auditorium performing arts complex.

The Vatican newspaper editorial acknowledged that the two books and films dealt with hot-button issues: the church and sexuality in the case of "The Da Vinci Code" and faith and science with "Angels and Demons."

L'Osservatore Romano's editor, Gian Maria Vian, said "Angels and Demons" posed no danger to the church.

"It only confirms the centuries-old fascination with our faith and our symbols," he said, adding, "If only all anti-Catholic operations were like this one."

The movie is set to debut in U.S. movie theaters May 15.

Clinton's remarks on reproductive rights spark Catholic concern

WASHINGTON (CNS) — U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's remarks expanding the definition of reproductive rights to include abortion have sparked criticism and warnings from a U.S. church official and a Catholic congressman.

Clinton's comments are a "real threat" to U.S.-based international aid agencies, such as Catholic Relief Services, which do not promote or provide abortions, said Deirdre McQuade of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Secretariat of Pro-Life Activities.

On Capitol Hill in late April, Clinton responded to a series of questions from Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., a leading pro-life member of Congress and a Catholic.

"Reproductive health includes access to abortion," Clinton said. "We are now an administration that will protect the rights of women, including their rights to reproductive health care."

In an interview with CNS, Smith said if U.S. dollars from the U.S. President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief and the U.S. Agency for International Development sponsor reproductive health care that must include abortion, then countries and organizations with pro-life policies could be forced to change their policies to include abortion in order to receive U.S. funding.

Teen constructs prayer garden

BOONE — Anastasia Wilkinson, a parishioner of St. Elizabeth of the Hill Country Church in Boone, completed construction of a prayer garden at the church.

The garden, part of Anastasia's Girl Scout Gold Award project, was dedicated March 29 by Father Joseph Mulligan, pastor.

Designed in the shape of a cross, the garden features Stations of the Cross, benches and urns of flowers. A path through the surrounding wooded area eventually will be turned into a "contemplative trail" by parishioner Alan Craft as part of his Boy Scout Eagle rank project.

With the assistance of her family, Anastasia, 17, began working on the prayer garden in the summer of 2008 after completing other components of her Gold Award, the highest achievement in Girl Scouts earned through service projects that demonstrate organizational skills and leadership.

Anastasia, a member of Girl Scout Troop 492, has been active in Scouting for 12 years.

"The parish would like to congratulate Anastasia on achieving her Gold Award and thank her for this beautiful contribution to our parish grounds," said Louise Ochoa, a parishioner of St. Elizabeth of the Hill Country Church.

"It (the garden) is sure to be used and enjoyed for many years to come," she said.

Kathryn was a third-place winner in the Maryknoll Essay Contest, this year themed "You Will Be My Witnesses," and one of six student winners out of 5,000 entries.

Margaret Gaughan, managing editor of Maryknoll magazine and one of the contest judges, noted that this year's entries indicate today's young people are very aware of Christ at work in their midst.

"Many of them see Christ in parents who not only sacrifice for their own families but also volunteer their time for others, in grandparents who serve as role models through their faith and devotion, and in peers who do the right thing even if it means risking popularity," she said.

Maryknoll Fathers and Brothers — formally known as the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America — was founded in 1911 with the support of the U.S. bishops to be the chief mission outreach of the U.S. church. Maryknoll currently serves in 27 countries worldwide.

thought, "Maybe this is what God is calling me to do."

He took the necessary steps required for opening a business, acquired a tax ID number and designed his own Web site.

Now he is head of operations for his production company — Divine Intervention Films.

And he did all that before his 18th birthday.

Brakefield is currently working on his first major production — a film about Maryknoll Father Vincent Capodanno, a Medal of Honor recipient and military chaplain who was killed while performing last rites for dying soldiers in Vietnam.

Patriotism and prayer

Deciding on the subject for his first major film required quite a bit of research on Brakefield's part.

"Zac is a very energetic and intelligent boy who has an interest in the visual arts and the media, and wants to be able to serve the church by using that interest," said Father Roger Arnsperger, pastor of St. Michael the Archangel Church and vicar of education for the Diocese of Charlotte.

From the beginning, there were two themes Brakefield wanted to incorporate into his film: Catholicism and war.

"I knew I wanted to have a hero in the movie," said Brakefield, who began by researching Medal of Honor recipients.

When he discovered Father Capodanno, Brakefield said he knew "this is the guy I want to make a movie about."

The film will chronicle the last three weeks of Father Capodanno's life during the Vietnam War.

"I want people to know how much this man of God was willing to sacrifice for others and how we should all strive to be like that," said Brakefield.

"Zachery has a drive and a passion for anything that he feels called to do," said Theresa Webster, faith formation director at St. Michael the Archangel Church and script writer for the Father Capodanno film.

"Last summer I was talking with Zac and his mother," said Webster, recalling how she got involved in the project. "They were looking for a writer and they wanted to try me."

In terms of research, Webster said she read "The Grunt Padre," a biography about Father Capodanno, and did research on the Vietnam War. But for the most part she relies on prayer.

Brakefield relies heavily on his faith, as well.

"During my first production, everything kept falling into place and I just knew God was looking out for me," said Brakefield. "We all kept saying it is divine intervention."

"He prays over everything," said Webster. "It seems that God places the right people in front of him."

Father Capodanno known as a 'servant of God'

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Maryknoll Father Vincent Capodanno was killed on the battlefield in Vietnam a little more than 40 years ago.

Known for his extraordinary service as a chaplain during the Vietnam War, Father Capodanno was killed Sept. 4, 1967, by sniper fire while administering last rites to dying Marines.

According to a biography on the Web site of the military archdiocese, Marines affectionately called Father Capodanno "the 'grunt padre' for his ability to relate well with soldiers and his willingness to risk his life to minister to the men."

"Grunt" is slang for a member of the U.S. infantry.

He extended his one-year tour of duty in Vietnam by six months to continue serving with his men.

Father Capodanno was posthumously awarded the nation's highest military honor, the Medal of Honor, "for conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of his life above and beyond the call of duty."

In June 2006 his canonization cause was formally opened and he now has the title "servant of God."

Since his death, several chapels and a U.S. Navy frigate have been named in his honor.

Zachery Brakefield (center) is pictured with Glenn Yellico and Theresa Webster during a script read-through at St. Michael the Archangel Church in Gastonia May 7. Webster wrote the script and Yellico will play Father Vincent Capodanno in the film being produced by Brakefield's production company, Divine Intervention Films.

Divine direction

One such person is Dave Jordan, military technical advisor for the film.

Brakefield met Jordan through the South Carolina National Guard, 178 Engineering Battalion, in Rock Hill, S.C. They were there to welcome returning military veterans from Afghanistan.

"Dave had about 100 flags for people to hold," said Brakefield. "So I went up and asked him for a flag. He gave me one and we began talking."

Another instrumental person in the project is David Rabideau, composer of the soundtrack and score for the Father Capodanno movie.

The two met through homeschool activities and are members of the church youth group. Like Brakefield, Rabideau is only 17 years old.

"Zac has a great leadership ability that stems from his maturing in the faith," said Father Arnsperger. "He is able to organize the generosity of these other young people and adults around him."

"He's so charismatic about everything that he just draws you in," said Webster. "It's a pleasure working with him."

Brakefield estimates that he spends about 30 hours a week working on film-related tasks. That is in addition to keeping up with his schoolwork and working part-time at a bagel shop in Rock Hill.

Brakefield also occupies his time talking to Vietnam vets about Father Capodanno.

One goal of the Father Capodanno film is to pay tribute to these men and women of the armed forces for the great sacrifices they make.

"I want to be able to show them that new generations support them and what they did in giving their lives for our country," he said of his presentations to Marine Corps Leagues and Veterans of Foreign Wars.

Brakefield hopes also to bring recognition to Father Capodanno and further his cause for canonization.

While the Father Capodanno film is in the fundraising and pre-production phases, Brakefield is occupying himself with a smaller project — a series of educational DVDs on the seven sacraments.

Father Arnsperger will narrate the films, which will be used during Catholic faith and culture camps at the church this summer.

"He is producing these to help with the theme of the Eucharistic Congress, 'The Word Became Flesh and Made His Dwelling Among Us,'" Father Arnsperger said, and to show that "God dwells with us through the sacraments."

"His effort with all of this stems from a very deep and growing spirituality," said Father Arnsperger.

Brakefield turned 18 on May 10. In the fall he will begin classes at Belmont Abbey College and will continue to work on the Father Capodanno film.

In terms of what is in store for the future, Brakefield said he plans to continue relying on faith.

"If God wants me to make this film, it's going to happen," he said.

Confirming faith

Teenagers learn about faith, unity during sacrament preparations

BY KATHLEEN HEALY SCHMIEDER
CORRESPONDENT

HENDERSONVILLE — The 2009 confirmation class at Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville reflects the diversity of the parish.

Of the 77 candidates, 40 come from Hispanic heritages.

Due to language barriers, two separate confirmation classes — one in English, one in Spanish — were formed. But this year the two will be working closer together.

In addition to introducing texts in both English and Spanish, the teachers have planned a number of activities and social events to foster unity and appreciation between the cultures while teaching the important connections based on their shared faith.

As such, the candidates' parents are encouraged to help foster their children's spiritual growth and to discern the priority that faith must play in their lives.

"With a class this size, they are all at different levels of faith commitment, but they feed off each other and make it work," said Sandy Donecho, who works with the English-speaking candidates.

The confirmation students gathered for a retreat at the Kanuga Conference Center in Hendersonville May 2.

A family picnic is planned this summer and another social event will be held in September.

Sandy Donecho and Mary Ann Owen of Rose's Ministry prepare a reception after a funeral Mass at Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville.

Ministry helps grieving families

When her mother, Rose Fiumara, died last year on May 15, Donecho realized how important the support offered by her parish family was in her grieving and healing process.

"The day of her funeral, when friends, family and the people from the parish came together, someone asked me if there was anything available at the church (for families)," said Donecho.

She found her grief leading to action.

"We called it Rose's Ministry because it was at the reception for my mother that the Holy Spirit gave me the idea," said Donecho.

This June, the ministry will celebrate its first anniversary with a bi-annual potluck luncheon at the church.

Over the past year, upon request the ministry — funded entirely through donations and comprised of eight teams, each consisting of at least 10 volunteers — has served several parish families by providing cake and coffee receptions after funeral Masses.

Wearing aprons embroidered with a single red rose, the volunteers offer compassionate service by allowing grieving families to share the consolation of friends and family at the church while all the preparation for and clean up of the receptions are handled for them.

"People who are grieving feel embraced through this," said Donecho. "We need that healing process; without it we can't move on. What better place for it to begin than here (at Immaculate Conception)?"

Donecho contacted local funeral homes to help inform Catholics about Rose's Ministry. When there is an interest, Donecho is contacted and a team is put into place to handle all the details for the family.

"There has been a need for a long time," said Mary Ann Owens, co-chair of one of the teams of volunteers. "Sandy's mom passed and the Lord used her to start this."

Donecho said the ministry is one of comfort and support.

"Through embracing your faith, you bring people close to your heart," she said. "Here it's like a hug from Jesus."

third meeting at St. Joan of Arc Church in Candler May 4.

They came from throughout the Diocese of Charlotte: Asheville, Bryson City, Charlotte, Hayesville, Hickory, Maggie Valley and Murphy.

"I have a strong interest in social justice issues," said David Tilly, a parishioner of St. Joseph Church in Bryson City. "We have a responsibility for all people."

"It's wonderful to be with like-minded people," said his wife, Cathy.

Bernie Offerman and his wife, Jan, are parishioners at St. Peter Church in Charlotte. They're in the chapter because membership "brings home to us in North Carolina concerns about global warming and mountaintop removal."

"These are 200 million-year-old mountains," he said. "We have to make it a point to stay in touch and be aware."

CCA's North Carolina Chapter formed last September.

"One of the purposes of the chapters in the different states is to create awareness about Appalachia and the problems of Appalachia," said Mary Herr, chair of the North Carolina Chapter, CCA's vice chair and a parishioner at St. Joseph Church.

DID YOU KNOW?

Appalachia covers 205,000 square miles, comprising all of West Virginia and parts of Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, Mississippi, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee and Virginia.

The Appalachian Regional Commission, a federal-state partnership, noted on its Web site that about 23.6 million people live in the 420 counties of the Appalachian region.

Most of the counties in the Diocese of Charlotte are part of Appalachia.

At its first meeting, the chapter identified issues of concern in North Carolina: the economy — including poverty; kinship care and lack of transportation; recycling and environmental concerns; and comprehensive immigration reform.

Members agreed to address one or more of these issues by promoting recycling, talking with Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults classes about the concerns, being more present to immigrants, volunteering to teach people about climate change, collecting food for a local food pantry, delving into issues of homelessness and working on a DVD about climate change and immigration reform.

At the May meeting, members talked about what progress they had made. For example, Claudie Burchfield, director of the diocese's Office of Economic Opportunity in Murphy, reported the kinship care program is under way in her area. Attendees from Asheville are delving into the consequences of Interstate 3, which would go through Asheville and allow for truck transport of hazardous waste.

Augustinian Father John Denny, pastor of St. Margaret of Scotland in Maggie Valley, said he had given "green" grocery bags to the parish's faith formation classes and had the church's lighting changed to more energy-efficient bulbs.

Father Denny has been St. Margaret of Scotland's pastor for 18 months.

"I became aware at one of the (Smoky Mountain) vicariate meetings that Mary Herr was starting a chapter of the Catholic Committee of Appalachia," he said. "I thought it would be a good way for me, a relative newcomer, to learn about the struggles and the issues of the Catholic Church in Appalachia."

The CCA-sponsored fourth annual Bishop Begley Conference will be held at St. William Church in Murphy Oct. 23-25. The theme is "Building Ecumenical Relationships in Appalachia."

Parishioner sentenced for embezzlement

BY DAVID HAINS
COMMUNICATIONS DIRECTOR

BELMONT — A 73-year-old woman has been sentenced for embezzling funds from Queen of the Apostles Church in Belmont. Evelyn Graham, a former bookkeeper at the church, was sentenced in Gaston County Superior Court April 28.

Graham pleaded guilty to forging more than 100 checks totaling $126,000 from the parish from March 2004 to October 2007. She was arrested in December 2007.

Financial irregularities at the church were suspected by Jack Morris, parish finance council chairman, and were later confirmed by a diocesan audit.

Graham was sentenced to six months of house arrest, five years of probation and 400 hours of community service. She also was ordered to pay restitution to the church at a rate of $50 per month.

At that rate, it will take her 210 years to make full restitution. However, the embezzled funds have been restored to the parish through insurance.

Father Frank Cancro, pastor, was not assigned to the parish while the embezzlement occurred but stressed the need for careful monitoring of financial accounts in all parishes.

"We were confronted by a clever and crafty individual who established trusting, friendly relationships, seemingly as part of a bigger plan to defraud the parish," he said. "It should be clear that this was not an isolated event, but a long-term, calculated process."

Morris, commended the work of the parish finance council.

"We are doing things now that were not being done before. People trust in churches, but it is important to do things such as checking reconciliations on a regular basis," he said.

"Things (at the parish) are in very good shape now," he added.

Pope takes Holy Land peace pilgrimage trip

The pope was on the sixth day of an eight-day "pilgrimage of peace" that had already taken him to Jordan and Jerusalem. Throughout his visit, he urged the region's peoples and its religious leaders to set aside historic antagonisms and make serious new dialogue efforts.

Nearly 100 Christians from the war-devastated Gaza Strip attended the Mass in Manger Square. The pope said his heart went out to them, and he prayed that the Israeli embargo on the strip would soon be lifted.

The pope crossed the border from Israel into the West Bank through a gate that stood beneath the most striking feature on the landscape: Israel's 26-foot-tall concrete security wall.

Speaking at the Aida Refugee Camp later in the day, he said the wall symbolized the stalemate between Israelis and Palestinians.

"In a world where more and more borders are being opened up — to trade, to travel, to movement of peoples, to cultural exchanges — it is tragic to see walls still being erected. How we long to see the fruits of the much more difficult task of building peace," he said.

The pope met with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas in the presidential palace in Bethlehem and paid a visit to the church-run Caritas Children's Hospital, where he visited an infants ward.

In Israel

The 82-year-old pontiff came to Israel from Jordan May 11.

At an airport welcoming ceremony in Tel Aviv, Israel, he said he wanted to honor the memory of the 6 million Jewish victims of the Holocaust and "to pray that humanity will never again witness a crime of such magnitude."

"Sadly, anti-Semitism continues to rear its ugly head in many parts of the world. This is totally unacceptable," he said.

Meeting with Israeli President Shimon Peres in Jerusalem the same day, the pope spoke about the sensitive topic of security, saying the term needs to be understood not simply as "the absence of threat" but as inseparable from justice and peace.

In a visit to the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial, Pope Benedict XVI prayed silently before the eternal flame in the Hall of Remembrance and said the suffering of Jews under the Nazi extermination campaign must "never be denied, belittled or forgotten."

The pope called the Holocaust an atrocity that disgraced mankind and said the church is committed to working tirelessly "to ensure that hatred will never reign in the hearts of men again."

He met with six Holocaust survivors, who later expressed their appreciation for the pope's gesture. But some Jewish leaders said they were disappointed that the German pope made no mention in his talk of the Nazi perpetrators of the Holocaust.

"Hear the cry of the afflicted ... send peace upon his Holy Land."

That evening, the pope told a group of interreligious dialogue experts that, in a world that has in some ways become "deaf to the divine," religions must give common witness to God's rightful place in the world.

The event was marred by a Muslim sheik's denunciation of Israeli policies, which prompted some Jewish representatives to walk out.

On May 12, the pope celebrated an open-air Mass in Jerusalem, prayed at the Western Wall and visited one of Islam's most sacred shrines. The events underscored his message that Jerusalem, a meeting ground for Christianity, Judaism and Islam, must again become a city of peace.

The pope also made a morning visit to the Dome of the Rock, sacred to Muslims as the place from which Mohammed ascended to heaven. He told Islamic leaders there that Christians, Muslims and Jews have a "grave responsibility" to expand dialogue and mend divisions.

The pope then went to the Western Wall, a site sacred to Jews as the remains of the Second Temple, and placed a written prayer in a crevice between the massive stones.

It asked God to "hear the cry of the afflicted" and "send your peace upon this Holy Land."

In the evening, the pope celebrated Mass for several thousand people in the Josafat Valley beneath the Mount of Olives, next to the walls of the Old City.

In his homily, he called for Jerusalem to regain its vocation "as a prophecy and promise of that universal reconciliation and peace which God desires for the whole human family."

Sadly, in today's Jerusalem, he said, "hope continues to battle despair, frustration and cynicism, while the peace which is God's gift and call continues to be threatened by selfishness, conflict, division and the burden of past wrongs."

Like many papal events, the Mass was tinged with politics. Welcoming the pope, Latin Patriarch Fouad Twal of Jerusalem said Palestinians dream of a "free and independent" state of their own while the people of Israel dream of living in peace and security.

In Jordan

The pope began his eight-day trip in Jordan, where he walked a pilgrim's path, energizing its minority Christian population and building bridges to the moderate Muslim world.

Arriving at Amman's airport May 8 he said he had come with "deep respect" for the Muslim community. It was Pope Benedict's first trip to an Arab country.

The pope paid tribute to interfaith dialogues launched by Jordanian leaders, saying they have advanced an "alliance of civilizations between the West and the Muslim world, confounding the predictions of those who consider violence and conflict inevitable."

The following day, the pope visited the King Hussein Mosque in Amman, pausing briefly in what the Vatican called

In a speech afterward to Muslim academics and religious leaders, the pope warned of the "ideological manipulation of religion" that can act as a catalyst for tensions and violence in contemporary societies.

The pope traveled May 9 to Mount Nebo, the place where Moses glimpsed the Promised Land before dying, and rode his popemobile to the ancient biblical city of Madaba, where he blessed the foundation of the first Catholic university in Jordan.

The pope's Mass May 10 in an Amman soccer stadium that holds 25,000 people was the liturgical high point of his visit to Jordan.

In his homily, the pope said Christians in the Holy Land have a special vocation to engage in dialogue and build new bridges to other religions and cultures, and to "counter ways of thinking which justify taking innocent lives."

Later in the day the pope made his way to the Jordan River, where archaeologists believe they have identified the site of Jesus' baptism by St. John the Baptist.

He blessed the foundation stones of two Catholic churches to be built at the location.

Books offer insights into spiritual quests of past and present

REVIEWED BY SISTER MONA CASTELAZO, CSJ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"God Seekers: Twenty Centuries of Christian Spiritualities," by Richard H. Schmidt, and "Touched by God: Ten Monastic Journeys," by Benedictine Sister Laurentia Johns, both present accounts and insights of diverse spiritual quests.

Schmidt offers short biographies, quotations and questions for reflection from early Christianity to the present. Sister Johns has gathered autobiographical writings from 10 contemporary Benedictines who describe their life experiences and their call to religious life.

Schmidt's book not only offers information and inspiration, but also shows the development of Christian consciousness from the fluid, open thought of early Christian theologians to the solidifying of structures, concepts and traditions, to postmodern spirituality — each period reflecting the worldview and theology of its particular era.

We see the early Fathers of the Church, from Irenaeus on, presenting Christ as the logos or word of God, the cosmic eternal mirror of the Father.

Gregory of Nyssa sees God as eternal relationship, eventually drawing all things to himself, while Antony emphasizes silence, simplicity and self-knowledge as ways to God.

The author begins the section on Western Christianity with Augustine's idea of the universality of sin and the necessity of grace, but also includes Patrick and the Celts, who stressed relationship to the earth and to one another.

Benedict's monastic ideal of a balance of study, work, prayer and rest appears in the same period as Symeon, who focuses on personal experience and wisdom as antidotes to the church's becoming too hierarchical, formal and lifeless.

The Orthodox Church followed Symeon's belief in human divinization as the purpose of the Incarnation: "God is fire ... and every human soul is a lamp," he writes.

In the medieval period, Anselm is shown attempting to prove the existence of God from reason. By way of contrast, Bernard of Clairvaux suggests that the Bible be read through the lens of metaphor and symbol in the way of the ancients.

Schmidt includes three major mystics. Julian of Norwich writes that sin results from ignorance and blindness, calling for a mother's mercy rather than for punishment.

Teresa of Avila's garden metaphor describes the spiritual development as beginning with hard personal work, but as ending with the acceptance of God-given rain.

Trappist Father Thomas Merton stresses the necessity of silent contemplation for transformation from the false to the true self.

In the Eastern tradition, Gregory Palamas practices the "prayer of the heart," which contrasts with the intellectual, philosophical approach of set teachings.

Jean-Pierre de Caussade, who sees Christ in every atom of matter and the present moment as a sacrament, is likened to Soren Kierkegaard, who holds that Christianity is "an ordered grasping toward a truth that is ever present," not depending on religious authority or outward forms — "a leap to exist in the fullest sense."

Schmidt truly provides the reader with an inspiring kaleidoscope of eclectic spiritual insights.

"Touched by God" shows the diversity of ways in which specific men and women live the Benedictine life.

Contributors range from a member of the lay community in her 20s who is considering the vowed life to a sister who entered in her 70s after the experience of two marriages, the raising of her children and the responsibility of a prominent job.

All 10 Benedictines show similarities in their experiences prior to entry, such as an early religious education, personal prayer, idealism and a call to surrender to God through study, service and a desire to become fully human in close community living.

All were inspired by the hospitality and humanness of the monks and through reading the Rule of St. Benedict in their search for personal vocation. Their stories are detailed, honest, captivating and often humorous.

Individuals make up connected community of God

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I'm writing this days after celebrating the sacrament of confirmation with 15 young people in our parish.

For me, as coordinator of their sacramental preparation, the confirmation Mass is always a spiritual and emotional "high." This one was no exception.

But only a few weeks earlier, at our final confirmation class, I felt kind of like the disciples in this weekend's readings about Jesus' ascension.

I felt as though I were searching the sky, struck by the feeling that Jesus had "left the building," so to speak. I sensed that our session wasn't clicking. None of us — candidates, catechists, sponsors — seemed to be connecting.

I was disappointed because throughout their preparation this particular group had been extremely engaged in every aspect of the spiritual journey we had shared. What was this emptiness I was feeling?

In retrospect, I think it was my looking for Jesus in the wrong place and forgetting, momentarily, about his promise of how the Holy Spirit comes to us and works with us.

I was reminded of it, though; when we gathered again last week for our confirmation dinner, an annual potluck meal with their families and sponsors to celebrate the young people's impending passage into full participation with us as Jesus' church.

When they arrived, they came with extended family and extra food, and I'd never seen the entire "confirmation community" mix so freely — and this in a group where three of the families spoke little English. The mood was total joy and fellowship.

At the confirmation Mass, I watched each confirmand anointed and sealed with the Holy Spirit, saw the excitement in their eyes and bearing, and remembered how God had gifted each one for his or her part of our shared mission to spread the Gospel. I recalled how Kane had deftly, compassionately encouraged a reluctant candidate from another parish on our retreat; how Sandi had decided to go play chess every week with an elderly nursing home resident; how Elizabeth had become a confident cantor; how Erin always had thoughtful words of encouragement for me.

I recognized again: Jesus has ascended to be with the Father, and his Spirit, as promised, continuously comes to us and is with us proclaiming the Gospel.

Questions:

When have you recognized the Holy Spirit proclaiming the Gospel in your faith community? How do you see individual gifts provided by God combining to build up the body of Christ?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"It is not for you to know the times or seasons ... but you will receive power when the Holy Spirit comes upon you, and you will be my witnesses" (Acts 1:7-8).

Comic actor Dom DeLuise dies at age 75

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Dom DeLuise, the Catholic comic actor who mastered the double-take look of surprise on film, died May 4 at St. John's Health Center in Santa Monica, Calif., after a long illness. He was 75.

First bursting into national consciousness with guest appearances on TV's "The Gary Moore Show," he cemented his fame with his appearances in some of Mel Brooks' zaniest movie spoofs, including "Blazing Saddles," "Spaceballs," "Silent Movie" and "History of the World Part 1."

DeLuise also partnered with Burt Reynolds in several movies, among them "Smoky and the Bandit II," "The End," "The Cannonball Run" and "Cannonball Run II."

In a 2006 interview with Msgr. James Lisante for the priest's TV show, "Personally Speaking," DeLuise told of his special devotion to Mary.

"People give me Blessed Mothers," DeLuise said in an interview "I have one here, I have one there. I have them all over the house."

"I said to my wife — before we had all these Blessed Mothers — 'I want a Blessed Mother, but only a small one.' We pull over to the side of the road, and there's a Blessed Mother. But the smallest one was only about 3 feet (tall)."

"I don't mind them. I like them. They give me comfort," DeLuise noted. "The Blessed Mother is someone that I pray to all the time, and in fact, I use her as a mantra. When I'm in my car and there's traffic, 'Hail Mary, full of grace ...,'" he said, reciting the complete prayer. "I say it all the time. It calms me down."

"When I was having surgery, and I was uncomfortable, I said 11 of those in a row, and it just calmed me down," he continued.

"I like the Blessed Mother, and I sure hope to heck she likes me."

When the TV variety show and the daytime chat show were staples of the small screen, DeLuise was a much-sought-after guest. He also racked up 20 appearances on "The Tonight Show" with Johnny Carson as host, and took his turn on the TV game-show circuit, including "The Match Game" and "Hollywood Squares."

Much of DeLuise's work over the past 15 years had been in children's media, acting on TV series, doing cartoon voice-overs and writing books. DeLuise wrote several cookbooks and children's books and occasionally appeared as a television and radio chef.

His last film role was a cameo in a 3-D shock-movie spoof, "Horrorween," which is still filming.

Former film publicist Robert Elisberg, writing on the Huffington Post Web site, said that in his 15 years of doing favors for Hollywood types, DeLuise was one of only two actors to have written thank-you notes. The other was John Houseman.

"Dom DeLuise was a big man in every way," said Brooks in a statement. "He was big in size and created big laughter and joy. He will be missed in a very big way."

His wife of 43 years, actress Carol Arthur, and their three sons, all actors, Peter, Michael and David, were at his bedside when he died. He also is survived by three grandchildren.

Student film spotlights effort to help poor with microlending

BY JACKIE TAYLOR
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Nonprofit entrepreneur and college student Andrea Carrow hopes her new documentary will "educate and encourage participation" in what she feels is the underreported issue of microlending in Chile.

The documentary debuted March 30 at the College of St. Benedict in St. Joseph, Minn., and St. John's University in Collegeville, Minn.

Carrow, 22, a senior at St. Benedict, is from Marshall, Minn. She will graduate this year and expects to continue on for a master's degree in public policy and international affairs.

In 2008, Carrow founded a nonprofit organization called Extending the Link with the help of the Entrepreneurship Center at St. Benedict and St. John's.

The organization produces educational documentaries that raise awareness of global concerns within the St. Benedict and St. John's communities.

St. John's is the brother school to the women's College of St. Benedict.

The documentary, titled "Del Micro al Cambio" ("From the Micro to the Change"), examines microlending, a process in the credit market where organizations, banks or individuals provide small loans to aspiring entrepreneurs to create or develop their small businesses. Microlending is especially common in underdeveloped and developing countries.

"These people can't get loans through a normal bank because they either have no credit history, have no collateral, or the overhead and labor required by the bank is too great to even cover the cost of the small business," Carrow told Catholic News Service.

Production of "Del Micro al Cambio" began in April 2008. Carrow, a Spanish major, spent six weeks in Santiago, Chile, building relationships with microcredit recipients and microlending organizations while the rest of her team

"We're all citizens of the world We want to bring the issue home."

— Andrea Carrow

did research in the United States.

"Chile has a really developed economy for South America. They have a great relationship with the United States, so the organizations we talked to were more receptive to us," Carrow said.

"I also learned how to get inside an organization in a country where it's my second language," added Carrow, who was the main Spanish speaker in her group.

St. Benedict senior Ashleigh Leitch and St. John's seniors Tom Allen and Martin Kronbergs joined Carrow in Chile for two weeks after Christmas to conduct interviews for the documentary.

The four students had a production budget just short of $10,000. They received grants from the College of St. Benedict Philanthropy Fund, the Undergraduate Student Research Grant at St. Benedict and St. John's, Students in Free Enterprise at St. Benedict and St. John's, and the Target Corp.

"Del Micro al Cambio" shows interviews of the entrepreneur recipients, microlending organizations and professors at St. Benedict and St. John's.

"We looked at the whole spectrum of businesses, but we've cut it down to about four in the documentary," said Carrow.

"One entrepreneur, Lino (Morales), started his business with half a kilo of sugar and a microloan, and now he is manufacturing candy in six cities across Chile," said Carrow.

Microlending organizations hope small business owners can eventually establish enough credit to become self-sufficient.

"We're all citizens of the world, so if it's an issue that affects people in Central Mexico, then it affects you here in the middle of Minnesota. We want to bring the issue home," Carrow said.

Last year, seven students produced a documentary focused on fair trade coffee in Guatemala and called "Somos de Cafe" ("We Are Coffee"). Carrow was the only student from that production team who returned to work on another film project.

The documentary is scheduled to be shown at an entrepreneurship conference in Seattle and again in Dallas.

Editor's note: Andrea Carrow's documentary is available to any interested schools, churches and organizations; copies of the DVD are available by e-mailing Carrow at arcarrow@csbsju.edu.

Msgr. Marcaccio challenged the students to take part in the program by creating and executing plans to amplify $10 to benefit others in a positive way. Students worked individually and in groups.

Samantha and her friends Ginger Barry and Miranda Wronecki combined their money to bake chocolate chip cookies, which were given away as tokens to those donating to TOPSoccer, a community-based training and team placement program for young athletes with disabilities. The effort raised $232.

"Doing this project was really fun and made me feel like I have accomplished something big," Samantha told her fellow students. "Making this money is going to make a difference in someone's life."

Another group of students used their money to purchase and plant a flowering bush for an elderly neighbor.

Student John Abram said, "Stewardship is a miraculous thing. Even the smallest of deeds can make a huge difference. You don't have to look very far to help someone."

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

They call each other 'sister'

Bonds of faith unite two very different women religious

What makes two women sisters?

Blood relationship, of course, makes one type of sisters. But faith can also make women sisters.

Recently my parish took our catechumens and candidates on retreat at a camp run by two nuns who remind me of how the sisterhood of faith is a wonderful thing and a great gift to the church and the world.

Our retreat was at Camp Maria, a youth camp at the water's edge on Breton Bay along the wide part of the Potomac River, just before it spills into the Chesapeake Bay. It is a spectacular spot within an ancient Catholic country. That area was settled by English Catholics in 1635.

Two Sisters of Charity of Nazareth run the camp, Sister Rose Johnson and Sister Mary Angela Hicks. Their order was founded by Mother Catherine Spalding, who was born nearby in 1793.

Sister Rose and Sister Angela are about as different as two women could be. They are from different countries, cultures, races, education and are of different ages. Yet they call each other sister.

Sister Rose was born in 1962 in Belize, the only English-speaking country in Central America. She was the sixth of nine children in a family of African descent.

She speaks English with the pleasant lilt of the Caribbean. She never knew winter in her tropical home.

Sister Rose went to New Jersey to go to college 20 years ago. As a girl she had met nuns in Belize, a heavily Catholic country. Although she was attracted to their life, she put the idea out of her mind.

But she says, "What you resist will persist." The idea of becoming a nun never left her.

Nine years ago Sister Rose took her final vows as a Sister of Charity of Nazareth.

Sister Angela took a zigzag path which brought her back to where she began. She was born in 1936, just a few miles away from where she works today.

At age 18, she entered the convent, but left after nine years. She returned home to the tobacco fields and fishing villages of Southern Maryland.

She married a widower, James Hicks, who already had seven children. At age 27, she was wife and instant mother to seven. They had three more children.

To support 10 children, they farmed, fished and ran a bar. For many years Mary Angela was the bartender. And like me, she has heard a lot of confessions; she just couldn't give absolution.

At age 43, Mary Angela was

widowed. She still had children at home. When they were grown, she decided to go back to the convent and took final vows in 1991 at the age of 55.

Her zigzagging was not done yet. When she was 64, she left to be a missionary in Botswana in Africa where she stayed five years. Now she has come full circle and back home to just a few miles from where she was born and raised a family.

Isn't the imagination of God wonderful? Who else would have paired these two in making a life and community together?

These two women from different countries, cultures, ages and race form a religious community, a mini-family of faith. They call each other "sister." I think it's wonderful.

What makes for strong bonds? Sister Rose and Sister Angela know: It is faith.

In Matthew's Gospel Jesus asks, "Who is my mother? Who are my brothers? ... Whoever does the will of my heavenly Father is my brother, and sister, and mother."

Faith makes us family.

Sister Rose and Sister Angela are living proof. We need more like them.

A radical lifestyle re-examined

Living our faith will provide compelling example to be followed

A radical idea was heard once again, this time coincident with the time when Americans were paying their income tax and discussing budget and policy.

There was a time when the community of believers was of one heart and one mind, and no one claimed his possessions were his own, but they held everything in common.

It was quite a community. There was no needy person among them, for those who owned property or houses would sell them and put the proceeds at the feet of the apostles, who saw to it that they were distributed to each according to need.

People willingly parting with some of their possessions to aid the poor — does this sound familiar?

It is the description of the early church in the Acts of the Apostles (4:32-37). It is easy to listen to that reading and acknowledge that, while very nice, that was then, and today is a very different age.

Not all agree today with the Christian communal concept, as exemplified by this reader's e-mail:

"In November voters were promised anything and everything from their government at the expense of the so-called rich who were now going to start paying more in taxes while the so-called working class would pay less."

A basic tenet of faith of that newly founded community was detachment from material possessions for the good of the greater community. Since it strikes some as redistributionist, even slightly socialistic, this concept finds only a tentative grip on the conscience of the culture.

The early church was idealistic, yes. It was not realistic, yes. And yet it is difficult to find any pope or council through the last 2,000 years revoking it for no longer fitting contemporary circumstances.

So if this was a condition at the founding of the church, what changed it? Wouldn't life be better if the practice continued? What went wrong?

Maybe something such as this: Two or three decades ago, a development of a dozen homes was established. The residents agreed that there would be a common green space, no yards at the houses. The community built a picnic area and a playground.

Consider This

STEPHEN KENT
CNS COLUMNIST

The years went on, more houses were built. Some residents had dogs, so other neighbors erected fences to keep the dogs out. Some objected to people walking over "their" yard to the playground, so they denied access.

The perceived need to protect "their" possessions drove residents to write rules and then to argue over their meaning.

Feelings ran so high that those near the community park weren't concerned that some other residents no longer had access. Those outside the community no longer saw it as a desirable place to live.

This limping analogy describes an organization that so deviated from its founding principles as to make them seem all but unbelievable when recalled later.

Idealistic, yes; realistic, perhaps not; but it is not impossible that the early Christian lifestyle can be restored despite the pessimism expressed by our same e-mail correspondent:

"Do you live outside of this country or perhaps on another planet? Or are you just trying to make yourself believe that people are really becoming nicer and more caring and more giving?"

It has happened before. As the same passage in Acts says: "With great power the apostles bore witness to the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, and great favor was accorded them all."

Rather than surrender to pessimism, can we too bear witness so others can find our faith so compelling as to be an example to follow?

Interfaith Openness

People from the U.S. and Canada are more likely to be open to other faiths than those from Europe.

'Our job is to help them choose life'

Seven secular challenges to the church

Father Val Peter is outspoken, energetic, always thinking and acutely aware of what's going on in the world.

From 1985 to 2005, he was executive director of what used to be known as Father Flanagan's Boys Town in Omaha, Neb. It was later renamed Girls and Boys Town, and then went back to simply Boys Town in 2008.

This safe haven for troubled youngsters — on the Omaha campus as well as at sites in 14 other states and the District of Columbia — provides family-style living, a first-class educational experience through high school and spiritual formation for thousands of boys and girls ages 10 to 17 who are admitted through juvenile courts or social service agencies.

Preference goes to those who have no natural or adoptive parents; many have been physically or sexually abused and most have been involved with the courts.

Father Val Peter now runs a Los Angeles-based national coalition of organizations called Character Counts. An astute observer of life in the church and secular world, Father Peter has just published a book titled "Seven Secular Challenges Facing 21st Century Catholics." It is well worth reading.

He sees "seven critical areas and challenges where our culture is not enriching, but rather diminishing our lives."

These are:

- (1) Diminished respect for authority
- (2) The widespread belief that one is free to experience everything.
- (3) Cynicism.
- (4) Mistaken ideological beliefs.
- (5) Learned helplessness.
- (6) Anti-intellectualism.
- (7) Political correctness.

"Learned helplessness" is the label Father Peter puts on the conclusion that "there is nothing I can do to make things better." And the "mistaken ideological beliefs" he identifies include totalitarianism, the MTV culture and terrorism.

Father Peter suggests that the Catholic Church is in possession of an untried remedy to all these problems, namely, Christian idealism. I'd like to let him speak for himself:

"More than anywhere else I have learned the lessons of the long spiritual journey (of reform and renewal that the church must take) from my years at Boys Town.

"I have seen thousands and thousands of young people come to us, all of them filled with anger, loneliness, frustration and the loss of hope, living in a postmodern culture: antiauthoritarian and cynical.

Looking Around

JESUIT FATHER
WILLIAM J.
BYRON
CNS COLUMNIST

"They feel free to experience everything. They embrace MTV's ideology. In some ways they are hopeless victims.

"These lives are reduced to a single narrow focus: Should I destroy my life (drugs, sex and alcohol) or go on? Is it worth the effort to swim against the tide of pain and despair, alienation and dysfunctionality? Or shall I curse God and die?

"Because of their past, they believe that love (even God's love) has to be merited, and they are convinced they are unworthy.

"This is the lie Adam and Eve believed when they hid themselves from God in the garden.

"Our job is to help them choose life."

Choosing life is not easy for anyone, young or old, who cannot see what the really good life is.

I think of the good life as the life that is lived generously in the service of others. That's a fair description of how Father Peter has chosen to live his very productive life.

That's why his advice to 21st century Catholics on choosing life wisely and well is worth considering.

Celebrate spring with a gift in honor of your loved ones

Legacy Notes

JUDY SMITH
GUEST COLUMNISTS

Spring is a beautiful and glorious time of the year when our senses delight in the blooming azaleas, dogwoods, jonquils and tulips. It is a time for reflection and spiritual renewal.

It also is a time to celebrate family and friends through the observance of Mother's Day, Father's Day, graduations and Memorial Day.

As you think about a gift that will express your love, consider a gift that also will benefit the entire Catholic community — celebrate your loved ones with a gift in their honor to your parish, a Catholic school or agency, the Diocese of Charlotte or the diocesan foundation.

A gift to an endowment also is a special way to honor those you are celebrating. And if you honor your loved ones with a gift to an endowment, you have the added value and comfort of knowing that the endowment will provide for future generations as well.

Gifts made in honor of others are most often made in the form of a check. This is a convenient method for the giver, provides a tax deduction within allowable limits for those who itemize their deductions and can readily be put to good use by the church.

But cash is only one of the many funding sources for honor gifts. Assets such as stocks, bonds and mutual funds can also be used to make gifts in honor of others. In addition, if you use appreciated assets to create your gift, you can receive extra tax savings.

When you fund a gift with an appreciated stock you have owned for more than one year, you can deduct the entire market value from your taxable income. Plus you avoid any capital gains tax on the stock because you donated it for charitable use.

These additional tax savings are why many people prefer to make honor gifts using assets rather than cash.

You can also establish these gifts through your will or long-range estate plan. Some families in the diocese have made provisions through their wills or estate plans to create endowments to honor their loved ones.

These endowments leave a legacy serving future generations of Catholics in the diocese and are a perpetual tribute in honor of those for whom they are named.

As you honor your loved ones this spring, consider a gift that will benefit them and the entire Catholic community. Celebrate your family and friends with a gift in their honor.

Smith is planned giving director for the diocese. Contact her at (704) 370-3320 or jmsmith@charlottediocese.org.

Obama's abortion agenda

Catholics need to stand up and protect the unborn

President Barack Obama is on the fast track to undo every single policy and law protecting unborn human life.

First, he cancelled the Mexico City policy, clearing the way for taxpayer dollars to go to organizations that provide and promote abortions overseas.

Next, the president authorized the State Department to release $50 million this fiscal year to the U.N. Population Fund which supports China's population control program, including coerced abortions.

Then, Obama declared his intention to repeal Health and Human Services' regulations that help protect health care workers from increasing pressure to perform abortions against their conscience.

Next, he issued an executive order nullifying earlier rules under the Bush administration that had largely prevented the use of federal funds for embryonic stem cell research — which requires the killing of human embryos.

This was followed by the National Institutes of Health drafting guidelines for stem cell research using embryos that were originally created for reproductive purposes.

The next step may soon be the federal government's support for human embryo farms. Some members of Congress are determined to push through legislation that will fund the creation of human embryos — through cloning or in vitro fertilization — for the sole purpose of storing and killing these tiny human beings to obtain their stem cells for research purposes.

And there is every reason to believe that Obama would sign such a bill.

Now, if all this isn't bad enough, there are well-founded fears that the president's health care agenda will include insurance coverage for abortion.

While the Catholic Church fully supports universal health care as a basic human right, and thus welcomes President Obama's desire to see it provided, the church cannot accept abortion coverage as part of the package.

Just when pro-life forces thought it couldn't get much worse, it has! And it will continue to worsen, unless followers of the God of life awaken and untiringly work for the full protection of the unborn!

It is extremely important that every Catholic contact his or her two U.S. senators and representative urging them to:

— Work for passage of a universal health care bill that explicitly excludes abortion.

— Vote against all forms of embryonic stem cell research.

— Vote for morally acceptable and successfully proven adult stem cell research.

— Support the Weldon amendment to the Labor/Health and Human Services appropriations bill.

This amendment forbids all federal agencies and states that receive federal funds from discriminating against the consciences of individuals and organizations who oppose abortion.

It is also important to contact President Obama (White House comment desk: 202-456-1111/e-mail: www.whitehouse.gov and click "contact us") asking him to please back off this agenda and begin using the power of his presidency to protect vulnerable unborn human beings.

During his 1979 visit to Washington, Pope John Paul II, standing within sight of the U.S. Capitol, boldly proclaimed to 175,000 of us: "We will stand up every time that human life is threatened. When the sacredness of life before birth is attacked, we will stand up and proclaim that no one ever has the authority to destroy unborn life!"

It's time to stand up!

Bishops urge Peru to protect the indigenous, environment in Amazonia

LIMA, Peru — In a statement criticizing development policies that they say threaten Amazonian communities and the environment, nine Peruvian bishops from the Amazon region urged the government to overturn a series of presidential decrees issued in 2008.

The bishops echoed the grievances of indigenous communities in the northern Peruvian Amazon. The communities have been protesting since April 9, blocking roads and rivers to pressure the government to overturn the laws and set up a task force to address their grievances.

In mid-May, police broke up a roadblock on a key bridge, sent naval vessels to unblock rivers and declared a state of emergency in several Amazonian districts.

The regional president of Loreto, the largest Amazonian region in Peru, refused to enforce the state of emergency, saying it violated the indigenous communities' right to protest.

In their statement, the bishops said Peru's Amazon region is "rich in ancestral cultures and biodiversity" and called it "the source of life and hope for humanity."

They criticized the government, which "in the name of a biased concept of development ... allows the deforestation of great expanses of primary forest" for palm-oil and sugar-cane plantations.

They also criticized pollution from mining and oil drilling, as well as "indiscriminate logging with no control."

Under Peruvian law, most forests and all underground resources, such as minerals, oil and gas, are state-owned, but the government can grant private logging, mining, oil and gas concessions.

Fifteen percent of Peru's tropical lowlands were under concession for oil exploration in 2004, a figure that had jumped to more than 75 percent by last year, according to Carlos Monge, a researcher at the Lima-based think tank Desco.

Many concessions overlap indigenous communities, and several include areas that the Interethnic Association for the Development of the Peruvian Amazon has asked the government to set aside to protect nomadic indigenous groups that still shun contact with the outside world.

Some of the laws the bishops are asking the government to overturn would make it easier for companies to operate on indigenous peoples' lands.

The government's attitude is "there are resources there, and these communities are an obstacle," Monge told a press conference of foreign journalists. "It is the fight for the last frontier."

Most of the controversial laws were issued in 2008 by presidential decree, instead of being debated and approved by Congress.

A congressional commission recommended that they be repealed because they were unconstitutional, but Congress has not discussed the recommendation.

The interethnic association said some 10,000 indigenous people in the tropical lowlands are involved in the demonstrations.

The government moved to break up the protest after demonstrators shut down pumping stations on a pipeline that carries oil from northern wells to the Pacific coast and blocked rivers leading to other oil fields.

"We cannot compromise the country's energy security," Environment Minister Antonio Brack told foreign journalists.

Alberto Pizango Chota, president of the interethnic association, said the indigenous people were taking "more radical measures" because "it is the only way to make the government understand" the seriousness of their demands.

Pizango said the indigenous people are fighting for civil rights that have been denied since the Spanish conquest.

Rubber tappers and loggers enslaved Amazonian indigenous people in the 19th and early 20th centuries, and the region's communities are now threatened by deforestation, logging and pollution, he said.

"The government has always seen us as third-class citizens," he said. "This is a subtle second colonization, a subtle genocide. It means death for our people."

Peru's Health Ministry has found high levels of several heavy metals in the blood of the Achuar people living along the Corrientes River in northern Peru.

Experts say the metals, which can cause neurological problems, probably came from water pumped into streams and the river over decades as a byproduct of oil drilling.

While the government promotes oil concessions for the country's development, Pizango said: "In 38 years, the only development in that area is that the people are condemned to die with lead and cadmium in their blood. Their rivers and lands are polluted. We don't want that kind of development."

In their statement, the bishops cited the conclusions of the Fifth General Conference of the Bishops of Latin America and the Caribbean in Aparecida, Brazil, in 2007, which called for "alternative, integral development based on solidarity and an ethic that includes responsibility for human and natural ecology, rooted in the Gospel of justice."

They echoed the indigenous protesters' demand for the laws to be nullified and new laws to be drafted "with the participation of the indigenous population" and called for dialogue between the government and protesters.

HICKORY — Ryan Succop, doesn't mind being the last pick in the 2009 NFL draft. In fact, he considers it a blessing.

"I took it differently than most people would," said Succop, who was acquired by the Kansas City Chiefs as the 256th overall draft pick.

"As a kicker it's hard to get drafted," Succop said, "I looked at it as a blessing."

Along with a chance to try out for the team, being the last pick in the draft earned Succop the title of "Mr. Irrelevant," which for better or worse carries with it a good bit of publicity.

The title, "Mr. Irrelevant," has been around since 1976 when former NFL receiver Paul Salata wanted to honor

In Holy Land, pope delivers religious, political challenges

VOUCHING FOR SUCCESS

Ronald Holassie, a sophomore at Archbishop Carroll High School in Washington, testifies at a hearing on the D.C. Opportunity Scholarship Program on Capitol Hill in Washington May 13. Former D.C. Mayor Anthony Williams is in the background at left. Language that congressional Democrats included in the $410 billion omnibus spending bill would end the scholarship program, although President Barack Obama recently proposed allowing students currently enrolled in it to finish their education. The program gives low-income families up to $7,500 per year for private school education.

Senators urged to keep voucher program that helps low-income families

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The District of Columbia's public schools "didn't get bad overnight, and they are not going to get better overnight," a student from a Washington Catholic high school said May 13, urging Congress to continue funding a program that helps low-income families send their children to local private schools.

Ronald Holassie, a sophomore at Archbishop Carroll High School, was one of two students who testified at a Senate hearing about the importance of the D.C. Opportunity Scholarship Program, now in jeopardy since Congress voted to cut funding in March.

On May 6, President Barack Obama proposed more funding for students who are already in the scholarship program, but not for new students. The program gives annual scholarships of up to $7,500 to low-income families that allows them to choose a private school for their children.

Until the district's public schools improve, students need Opportunity Scholarships, said Holassie, himself a scholarship recipient and the district's deputy youth mayor for legislative affairs. He told the senators that at Archbishop Carroll he finds "more expectations, higher academic expectations."

"Teachers really want me to succeed. I didn't get that motivation in public schools," he said. "I feel that having Opportunity Scholarships absolutely changed me as a person. We need Opportunity Scholarships for children in D.C."

Tiffany Dunston, valedictorian of Archbishop Carroll's class of 2008 who just completed her first year at Syracuse University in New York, testified she was the first member of her family to attend college. She attended Archbishop Carroll with the help of an Opportunity Scholarship.

"You have the ability to give other D.C. children the opportunity I had. My education gave me the chance at a successful future. Please don't end a program that worked for me and is benefiting tons of other children," she said.

"Three years from now, I'll be walking across a stage receiving my college diploma. Without the Opportunity Scholarship Program, none of this would have been possible," she said.

The Opportunity Scholarships were approved as a pilot federal program five years ago as part of a bipartisan effort to expand educational opportunities in the city for children attending public, charter and private schools. The program includes $14 million for annual scholarships so low-income children can attend the schools of their choice.

Currently, 1,700 children in the city's poorest neighborhoods receive the scholarships, with about one-half of them attending Catholic schools in the city. The Archdiocese of Washington and participating Catholic schools subsidize the remaining tuition costs for those students.

Congress voted to authorize funding for the 2009-10 school year, with the stipulation that for the program to be continued after that it would have to be reauthorized by both Congress and the District of Columbia Council.

A statement from the Archdiocese of Washington noted that Obama's plan to continue funding only for students currently in the program "would mean the slow death of a successful program that is helping move children in our nation's capital out of poverty."

Help given to immigrants affected by Iowa raid called faith in action

POSTVILLE, Iowa (CNS) — After the first anniversary observance of the immigration raid in Postville May 12, Archbishop Jerome G. Hanus of Dubuque said he hoped the event would show the world that faith in Christ ended in action.

"We're hoping to show that we take the words of our Scriptures very seriously," he said, "to treat the alien in your midst like your brother or sister, and that when you receive the alien, the foreigner, you are welcoming Christ."

A year to the day federal agents descended on Agriprocessors, the town's largest employer and biggest industry, and arrested 389 undocumented immigrant workers, people of all faiths and walks of life gathered in solidarity to show support for those most affected by the raid.

Many of those arrested already have been deported. Others remain lost in the court systems.

More than 650 people attended a day of remembrance at St. Bridget Church. The day's observance began at 10 a.m., the time the raid began. Bells around the town tolled once for each arrested worker.

Catholic, Protestant and Jewish religious leaders joined Archbishop Hanus at St. Bridget for a 4 p.m. interfaith prayer vigil and solidarity walk to the Agriprocessors meat packing plant.

It was important, the archbishop said, for the event marking the raid to be both local to Postville and universal in participation.

"We decided the event had to take place here because this is where the event took place and this is where so much of the suffering has happened," he said in an interview with The Witness, the archdiocesan newspaper.

Vatican launches iPhone, Facebook applications for communications day

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican is launching iPhone and Facebook applications in an effort to help Catholics, especially younger generations, use new technologies to create a culture of dialogue, respect and friendship.

The new applications are part of a brand new Vatican Web site — www.pope2you.net — that was to go live on World Communications Day, which will be celebrated May 24 in most dioceses.

Sponsored by the Pontifical Council for Social Communications, the new site was created to help attract young people to and spread Pope Benedict XVI's message for World Communications Day, the head of the council, Archbishop Claudio Celli, told reporters May 18.

This year's communications day message is dedicated to "New Technologies, New Relationships: Promoting a Culture of Respect, Dialogue and Friendship."

"We thought that it was good to present the message to the young generation through technologies that they know how to use," the archbishop said during a press conference unveiling the new site.

"We think this pontifical council itself has to use new technologies to promote new relationships around the world," he said, adding that "we must take advantage of what the new technologies are offering us at this very moment."

He said the pope's message inspired the council to create a simple, fresh site to work as a hub from which users can find some new ways the universal church is present in the digital world.

The site offers viewers a link to a new application on the social networking site Facebook.

In conjunction with the Vatican Television Center and Vatican Radio, H2Onews will distribute audio and video reports exclusively through the iPhone in eight different languages, including Chinese.

Pope's pediatric hospital: Making a big impact helping tiny patients

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Of the thousands of hospitals the Catholic Church owns or operates, one has a very special patron. Known as "the pope's hospital," the Bambino Gesù Children's Hospital belongs to the Vatican.

Under the aegis of the Vatican's Secretariat of State, it's the only children's hospital in Rome. And the hospital has gained worldwide recognition for its quality care, cutting-edge research, Christian ethics and charitable outreach to five continents.

This year Bambino Gesù, Italian for "baby Jesus," is celebrating the 140th anniversary of its birth. From its humble beginnings as a 12-bed ward in a family home to 800 beds in a modern hospital complex, the pope's hospital has a lot to celebrate.

Founded in 1869 by Duchess Arabella and Duke Scipione Salviati, it became the first pediatric hospital on the Italian peninsula. At the time, children needing care were obliged to share hospital wards with adults.

With the help of their own children, who donated the contents of their piggy banks for the cause, the duchess and duke turned one of the family's homes into a small pediatric hospital run by the Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul.

In 1887, the facility was transferred to its current location within the 15th-century convent of St. Onuphrius, on the Janiculum Hill behind the Vatican.

Pope Benedict XVI visited the hospital shortly after his election in 2005.

He said he wanted Bambino Gesù Children's Hospital to be the first hospital he visited in his pontificate, not only because it's a Vatican-related institution, but because he wanted to faithfully give witness to Jesus "who loved children tenderly and wanted them to be allowed to go to him."

Bishop Wang, auxiliary in San Francisco, retires at age 75

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI has accepted the resignation of Auxiliary Bishop Ignatius C. Wang of San Francisco, who turned 75 in February.

The papal decision was announced May 16 in Washington by Archbishop Pietro Sambi, apostolic nuncio to the United States.

Bishop Wang was believed to be the first Chinese-born member of the U.S. hierarchy.

Born Feb. 27, 1934, in Beijing, Bishop Wang (pronounced Wong) was the fifth of eight children in a Catholic Chinese family that was descended from a Manchurian emperor, the rulers of the last Chinese dynasty.

After studies for the priesthood in Hong Kong, he was ordained for the Prefecture of Kienow, China, July 4, 1959.

In 1974 he began work in several parishes in San Francisco, a city where nearly one-fourth of the residents are of Chinese ancestry.

Before his appointment as a bishop in late 2002, Bishop Wang had been coordinator of the Chinese Apostolate in the San Francisco Archdiocese since 1981, archdiocesan director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith since 1994 and chancellor since 1998. He was ordained a bishop Jan. 30, 2003.

This year's celebration is scheduled to take place June 22-26.

But Succop doesn't have time to think about all that.

"I really don't worry too much about the attention — simply because I still have to go out and make the team," he said. "Right now I'm just focusing on football."

Succop was born and raised in Hickory, where he and his family attend St. Aloysius Church. His mother, Kathy, is the pastoral coordinator there.

He attended Hickory High School, where he was rated the fourth best kicker in the nation.

Then he accepted a full athletic scholarship to the University of South Carolina, where as a punter and placekicker, he set scoring records and earned numerous awards.

While at USC, Succop excelled academically, often making the dean's list while pursuing a double major in finance and management with a minor in psychology.

Throughout his college years, Succop said it was his faith that helped him meet challenges.

"My faith has helped me a lot," he said. "Knowing I've got that rock to fall back on strengthens me in everything I do."

At USC, Succop and his teammates prayed with the team chaplain.

"The whole team says the Lord's Prayer before every game," he said.

Off the field, Succop has made it a priority to give back to those who are less fortunate.

"I've been so blessed," he said, "I just want to be able to give back and help do God's work."

As a member of the Fellowship of Christian Athletes, Succop spent time during college visiting with children at local hospitals and elementary schools.

That desire to help those in need was instilled in him through his faith.

"God has given me a platform to go out and help others," he said. "I want to use that platform."

Succop completed rookie camp with the Kansas City Chiefs the second weekend in May.

He'll spend the rest of the summer,

Then in September, he'll find out if he has made the team.

While his focus is on football, Succop hasn't lost sight of what's really important.

"I always ask myself, 'Am I honoring God by doing this?'" he said. "I just try to honor the Lord in everything I do."

Obama calls for mutual respect, dialogue on abortion, other issues at Notre Dame boisterous applause, Obama invoked then-Notre Dame president Holy Cross Father Theodore Hesburgh's winning an agreement in the 1960s from deeply divided U.S. Civil Rights Commission members during a fishing trip in Wisconsin as a model of persevering dialogue.

"Open hearts. Open minds. Fair-minded words. It's a way of life that has always been the Notre Dame tradition," Obama said, positioning dialogue as the hope for solutions to enormous modern problems.

"Your class has come of age at a moment of great consequence for our nation and the world — a rare inflection point in history where the size and scope of the challenges before us require that we remake our world to renew its promise; that we align our deepest values and commitments to the demands of a new age," he said.

"We must find a way to live together as one human family. Moreover, no one person, or religion or nation can meet these challenges alone. Our very survival has never required greater cooperation and understanding among all people from all places than at this moment in history," he said.

Obama listed war, gay rights and embryonic stem cell research among difficult issues that demand dialogue, but he spent the bulk of his talk on the abortion issue.

Critics of Notre Dame's decision to invite Obama, including more than 50 bishops, said the president's support of legal abortion and embryonic stem cell research made him an inappropriate choice to be a commencement speaker at a Catholic university and to receive an honorary degree from Notre Dame.

The local bishop, Bishop John M. D'Arcy of Forth Wayne-South Bend, announced weeks before he would not attend the ceremony, and a student group, Notre Dame Response, and other protesters held daily demonstrations. On commencement day, the student group also received permission to hold a vigil for life at the grotto on campus as an alternative graduation ceremony.

During the main commencement ceremony in the Joyce Center, a handful of hecklers were escorted out during Obama's talk — once with a student-led "We are ND" chant drowning out the protesters' shouts.

Obama said he had learned to choose careful language on the issue during his race for the Senate in Illinois, when a pro-life doctor complained that his Web site referred to abortion opponents as "right-wing ideologues who want to take away a woman's right to choose." Obama had the words removed.

"And I said a prayer that night that I might extend the same presumption of good faith to others that the doctor had extended to me," Obama told the graduates and their families.

"Because when we do that — when we open our hearts and our minds to those who may not think like we do or believe what we do — that's when we discover at least the possibility of common ground," he said.

Polls find more Americans call themselves 'pro-life' than 'pro-choice'

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Opinion polls are finding that Americans are taking a dramatic turn toward greater opposition to abortion.

A poll conducted May 7-10 as part of the annual Gallup Values and Beliefs survey found that a majority of Americans (51 percent) described themselves as "pro-life" with respect to the abortion issue, while only 42 percent said they were "pro-choice." The results were made public May 15.

It marked the first time since Gallup began asking the question in 1995 that more respondents said they were pro-life than pro-choice, and was a shift of 7-8 percentage points from a year earlier, when 50 percent said they were pro-choice and 44 percent said they were pro-life.

A separate Gallup Poll Daily survey conducted May 12-13 found that 50 percent of Americans described themselves as pro-life and 43 percent as pro-choice.

The results were similar to another national survey made public April 30 by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press, which found that the number of Americans who said abortion should be legal in all or most cases had declined to 46 percent in April 2009 from 54 percent in August 2008.

Forty-four percent of respondents in the Pew poll said abortion should be illegal in most (28 percent) or all cases (16 percent), up from 41 percent in August 2008.

The margin of error for each of the three polls was plus or minus 3 percentage points.

In the 2009 Gallup Values and Beliefs survey, 52 percent of the Catholic respondents and 59 percent of Protestants or members of other Christian religions described themselves as pro-life, compared to 45 percent of Catholics and 51 percent of Protestants in May 2008.

When Gallup first began conducting the Values and Beliefs survey in 1995, 56 percent of Americans described themselves as pro-choice and only 33 percent said they were pro-life.

Since then, the highest percentage to identify themselves as pro-life was 46 percent, in both August 2001 and May 2002.

In surveys conducted by Pew Research, support for keeping abortion legal in all or most cases ranged in 2008 from 57 percent in mid-October to 53 percent in late October but dropped to 46 percent in April 2009.

A Notre Dame student displays her mortarboard with a pro-life symbol next to a student displaying one with a symbol from the "Obama for President" campaign. The students are pictured prior to the commencement address by U.S. President Barack Obama at the University of Notre Dame in Notre Dame, Ind., May 17.

Acknowledging that positions on abortion are in some ways irreconcilable, he urged respect for conscience and recognition of the "heart-wrenching decision for any woman to make, with both spiritual and moral dimensions."

"So let's work together to reduce the number of women seeking abortions by reducing unintended pregnancies, and making adoption more available, and providing care and support for women who do carry their children to term," he said.

"Let's honor the conscience of those who disagree with abortion, and draft a sensible conscience clause, and make sure that all of our health care policies are grounded in clear ethics and sound science, as well as respect for the equality of women," he said.

"Each side will continue to make its case to the public with passion and conviction. But surely we can do so without reducing those with differing views to caricature," he said.

Noting he was not raised in a particularly religious household, he said he was "brought to Christ" by the witness of co-workers in service on the south side of Chicago and Cardinal Joseph Bernardin. Obama acknowledged Catholic parishes helping fund an organization called the Developing Communities Project.

He contrasted faith and certainty, describing a doubt that fosters humility.

"It should compel us to remain open and curious and eager to continue the moral and spiritual debate that began for so many of you within the walls of Notre Dame," he said.

"And within our vast democracy, this doubt should remind us to persuade through reason, through an appeal whenever we can to universal rather than parochial principles, and most of all through an abiding example of good works, charity, kindness, and service that moves hearts and minds," fulfilling the golden rule shared by religious and nonreligious people.

Obama invoked Father Hesburgh's twin images of Notre Dame as a lighthouse of Catholic wisdom and a crossroads where different cultures can converge. The priest, now 91, attended the commencement.

Obama also recounted how Father Hesburgh, the sole surviving member of the first U.S. Civil Rights Commission, brokered the deal that became the basis of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by flying the members to Notre Dame's Land O' Lakes property: "They fished, and they talked, and they changed the course of history."

"I will not pretend that the challenges we face will be easy, or that the answers will come quickly, or that all our differences and divisions will fade happily away," he said. "Life is not that simple. It never has been."

"But as you leave here today, remember the lessons of Cardinal Bernardin, of Father Hesburgh, of movements for change both large and small," he continued. "Remember that each of us, endowed with the dignity possessed by all children of God, has the grace to recognize ourselves in one another; to understand that we all seek the same love of family and the same fulfillment of a life well-lived. Remember that in the end, we are all fishermen."

Holy Cross Father John Jenkins, president of Notre Dame, and Judge John Noonan, who won the university's prestigious Laetare Medal in 1984 and delivered a brief speech "in the spirit of the Laetare Medal," also addressed the protests that erupted after Obama accepted Father Jenkins' invitation to speak.

On May 16 a group of leading Catholic theologians and other leaders published a full-page advertisement in the South Bend Tribune daily newspaper in support of Father Jenkins' invitation to Obama, and the graduating class selected the priest as their senior fellow. The crowd gave him two standing ovations at the close of the ceremonies.

"More than any problem in the arts or sciences, engineering or medicine, easing the hateful divisions between human beings is the supreme challenge to this age," Father Jenkins said in his introduction of Obama. "If we can solve this problem, we have a chance to come together and solve all the others."

Noonan referred to Harvard professor and former U.S. ambassador to the Vatican Mary Ann Glendon, who declined the medal in late April, as making a "lonely, courageous and conscientious choice."

"I respect her decision," he said to applause. "At the same time, I am here to confirm that all consciences are not the same; that we can recognize great goodness in our nation's president without defending all of his multitudinous decisions; and that we can rejoice on this wholly happy occasion."

ANSWERING THE CALL

Brother Richard Sutter is pictured holding the hands of Bishop Peter J. Jugis as he promises obedience during his diaconate ordination at Belmont Abbey May 11.

Belmont Abbey grad ordained as transitional deacon

BELMONT — Brother Richard Sutter was ordained a transitional deacon for the Legionaries of Christ by Bishop of Charlotte Peter J. Jugis in a ceremony at the Minor Basilica of Mary Help of Christians at Belmont Abbey May 11.

After 10 years of discernment in both the military and civilian life, Deacon Sutter has chosen to follow God's call to a priestly vocation. He will be ordained as a Legionaries priest in Rome in December.

Deacon Sutter first considered the priesthood in 1986 when he was 17 years old. But after interviewing with his diocese's vocations director, he decided to go to college first.

He graduated magna cum laude from Belmont Abbey College in May 1991 with a degree in business administration. He was in Army ROTC and the North Carolina Army National Guard, which led to his commission in the U.S. Army as a second lieutenant upon graduation.

He then spent time at several U.S. bases and in Germany. He was awarded the Meritorious Service Medal as a captain while serving a one-star general in Europe.

In 1997, Deacon Sutter left the Army to pursue a business career. In 1999, after attending a Legionaries of Christ summer candidacy program, he decided to follow his call to the priesthood.

For the past three years he has been completing his theological studies at the Legionaries' Pontifical Regina Apostolorum Athenaeum in Rome. He credits Abbot Placid Solari of Belmont Abbey with guiding him throughout college and the years that followed, prior to his entering the Legionaries.

"Richard's years at Belmont Abbey College were important for his formation in the faith," said Abbot Solari. "Although he felt that his own personal character and gifts suited him better for apostolic religious life than monastic life, he gives the college community and the monks much credit for his own vocation to religious life and the priesthood."

"It is precisely because of the deep attachment he has maintained to the college and monastery that he requested that his diaconate ordination be celebrated at the Abbey," Abbot Solari said.

The Legionaries of Christ is a religious congregation founded in 1941. Its mission is to extend the kingdom of Christ in society according to the requirements of Christian justice and charity, and in close collaboration with the bishops and the pastoral plans of each diocese.

Today the Legionaries number more than 800 priests and 2,500 major and minor seminarians serving in 22 countries.

Conference aims to erase misconceptions about Islam

Seeks to promote interfaith dialogue and understanding

ISLAM, from page 1

Conference is an annual event to promote interfaith dialogue among Lutherans, Anglicans or Episcopalians, Roman Catholics and United Methodists.

The goal of this year's theme, "Understanding Islam," was to dispel misconceptions regarding the Islamic faith.

"In our society today there is a great deal of talk, discussion and criticism of Islam," said Father George Kloster, pastor of St. William Church in Murphy.

"A lot of the information is not accurate in terms of the true teachings of Islam," he said.

Father Kloster was the Catholic representative in the planning group for this year's conference, which was attended by approximately 40 people, ordained and lay, from the four Christian denominations.

Dr. Mohammed Lodhi, associate professor of biotechnology at Fayetteville State University, was the featured speaker. Dr. Lodhi is a participant in the Islamic Speakers Bureau.

"Media, the Internet, books and television portray incomplete, and in many cases, misleading representations of Islam," said Dr. Lodhi.

One of the positive aspects of the conference is that "people from different denominations are able to sit down face to face," and discuss differences and similarities in their belief systems, he said.

Topics of program sessions included an introduction to Islam and its history, an explanation of current events in the Middle East and a discussion of the barriers to peace and conversation among Muslims, Christians and Jews.

"Each of the four denominations (Lutheran, Episcopalian, Catholic and United Methodist) has a bishop in its organizational structure," said Father Kloster, who explained the premise behind the name and makeup of the event.

Every year, one of the highlights of the conference is the bishop's panel. This year the four bishops discussed their experiences with interfaith ministry, Middle East issues and peace issues.

"I look forward to the LARCUM Conference each year," said Charlotte Bishop Peter J. Jugis. "It is a great opportunity to meet personally with (Lutheran) Bishop Bolick, (Episcopal) Bishop Taylor and (United Methodist) Bishop Goodpaster to discuss matters of common interest as we serve the Lord in North Carolina."

According to Father Kloster, there are two beneficial values of the conference.

The first is education on the topic, in this case, Islam and understanding its myths.

The second is that the conference provides an opportunity for members of the four represented denominations to discuss misconceptions that they may have of each other.

"We have things in common and we have our differences," said Dr. Lodhi.

At this time in history the focus tends to be on talking about the differences, but "we should be talking about our common goals," he said.

FROM THE HOLY LAND

In Holy Land, pope delivers challenges diverse audiences in Jordan, Israel and the Palestinian territories May 8-15. That alone was an achievement.

The common theme that tied his events together was that God acts in human events, and that believers have a duty to make religion an effective force for good in a region suffering from war, mistrust and misunderstanding.

To Christians, the pope focused on the hope brought by the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

On his final day in Jerusalem, he summed up his message, saying that the empty tomb "assures us that God can make all things new," that peace is really possible and that long-standing hostilities can be overcome.

That was the point of the pope's pilgrimage to places like the Jordan River, the Grotto of the Annunciation and Golgotha. He was not just engaging in religious tourism, but trying to strengthen the confidence of the struggling Christian community in the Holy Land and the faith of other Christians who watched and listened from afar.

His blessing of new construction sites for churches and a Catholic university in Jordan underscored his point that even as a tiny minority the church can have a significant and positive impact on society.

Interreligious reasons

On an interreligious level, the pope's pilgrimage seemed to have two distinct phases.

In Jordan, a predominantly Muslim country that has protected the rights of Christians, the pope lauded efforts to build an "alliance of civilizations" and curb extremism.

His stop at a mosque in Amman was historic — he's now the first pope to have visited two Muslim places of worship.

At the same time, the pope was not in Jordan simply to bless official efforts at dialogue. His aim was to reach a wider audience and provoke some thinking.

His speech to Muslim leaders in Amman thus returned to the theme of faith and reason, which caused such controversy at Regensburg, Germany, in 2006; this time, he chose his words carefully, but continued to insist that religion detached from reason is susceptible to "ideological manipulation" that can provoke tensions and violence in society.

His approach was to build bridges by affirming the moderate voices in Islam. When he spoke, for example, of the "fundamental contradiction of resorting to violence or exclusion in the name of God," he cited Muslim messages from recent years.

For most people, of course, papal visits work on a less intellectual level.

The pope may have won the most friends in Jordan simply by wearing on his shoulders a Jordanian kaffiyeh or "shmagh," a red-and-white-checked head scarf that for many people has political overtones.

Complex complications

When the pope landed in Israel May 11, the interreligious dimension of his trip suddenly got complicated.

He began by honoring the memory of the 6 million Jews killed in the Holocaust and denouncing anti-Semitism. The same day he paid a visit to the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial, where he met with six Holocaust survivors and spoke movingly of the tragedy of the victims.

All this was designed to re-establish Pope Benedict as a friend of Judaism and the Jews. But the reviews were mixed, mainly because the pope, a native of Germany who lived under the Nazi regime, did not speak at the memorial about the perpetrators of the Holocaust.

Vatican officials pointed out that the pope has spoken on several previous occasions about the Nazi crimes against humanity.

The pope's interreligious dialogue encounter the same evening was unfortunately derailed by a Muslim sheik's denunciation of Israeli policies, which prompted Jewish representatives to walk out. And with that, the pope was knee-deep in the politics of the region.

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict touches every aspect of life in the Holy Land, so it should have been no surprise that the pope got an earful wherever he went.

Especially in the West Bank city of Bethlehem, on his one full day in Palestinian territory, speaker after speaker — including church leaders — denounced the Israeli occupation, the travel and economic restrictions, the destruction of homes and the political detainees.

The pope walked a finer line. On one hand he sympathized with Palestinians and strongly defended their right to an independent state; on the other hand, he spoke of "turmoil" rather than "occupation" and appealed to Palestinian youths to overcome bitterness and reject terrorism — words that Israeli officials were no doubt happy to hear.

He denounced the 26-foot-high Israeli security wall that cuts through the West Bank like a concrete scar, calling it one of the "saddest sights" of his visit and a tragic symbol of Israeli-Palestinian relations.

But even here, he was careful to avoid blame, referring to "the hostilities that have caused this wall to be built" rather than the "oppression" that his Palestinian hosts loudly condemned.

Making progress

The pope's method was the moral prodding of a pilgrim. When he met with Israeli President Shimon Peres, for example, he explored the Hebrew scriptural meaning of "security" as not just the lack of threat but the building of trust.

The pope did more than preach in the Holy Land. He also did a lot of listening, his aides said. For every papal speech, there were three or four speeches from his hosts.

"I think that gave him a much deeper knowledge of the situation and problems of the Holy Land and the Middle East," said the Vatican spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi.

Of the visit's many remarkable moments, one stood out: At an interfaith encounter in Nazareth, the pope and other Christian, Muslim, Jewish and Druze leaders held hands in prayer as a psalm of peace was sung — a small but significant achievement on his pilgrim's path.

Book says late pope kept sense of fun in his final years

BY JONATHAN LUXMOORE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WARSAW, Poland — Pope John Paul II sang and made jokes even at the end of his life, said a Polish archbishop who was one of the pope's personal secretaries.

"The pope loved to laugh and could play innocent pranks," said Archbishop Mieczyslaw Mokrzycki of the Latin-rite Archdiocese of Lviv, Ukraine.

"He wasn't exuberant and didn't collect information, and he preferred to listen rather than talk. But he also noticed it when you'd had a hard day or were in bad mood. He would wink at you and smile," he said.

The archbishop spoke to Poland's TVN 24 about his book, "He Liked Tuesdays Best," about life with Pope John Paul. He said that on Tuesdays during the papacy, Pope John Paul often would make discreet, unreported excursions outside Rome.

Archbishop Mokrzycki said the pontiff was addicted to fresh air and insisted on keeping his Vatican apartment windows open, even in cold weather.

The late pope rose regularly at 5 a.m. to watch the sunrise and "also liked sunset, during which he often cut himself off and became immersed in prayer," Archbishop Mokrzycki said.

"When he had a worry, he'd ... sit on the terrace to pray in solitude. You could always count on him to remember you in his prayers. His secretaries placed the cards left in the Vatican with prayer requests on his chapel kneeler, and he read them all," said the archbishop, who was ordained a priest in 1987 and named to his Vatican position in 1996.

In the Polish-language book published by Krakow's Wydawnictwo M publishers, Archbishop Mokrzycki said he was often asked to sing Polish folk songs by the pope, who "very much missed" his homeland, watched Polish TV news daily and supported Krakow's local soccer team.

Pope John Paul also loved cakes, although nuns in the papal household tried to control his weight.

"The sisters didn't usually serve dessert since the Holy Father was fighting (becoming) overweight, but he had such a sweet tooth he often signaled a request to them," said Archbishop Mokrzycki.

"We all knew the sign — he didn't have to say anything. Without even looking at the nuns, he'd draw a circle with his finger on the tablecloth and keep on drawing it," he said.

Archbishop Mokrzycki said the pontiff found it "very hard" to accept his growing incapacity with Parkinson's disease, during which he had to be helped with washing, dressing and eating.

"When he tried to stop his hand shaking and found he no longer could, he'd get irritated and hit the chair hard, as if wanting to say, 'Why is this happening?'" Archbishop Mokrzycki said.

"We sometimes saw him do this during general audiences. Watching him, I realized how much he must be suffering," he said. "He'd always been strong, with so much energy and such an active life. Now, he had to get used to another, weaker self."

The archbishop said Pope John Paul was "fully conscious" April 2, 2005, the last day of his life, blessing visitors and saying farewell to the dozen closest friends at his bedside.

He added that the pontiff's face changed in his final moments and was "beautiful, smooth and without creases" at his death.

Among other details, Archbishop Mokrzycki said Pope John Paul always kept his parents' photo by his bed, as well as images of "Christ the Merciful" and the painting "Ecce Homo" by St. Albert Chmielowski.

Among the pope's key dislikes, the archbishop listed new shoes and having to wear ceremonial dress at official audiences.

'Unity in the body of Christ'

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The range of ethnicities, shades of skin color and even languages spoken in our Catholic churches today reminds us of the Scripture from Acts in which those gathered in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost heard the Gospel proclaimed to them in their various languages by the apostles. They were amazed that these unlettered Galilean followers of Jesus were able to speak in their diverse languages. But God had sent his Holy Spirit to unify those who had been formed by Jesus on earth.

In the Gospel, Jesus links this empowerment to the Holy Spirit when, following his resurrection, he comes into the disciples' midst, even though the doors are locked, breathes the Holy Spirit on them, and says, "Peace be with you. As the Father has sent me, so I send you."

The Gospel of Jesus' cross, resurrection and promise of a new way of life would come to those who were able to say "Jesus is Lord." And, as Paul says in the Acts reading, they could do so only by the power of the Holy Spirit.

Paul credits the unity that was part of the promise of Pentecost to the work of the Spirit in bringing together the diversity of gifts and forms of service as "workings of the same God."

Fifty years ago, a glance around most of our churches would not have given the same impression of unity among the peoples of our society. Even though the Catholic Church was a leader among our nation's institutions in breaking down walls of separation between ethnic groups, it was a slow and gradual process.

The spread of Christianity after the day of Pentecost, for all of its power and promise, did not establish Christianity around the world immediately. Walls and barriers continued to exist between groups of Christians, barriers that had to be dealt with on a practical, day-to-day level, as documented elsewhere in the book of Acts.

As we pray for continued outpouring of the Spirit, continued breathing of the Spirit of Jesus on his church, we should pray for a continued empowerment to proclaim the Gospel and the wisdom to continue to increase unity in the body of Christ. As happened in the early church, we will increase that unity by recognizing the various gifts and forms of service brought by the many nations who join together to worship and serve under the same church roofs -- our church roofs.

Questions:

Does your parish consist of more than one ethnic group? How can you and your church community move toward a greater unity within the body of Christ?

New 'Monologues' play offers hope for healing after abortion

One-act play designed for colleges, high schools

BY JESSICA ROXBURGH
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — A play created by a member of a Minnesota theater company aims to be an alternative to "The Vagina Monologues," a popular campus play, but one that is often criticized for its sexual explicitness.

Jeremy Stanbary of Epiphany Studio Productions says his play, "The Vitae Monologues," portrays powerful stories of hope and healing from women who have suffered from the psychological and physical effects of abortion.

Stanbary, founder and executive director of the Minneapolis-based Catholic production company, was inspired to write this play a few years ago after hearing women and men speak publicly of their experiences dealing with post-abortion syndrome at a Silent No More event in Minnesota.

Sarah Preissner and Stanbary star in the one-act play designed for performance particularly on college campuses or at high schools.

"These personal and very real testimonies are unfortunately often dismissed by the secular, medical community," said Stanbary.

"The Vitae Monologues" or "The Monologues of Life" opens with a scene in a therapist's office, where several people talk about seemingly unrelated problems they're having in their lives. Each one has experienced trauma in the aftermath of an abortion.

"Oftentimes symptoms don't appear until years later," Stanbary said. "Since Roe v. Wade, women have been repressed and ignored, but we're seeing an influx of women coming forth, telling their stories of post-abortion syndrome — understanding that they are not alone."

"This play gives women a voice within our culture and their stories need to be told," he added. "The greatest deception is that abortion is good for women and helps women."

The play tells the stories of women who "bought into this idea that abortion would take away their problems," Stanbary said.

But Stanbary and Preissner have heard from an increasing number of women and men who say abortion has had severe psychological effects on them, he said.

Post-abortion syndrome, like post-traumatic stress disorder, reveals itself in a variety of ways.

"We touch on many of these problems in the play such as feelings of overwhelming grief, nightmares, thoughts of suicide, lots of anger, denial and suppression of the root problem, depression, anxiety, feelings of unworthiness as a parent, drug and alcohol abuse, increased sexual promiscuity, and self-hatred," said Stanbary.

"These are real stories from real people," he added.

Although "The Vitae Monologues" shares with the audience a painful reality of the serious aftermath of abortion, it also offers the message that a place of healing and forgiveness can be found through Jesus Christ.

Many might wonder how "The Vitae Monologues" counters "The Vagina Monologues," a play that has caused many protests on Catholic campuses and beyond.

"The Vitae Monologues" deals with the more rotten fruits of the radical feminist movement and sexual revolution, which is abortion," said Stanbary. "Both plays are also meant to be controversial."

"The Vagina Monologues," based on interviews with numerous women, is a series of monologues in which women discuss their sexual experiences, including rape and other forms of violence against them.

Many U.S. college groups across the United States sponsor productions of the play in an effort to raise awareness about sexual violence against women and to raise funds for organizations working with physically abused women.

Young celebrities continue mission, vision of famed 'rosary priest'

BY DAVE JOLIVET
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NORTH EASTON, Mass. — It's a page right from Holy Cross Father Patrick Peyton's playbook — or rather his prayer book.

Family Theater Productions in Hollywood, Calif., affiliated with Holy Cross Family Ministries in North Easton, Mass., recently released a DVD, "Rosary Stars Praying the Gospel."

The project aims to spread the Gospel message by making the rosary come alive, particularly for a younger generation of Catholics.

It features 21 young athletes, actors, directors, TV hosts, recording stars, authors and lecturers sharing a Scripture reading, their own personal reflection and a decade of the rosary, encompassing the four sets of mysteries of the rosary: joyful, sorrowful, glorious and luminous.

It includes a meditation from Father Peyton, known as the "rosary priest."

J. Omar Castro, one of the celebrities recruited to help with the DVD, said he was "flattered to be asked to take part in this DVD."

He has appeared in the television hit shows "Without a Trace" and "CSI," as well as in films with Nicolas Cage and Cuba Gooding Jr.

"I saw this as a great opportunity to show others the power and relevance of the rosary as a prayer tool and maybe to demystify what the rosary is," the Honduran-American actor said.

Father Peyton spread the Gospel message utilizing state-of-the-art resources. He saw a great tool in radio and television to make the rosary come alive for thousands.

He drew in celebrities of the '40s, '50s and '60s to help him carry out Christ's mission. He called on the likes of Gary Cooper, Loretta Young, Jane Wyatt, Gregory Peck, Charlton Heston and many others.

He also organized rosary rallies across the world attended by millions through the years.

In his reflection on the DVD, Castro shared the painful divorce of his parents when he was 8 years old, and told of how praying the rosary helped him during that difficult time.

He mentioned how at times he felt God was not answering his prayers, but he persisted in praying the rosary.

Castro said he sees Father Peyton's mission and vision as "very much in the mix even today. There are more people than let on who share Father Peyton's vision."

"Just look at the Rosary Bowl held in 2007 at the Rose Bowl in Pasadena (Calif.)," he said. "I was there and amazed that more than 50,000 people showed up on a Saturday night near Hollywood."

"I see a resurgence of younger people praying the rosary, and I hope the DVD can help continue that trend," he said.

"I really don't consider myself a celebrity. I'm just a guy who loves what he's doing, and it's through God's graces that I'm where I am today," Castro added.

Ali Landry, a young actress and former Miss Louisiana and Miss USA, shared many of Castro's sentiments.

Landry, who had a role in the recent film "Bella," heralded for its pro-life message about a young pregnant unwed woman who has the baby, said she agreed to work on the DVD "to share my faith and bring others closer to the Lord."

The Catholic faith played an important role in Landry's upbringing.

"Like Father Peyton said, 'The family that prays together, stays together'; praying the rosary was the glue that held my family and my faith together," she said.

In her DVD reflection, Landry expresses the importance of "reaching out to others."

"Praying the rosary publicly shows others the meaning of opening up and touching someone. When people see and hear the meditations and reflections, it's just a natural thing that some of them are going to be touched, and that's why I wanted to be a part of this," she said.

Like Castro, Landry senses Father Peyton's mission and vision as very much alive in her circles.

"Family Theater Productions has been so important in my life and in the lives of many Catholic actors in Hollywood," she said. "It provides us with a place where we can share our faith and grow in God's love."

She met her husband, Alejandro Gomez Monteverde, at a Bible study program at Family Theater. Monteverde directed and co-wrote "Bella."

Staying focused on God in her profession is difficult, she said. "That's why Family Theater becomes so important and the rosary is such a powerful prayer. The rosary helps you focus on the life and mission of Christ, and sharing with other Catholic actors helps us regain that focus."

Lindsay won the competition for her entry of a unique skateboard design that would utilize ball technology as opposed to wheels. The nationwide competition, which ran from Oct. 1 to Feb. 28, was open to third- through sixth-grade students. The goal of the competition is to encourage teamwork and thinking "outside the box." The winners, chosen from 770 entries, are given the opportunity to collaborate with scientists and engineers to see their ideas come alive. Lindsay will work with skateboarders and skateboard engineers as they experiment with her design.

'A leader for all of us'

Catholic receives peacemaker award for outreach efforts

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

CHEROKEE — Ever since it established its Peacemaker of the Year Award seven years ago, Mountain Mediation Services has been trying to nominate Mary Herr.

Every year she declined to accept.

"There would be other people mentioned and I felt they were more deserving; and since it was on the (Qualla) Boundary I thought it should be an enrolled member," Herr said. "I didn't feel it was appropriate to accept when I was on the board."

But this year, Herr, a parishioner at St. Joseph Church in Bryson City, was named the 2009 Peacemaker of the Year on the Qualla Boundary, the Cherokee tribal land. She was honored at a luncheon at Cherokee United Methodist Church May 8.

The Tribal Employment Rights Office and the office of Vice Chief Larry Blythe of the Eastern Band of the Cherokee Indians sponsored the luncheon.

"All of us at Mountain Mediation Services are thankful because Mary was one of the founding members of Mountain Mediation Services 15 years ago," said Lorraine Johnson, MMS executive director.

"I never dreamed that (MMS) would take off and do as well as it has," Herr said in her acceptance speech. "It has been a great help to the community. I'm proud to have been a part of it."

Melvina Swimmer, MMS board president, presented the framed award certificate to Herr. She also received a cross made of yellow beads and other gifts from Carol Long of the MMS board of directors and a member of the Eastern Band.

So why did Herr finally agree to accept the award?

"Carol was the one who asked me," Herr said. "She asked me personally; it was just the way she asked me."

Awards have been or will be presented to other recipients in the counties where they serve.

MMS promotes peace and cooperative resolution to conflicts in Cherokee, Clay, Graham, Haywood, Jackson, Macon and Swain counties, and the Qualla Boundary. It's a member of the Mediation Network of North Carolina.

MMS helps resolve conflicts between disputants such as family members, landlords and tenants, employers and employees, teachers and parents, and church members. Issues might include inheritance disputes, broken contracts, neighborhood vandalism, harassment problems, even a neighbor's barking dog.

However, MMS does not deal with violent crimes or domestic violence.

MMS's brochure notes the mediators, trained volunteers from the community, "do not take sides, decide who is right or wrong, or give advice. Mediators guide you through a process that allows you to identify the issues, explore possible solutions and decide which solutions work best."

Johnson described Herr as "someone who is a leader for all of us and someone who is a model of being a peacemaker in our lives."

"Conflict is all around us, a part of life. Mediation teaches that there are two sides to every story," she said. "Mary Herr has shown us, through the work that she does, that people can get along."

"Mary is very active in the Catholic diocese and shows her faith through the work that she does," Johnson continued. "She shows that we are all one and we are all connected. She also understands the importance of staying involved."

In fact, Mary Herr, who has lived on or near the Qualla Boundary for 31 years, has been very involved in a variety of community efforts.

members to assume leadership roles on the Qualla Boundary," she wrote in her biography for the award. "Throughout the years, the Cherokees have produced some very capable and responsible leaders."

Herr has been employed by several legal services programs in Tennessee and North Carolina as a paralegal and community educator, and also with the Catholic Church in Cherokee in this capacity.

For six years she has worked as program supervisor for the Guardian ad Litem program, which provides court advocacy for abused children in Qualla Boundary and three counties.

In addition to her past service on the Qualla Boundary advisory board for MMS, she currently serves on boards of several nonprofit and community organizations, including the Catholic Committee of Appalachia, Cherokee, Healing and Wellness Coalition, Yogi Crowe Memorial Scholarship Fund, Legal Aid of North Carolina and the diocesan Office of Economic Opportunity of Catholic Social Services.

Herr retired in 2006 as regional faith formation consultant and Native American multicultural worker for the Smoky Mountain Vicariate in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Peaches in spring

Joy is contentment based on faith in God's goodness

I saw a stunningly beautiful woman recently and thought to myself, "What a peach!"

I didn't think of God right away, but it eventually came to me that she was a wonderful advertisement for the author of all beauty. Her particular beauty had more to do with substance than mere good looks; at least, that's how it hit me.

She had something extra that came from within.

Joy is a quality of the soul that is super-added to one's physical appearance. Physical beauty is skin deep, but a joyful soul animates the entire body and tells us something about the presence of the Holy Spirit.

I found Blessed Mother Teresa to be quite beautiful; her aura enveloped you like the aroma of a gardenia. Artists have depicted this inner glow by means of a halo, and yet it is more than an imaginary light.

It is actually a spiritual fragrance flowing from the Holy Spirit.

If you'd like to acquire this beauty-enhancing gift, it is free of charge, but you have to do some serious work. You have to try to experience the delight that comes from a clear conscience and feel the satisfaction of completing a difficult task for the glory of God.

If you enjoy the wonderful feeling that comes from knowing that God really loves you, you'll understand what I mean.

By the way, the knowledge that God loves you is basic to the gift of faith. It helps you to enjoy life more. It's like the noble emotion that flows from the joy of human life.

I'm thinking of a big Italian dinner with good wine, surrounded by family and friends. It's easier to feel wholehearted gratitude to God when your stomach is full and you have laughed much.

If you have never seen the movie "Babette's Feast," give yourself a treat. It opens rather slowly but builds to a wonderful conclusion.

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR

On a higher level, joy is an inner peace flowing from the knowledge that the Lord is preparing a fantastic place for us in heaven. Believing that you're going to make it to heaven because of God's mercy is not presumption; it is the Christian virtue of hope in action.

How blessed we are and how good God is for loving us in spite of our sins!

To live in the Holy Spirit is to rejoice in the knowledge of God's unchanging love.

Julian of Norwich, a 15th century mystic, said, "The greatest honor you can give to Almighty God is to live joyfully because of the knowledge his love."

Sure, today's times are tough, but we will learn to trim our sails and get through it. Just be sure that you cling to the truth that joy prevails over sorrow. It really does.

"Ask and you will receive," for Jesus always keeps his promises.

The New Catholic Encyclopedia defines "joy" as a pleasant state of quiescence in which the will rests satisfied in possessing a desirable good or in accomplishing a goal that was diligently pursued.

I think of joy as a contentment based on faith in God's goodness. Given the fact that God loves you with an infinite love, you can relax and enjoy the gift of life.

Ecstasy will come later when you receive the beatific vision. But for now, just enjoy life and let your joy shine!

Then you can look peachy too.

Perennial wisdom can be a valuable asset

Good foundation needed to judge contemporary events

"Read from the bottom up," instructed the note at the beginning of an e-mail message.

The entry made little sense on its own. One found its meaning only by reading the original message well below in the string.

"Reading from the bottom up," or knowing the background to provide relevance, is equally necessary in discerning current issues.

A note from a reader in Michigan complained about the lack of moral teaching from the pulpit.

"I would love to hear homilies on today's moral issues," she wrote. "We Catholics need spiritual advice to live in today's modern world as Christians."

No argument there. But let's also consider the plight of the homilist. He has about 15 minutes to speak to complicated issues. Explaining the morality of stem cells, distinguishing between licit adult stem cells and illicit embryonic stem cells is a tall order when starting cold.

A homily or any instruction cannot be effective unless it resonates with a core belief.

Why is the church involved in politics? Why are we having a biology lecture at Mass?

These topics, if located within an integrated understanding of the fundamentals of faith, do make sense. Effective communication requires a basis of understanding. At its simplest, it is almost reflexive.

You're about to step off the curb when a voice yells, "Watch out for that car!"

You jump back without having to process the facts: A car is coming; if it hits me I will be injured.

Good and evil are not as sharply distinguished as in simpler times.

"Does the recent significant change in the American political landscape point to significant changes in the way the Catholic Church and its institutions relate to the American political system?" asked Jesuit Father John Langan at a recent seminar.

Father Langan is a professor of Catholic social thought at Georgetown University in Washington.

"Politics is not simply about elections and personalities and about simple yes or no decisions, but about

Consider This

STEPHEN KENT
CNS COLUMNIST

issues and programs which will usually require more nuanced assessments," he continued.

In a culture where ideas and issues change as rapidly as fashion, some are finding answers in 13th-century philosophy with renewed emphasis on dialogue between faith and contemporary culture.

"In the desire to be relevant, there is a temptation to abandon commitment to perennial wisdom and the understanding of our forbearers," said Dominican Father Thomas Joseph White.

Father White is a theologian at the Dominican House of Studies in Washington, where they believe the philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas has meaning in contemporary culture.

Thomists are "taking perennial wisdom and engaging in a profound conversation with contemporary issues," said Father White.

A basic understanding of natural law and appreciation of the meaning of human life and the harmony of faith and reason — each is a good foundation that can be used to judge contemporary events, and that is "reading from the bottom up."

The harmony of faith and reason insisted upon by Aquinas is vital today.

"These two temptations of faith against reason or reason against faith are very prevalent," Father White said.

"One tendency is to think that faith and reason are rivals, so that either reason exalts itself and only finds its independence denying faith ..., or I have to just believe, to have faith, abandon myself to God, ... and there's no point of contact with my ordinary reason and my ordinary life," he said.

Perennial wisdom is a valuable asset for making the nuanced assessments necessary if we are to engage in conversation rather than confrontation.

What is happening to the kiss?

Swine flu spurs examination of act with divine origins

When dioceses notified parishioners to keep a distance from each other at the kiss of peace because of the swine flu, I began to wonder about the future of the kiss.

As word of a pandemic spread, it was as if all kissing was forbidden. Even the French took precautions to avoid the traditional cheek-to-cheek kiss.

And, too, the business world is now requiring employees and employers to attend sexual harassment sessions that counsel: better not to kiss, no matter the circumstances.

Are we entering an age in which any kind of kissing is suspect?

To answer this, let's look at its many sides.

The "bacio della morte" is one kiss you definitely don't want to receive because it indicates you are going to die at the hands of the mob.

In Scripture, the betrayal kiss of Judas reflects deceit and hypocrisy.

Kisses like these are demeaning and without value.

On the other hand, a proper kiss is heavenly. Take, for example, Pope John Paul II kissing the ground upon entering a country as a sign of respect and gratitude.

How often did our mother kiss a painful bump we received to acknowledge she also felt it and was trying to make it go away?

Then there is the life-changing kiss. "He kissed me and now I am someone else" by Chilean poet Gabriela Mistral.

British poet Robert Browning pictures a kiss as a sigh: "What of the soul was left, I wonder, when the kissing had to stop?"

Irish writer Samuel Beckett would point us to all the warm, loving kisses we received throughout life:

"All those lips that had kissed me, those hearts that had loved me (it is with the heart one loves, is it not, or am I confusing it with something else?)."

The lingering power of a kiss is played in a heart-wrenching song in the movie "Casablanca": "You must remember this, a kiss is still a kiss, a sigh is just a sigh; the fundamental things apply as time goes by."

Most important of all, a kiss is imperative to our spiritual life.

Mary Magdalene washes the feet of Christ and then kisses them out of love for Christ.

No matter the present suspicions surrounding a kiss, it will always have a future because of its divine origins.

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

God can bring peace to Middle East, pope says at audience

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI said his visit to the Holy Land was a pilgrimage of faith and of peace, and an occasion to bear witness to the fact that even in desperate situations of tension believers trust in the power of God.

"In that land blessed by God, it sometimes seems impossible to break the spiral of violence, but nothing is impossible for God and for those who trust in him," the pope said May 20 at his weekly general audience.

"For this reason, faith in the one God — just and merciful — is the most precious resource" of the Christians, Muslims and Jews living in Jordan, Israel and the Palestinian territories, he said.

Reviewing his May 8-15 trip for the 20,000 people gathered in St. Peter's Square, the pope said that in his meetings with government leaders he tried to be a messenger of peace and to remind everyone that faith should help the region's people unleash the power of respect, reconciliation and cooperation.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

My recent Apostolic Journey to the Holy Land was a pilgrimage to the sources of our faith and a pastoral visit to the Christian communities in the lands of our Lord's birth, death and resurrection.

I am grateful to the civil authorities, the Latin Patriarch and the Bishops of the local Churches, the Franciscan friars of the Custody of the Holy Land and all those who contributed to the journey. Throughout my visit I wished to be a pilgrim of peace, reminding Jews, Christians and Muslims alike of our commitment, as believers in the one God, to promote respect, reconciliation and cooperation in the service of peace.

In Jerusalem, "the city of peace" sacred to the followers of the three great monotheistic traditions, this was the message I brought to the holy places, and particularly to the Western Wall and the Dome of the Rock. One of the most solemn moments was the commemoration of the victims of the Shoah at Yad Vashem.

My visit to the local Churches culminated in the Masses celebrated in Amman, Jerusalem, Bethlehem and Nazareth.

My pilgrimage ended in prayer on Calvary and before the Holy Sepulchre, the empty tomb, which continues to radiate a message of hope for individuals and for the whole human family.

Ten easy ways to make summer a bummer

For summer fun, don't follow this advice

To rephrase Psalm 118:24: "This is the summer the Lord has made; let us rejoice in it and be glad."

But that's not always easy to do, is it?

Summer 2009 may be a tough one for your family for any number of reasons, including household economics! But here are 10 easy ways to guarantee your summer is a bummer:

1. Assume that because money is tight, joy is impossible. If you can't make it to the major theme park or rent that cabin in mountains, what's the point? Never mind that several trips to the local park and some nights in an old camping tent in the backyard can be sources for a lot of happy memories. (Note to self: S'mores can be made using the microwave.)
2. Don't plant a small vegetable garden. Don't plant flowers. After all, who wants more vegetables? And what good are flowers? Sure, the produce you don't eat yourselves can be given to friends or donated to the local food bank. And, yes, flowers will brighten up your home and make great gifts for family and friends but ...
3. Don't plan Sunday brunch picnics for after Mass. You bring food into a lovely park and the next thing you know there are ants or, worse, there are yellow jackets or other bees. And it could be hot out.

4. Avoid at all costs the temptation to look in the newspaper or go online to find out what shows, exhibits or other events in your area are free or have a low, low cost. If you're not careful, your children will be exposed to great music and art. Or they'll want to see another play or go to another (semipro) ballgame. Worse still, they may start thinking about playing a musical instrument, drawing, writing or sharpening their athletic skills themselves!
5. Money's not a problem? Get the kids so involved in organized activities that they don't have time to lie in the grass, stare up at the clouds and daydream.
6. Pin all your hopes on next summer. It has to be better, right? Assume this one is a total loss and next year's will be nearly perfect. Absolutely no troubles, challenges, setbacks or disappointments.

Hazards on the sea

Escalating piracy has roots in fishing encroachment, priest says

BY PETER FINNEY JR.
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW ORLEANS — The rampant piracy in the Gulf of Aden off Somalia's coast has its roots in the encroachment into fishing zones by large fishing vessels from other countries, but that does not excuse the escalating violence launched by pirates against oceangoing vessels, said a priest who has a ministry to seafarers.

Father Sinclair Oubre, president of the Apostleship of the Sea USA, made the comments at the group's annual convention in New Orleans.

A priest of the Diocese of Beaumont, Texas, Father Oubre also heads the Apostleship of the Sea for his diocese.

Speaking May 8, he said port chaplains first began hearing reports of piracy in the Gulf of Aden five to seven years ago.

Those disputes mostly involved encroachment on fishing territories, but "because no big Western ships were getting hit, it was no big deal," Father Oubre said. "It's good that we are finally paying attention to it."

European fishing ships went to the coast of Somalia and secured "either very advantageous fishing rights or else there was basically no one able to enforce the fishing zones," Father Oubre said. "Basically those boats began exploiting the area. At the root of the piracy is the Somali fishermen attacking those boats to defend their area."

Those disputes escalated to the point where the attacks were staged and coordinated by Somali warlords, "the same warlords that the U.S. Marines and Army fought back in the 1990s," Father Oubre said.

But this "Robin Hood" motivation "does not justify the piracy," he added.

The pirates have kidnapped ships' crews and demanded ransom for their release, calling themselves modern-day Robin Hoods trying to get compensation to replace a dwindling livelihood as fishermen.

The Apostleship of the Sea convention drew a group of 40 port chaplains and priests involved in ministry on cruise ships. The convention approved a message to seafarers that "irrevocably condemns the issue of piracy and prays for all seafarers who face hazardous shipping routes."

"An important part of our message to seafarers is to not only recognize the challenges, difficulties and hardships they face but also to acknowledge that what they are doing is essential to the quality of our lives," Father Oubre said.

"If the ships don't sail, the cars don't drive in Florida and you don't get your TVs or your computers. It's mariners who do that service," he said.

The organization also reaffirmed a resolution it approved in 2008 that the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops requires the certification of all port chaplains through a process established by its office.

Filipino sailors, most of them Catholic, make up half of the international crews on the world's merchant marine ships, Father Oubre said.

After years of intense security at U.S. ports because of the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks — keeping virtually all foreign seafarers restricted to their ships when they make port — the U.S. Coast Guard is finally telling port facilities to write "a facility plan that must include procedures for coordinating shore leave," Father Oubre said.

"The frustration for us has been, 'OK, what is justifying this higher security?'" he said. "There's a strong feeling in AOS that seafarers have been targeted for higher security, with no justification for it. None of the Sept. 11 attackers were seafarers. None of them had merchant marine documents."

Since 2003, when stricter security rules went into place, a seafarer who signs off a ship to go home "has to be immediately moved from the ship to the airport."

Father Oubre said the restrictions on foreign crews have persuaded U.S. pilots to avoid shuttling vessels between Europe and North America "because it's a hassle. You're not going to get the best guys if they can avoid that situation."

Father Oubre, a seafarer himself, cobbles together vacation time to spend three weeks to a month on the seas.

"There are hardships and difficulties and dirty work," he said. "But there are also the wonders of being blessed by watching the sun come up each day and the glory of the heavens at the end of the day."

"To watch the flying fish and the porpoises dance as we plow through the water is a blessing," he said.

MUCH-NEEDED MIRACLE

Mary Ellen Heibel, a parishioner of St. Mary Church in Annapolis, Md., sits next to a statue of Blessed Francis X. Seelos at her parish. Heibel believes her cancer was cured through Blessed Seelos' intercession.

Baltimore Archdiocese investigates possible miracle in Seelos cause

BALTIMORE (CNS) — Go home and prepare to die.

That's what Mary Ellen Heibel's doctors at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington told her May 11, 2004, after they discovered that the cancer that had attacked Heibel's esophagus in 2003 and then a lymph node later that year had spread throughout her body.

Given about six months to live, the longtime parishioner of St. Mary Church in Annapolis underwent a new form of chemotherapy at the Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore as a palliative treatment to extend her life.

But doctors warned it would only postpone the inevitable.

At the suggestion of a Pittsburgh priest, Heibel began praying a novena in 2005 to Blessed Francis X. Seelos, a 19th-century Redemptorist pastor of her parish who died of yellow fever in 1867 in New Orleans.

One week after she began the novena at her parish, Heibel's cancer disappeared. Gone were tumors in both lungs, her liver, back and sternum. When Dr. Michael Gibson, her doctor at Johns Hopkins, called with the news, Heibel couldn't believe it.

"I was just so excited. I called everyone," the 71-year-old mother of four remembered. "I never thought in a million years this would happen."

Told by her doctors that the unexplained healing could not be the result of her chemotherapy, Heibel is convinced that Blessed Seelos interceded on her behalf.

"I know this had to be a miracle," she said.

Archdiocesan officials are currently investigating whether Heibel might just be right.

Archbishop Edwin F. O'Brien opened an archdiocesan inquiry into the alleged healing with a May 19 Mass at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary in Baltimore.

The archbishop also appointed a group to investigate the case and listen to testimony from Heibel, Gibson and other witnesses.

The commission's findings will be sent to Father Antonio Marrazzo, Redemptorist postulator general in Rome, who will then take them to the Vatican's Congregation for Saints' Causes. If the healing is deemed miraculous, Blessed Seelos could be canonized by Pope Benedict XVI.

Redemptorist Father John Kingsbury, pastor of St. Mary Church, said the possible healing is a "major breakthrough" in the canonization effort.

Two miracles that occur after death are generally needed for a sainthood candidate to be canonized. Acceptance of a first miracle through the intercession of the German-born Redemptorist led to his beatification by Pope John Paul II in 2000.

The confirmed miracle was the cure of a Louisiana woman whose complete recovery from inoperable liver cancer in 1966 could not be explained by her doctors. The miracle needed for canonization could be the Heibel case.

"We're very happy that the archbishop has opened the investigation," Father Kingsbury said. "I'm glad Mary Ellen was healed no matter what — and, if it's (Blessed) Seelos and it helps his cause, it would be wonderful."

Bishop praises court for affirming voters' right to define marriage

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Speaking on behalf of his fellow Catholic bishops in California, Bishop Stephen E. Blaize of Stockton praised the California Supreme Court for upholding the voters' affirmation of marriage as the union of a man and a woman, but expressed disappointment that the court permitted an estimated 18,000 same-sex couples to remain legally married.

The May 26 ruling of the high court upheld the constitutionality of the state's Proposition 8 declaring that "only marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California," but said the voters' decision could not be applied retroactively to those who married before the initiative was passed.

Bishop Blaize said he and his fellow bishops "are strongly committed to protecting the dignity and worth of every human person" and supported "the intent of law to provide equal protection for all."

"However, such purpose does not have to trump the natural and traditional definition of marriage between a man and a woman," he added in a May 26 statement. "The law has found other ways to regulate civil unions without destroying the traditional understanding of marriage. We believe — as do the majority of Californians — that marriage between a man and a woman is foundational to our culture and crucial for human perpetuity."

In a Nov. 4, 2008, vote, 52 percent of the state's electorate approved Proposition 8.

The majority decision drew immediate praise from the Campaign to Protect Marriage, a coalition that had included the state's Catholic bishops and other Catholic groups.

But organizations that had opposed Proposition 8 said they would work to repeal the measure through a ballot initiative in 2010.

Same-sex marriage is currently legal in Massachusetts, Iowa, Connecticut, Vermont and Maine.

Vatican condemns North Korean nuclear test, missile launches

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has condemned the latest round of nuclear testing and missile launching by North Korea, warning that these acts of aggression threaten “the very survival” of the country’s own people by exacerbating its isolation.

The Vatican newspaper, L’Osservatore Romano, published a front-page news story May 27 along with an editorial titled “International isolation as a regime’s choice.”

North Korea drew swift and angry international condemnation after announcing May 25 that it had successfully performed a nuclear experiment. Seismic equipment registered a small blast in the eastern portion of the country. Three short-range missiles were then launched into the Sea of Japan.

The following day, May 26, two more missiles were launched off the country’s eastern coast.

In its commentary, L’Osservatore said, “But even before being a threat to peace, this atomic experiment constitutes a threat to the very survival of the North Korean people who will pay the consequences of the isolation the regime has chosen.”

Calling the North Korean government a “Stalinist regime,” the editorial said the country “risks total isolation after its latest challenge to the international community.”

North Korea conducted its first nuclear experiment Oct. 9, 2006. In early April 2009, it unsuccessfully launched a rocket in an attempt to place a satellite in orbit.

This time, the editorial said, even Russia and China seem prepared to invoke sanctions.

Behind the North Korean show of force, it said, “there probably is an internal crisis due to the leadership of Kim Jong-il who has never been able to dissipate the impression that he is a pale copy of his father, Kim Il-sung.”

Vatican newspaper criticizes embryonic stem cell research

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In the continuing debate over stem cell research, the ideologues are those who claim it is necessary to use embryonic stem cells, an Italian research physician wrote in the Vatican newspaper.

A growing body of research has proven that a variety of somatic stem cells — usually referred to as adult stem cells — holds more promise for curing many diseases than stem cells derived from embryos, wrote Dr. Angelo Vescovi, a professor at Milan’s Bicocca University and a researcher at the Cerebral Stem Cell Bank in Terni.

Vescovi’s full-page article May 27 in L’Osservatore Romano, the Vatican newspaper, was headlined “Behind embryonic stem cell research there is only a patent war.”

“The decision made in March by U.S. President Barack Obama to use federal funds to finance research on stem cells derived from the destruction of human embryos — embryonic stem cells — has reignited the polemics regarding a theme with complex bioethical implications,” the doctor wrote.

He said that while promoters of embryonic stem cell research like to label opponents as ideologues or religious extremists, science itself has proven that those who insist on destroying human embryos are the ones being unreasonable.

Research is now showing that reprogramming adult stem cells can produce cells that are just as flexible as embryonic stem cells and they can be produced in greater quantity, Vescovi said.

The new procedure is not protected “by those patents that currently exploit the use of stem cells derived from embryos,” he said.

The insistence on continuing embryonic stem cell research, he said, appears not to be tied to scientific promise, but to “billions of dollars of investment, an entire river of patents and entire careers based precisely on the use of embryos.”

Still, the doctor said he was not pessimistic about the future.

“I have been a researcher for almost 30 years and I have faith in the fact that, in research, truth triumphs in the end,” he wrote.

“Science, by its nature, inevitably favors the selection and development of the most efficient branches, those that give the most total respect to human life,” he said.

What is needed to give a push to research using adult stem cells is simply the dedication of more resources, both human and financial, the doctor said.

Good reviews: Vatican newspaper sees Obama’s start in positive light

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican newspaper has offered some unexpectedly upbeat reviews of the President Barack Obama’s first four months in office.

L’Osservatore Romano opined that Obama seems to have moved away from his 2008 campaign rhetoric on legislation that would enshrine abortion as a fundamental right and remove local limitations on the practice of abortion.

Obama coverage has been on a wide range of issues, especially foreign policy. The newspaper has found much to its liking regarding the Israeli-Palestinian situation (the president’s position was in “full harmony” with that of the pope), Middle East outreach, disarmament, the Americas, multilateralism and human rights, diplomacy, the economy and the environment.

Bishops issue alert on sex education bill

CHARLOTTE — Bishops Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte and Michael F. Burbidge of Raleigh issued an e-mail alert on pending sex education legislation in North Carolina.

The May 27 alert was sent to those registered with Catholic Voice NC, the nonpartisan initiative, and Web site operated jointly by the dioceses of Charlotte and Raleigh.

It asks Catholics to oppose possible changes to the sex education bill, which the bishops describe as "the euphemistically titled Healthy Youth Act."

The bill was scheduled for discussion in the Senate Mental Health and Youth Services Committee May 27. However, lawmakers apparently received such a large volume of protests via telephone calls and e-mails that the bill was pulled from consideration May 27 and rescheduled for consideration June 3.

The bill would allow parents to decide if their children should be enrolled in an abstinence-only program or an abstinence-based, comprehensive sex education program. Under the House version, a child whose parents made no choice on the consent form would not receive the comprehensive sex education.

The bishops' chief concern with the Senate version of the bill is that if parents do not indicate a choice, their child will automatically receive the comprehensive sex education — an approach the bishops have opposed in the past.

The bishops prefer the abstinence until marriage approach that is currently taught in public schools as mandated by state law.

Bishops, other leaders oppose pending legislation

CHARLOTTE — North Carolina's Catholic bishops issued a joint statement opposing a bill under consideration by state legislators.

Bishops Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte and Michael F. Burbidge of Raleigh are among religious and human rights leaders voicing opposition to the third edition of Senate Bill 461, the North Carolina Racial Justice Act.

The bishops' representative to the legislature, Msgr. Michael Clay of the Diocese of Raleigh, read the bishops' statement at a press conference in Raleigh May 28.

The conference was sponsored by the North Carolina Council of Churches, the General Baptist State Convention of North Carolina, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and other groups.

While the groups support the concept of the Racial Justice Act, they oppose it in its current form under consideration.

The original version of the act recognized the past and present existence of racial injustice in the state judicial system. A recent amendment would allow doctors to ignore the Hippocratic Oath in administering lethal drugs to inmates who have received the death sentence.

The requirement that physicians act as executioners in North Carolina has effectively stopped capital punishment in the state.

"A bill that acknowledges that black men have been put to death due to racial bias, and at the same time restores the practice of capital punishment in a state where such bias has unjustifiably placed black men on death row in North Carolina to the present day, is beyond comprehension," said the bishops' statement.

The bill is currently being reviewed by the House Ways and Means Committee.

Father Houseknecht receives doctorate in preaching

(ST. LOUIS) — Father Eric Houseknecht, a former priest of the Diocese of Charlotte, recently received a Doctor of Ministry degree in preaching at Aquinas Institute of Theology in St. Louis, Mo.

Father Houseknecht, currently parochial vicar of St. Timothy Church in Mesa, Ariz., received the degree during a commencement ceremony at St. Francis Xavier Church at St. Louis University May 8.

The degree was one of 11 doctorates in preaching conferred at the ceremony, during which 48 people received graduate degrees.

Aquinas Institute of Theology is a Catholic graduate school of theology and ministry administered by the Order of

Father Eric Houseknecht

Preachers (Dominicans), and offers both residential and on-line degree programs.

irreconcilable terms.

But this perception is far from reality, according to Jesuit Brother Guy Consolmagno, an astronomer at the Vatican Observatory in Arizona and Castel Gandolfo, the papal villa outside Rome.

"Quite simply, the church has always supported science," Brother Consolmagno told The Catholic Spirit, newspaper of the Archdiocese of St. Paul and Minneapolis.

Modern science was born in European Catholic universities and some of history's best scientists were clergymen, he noted.

That's why the books of Dan Brown — the author of "Angels & Demons" and "The Da Vinci Code" — are in the bookstore's fiction section, where they belong, he said.

Father Tadeusz Pacholczyk, director of education at the National Catholic Bioethics Center in Philadelphia, said misunderstandings about the compatibility of faith and science arise because of the different "languages" they use.

In actuality, science and religion have distinct yet compatible domains, he added.

Brother Consolmagno said the myth of the "war" between science and religion grew out of the Enlightenment at the end of the 19th century. In order to attract students to the emerging German secular universities, Enlightenment supporters portrayed the church as anti-science and against progress, he said.

"It really doesn't go back to Galileo;

"My religion tells me God created the universe. My science tells me how he did it."

— Jesuit Brother Guy Consolmagno

it goes back to the politics of what was happening in Europe and America 100 years ago," he said.

The case of 17th-century astronomer Galileo Galilei is the often-used example of a collision between the church and science.

Galileo was condemned by the church's Holy Office for suspected heresy in 1633 for maintaining that the earth revolved around the sun but he was "rehabilitated" in 1992 by a special Vatican commission established by Pope John Paul II.

The Galileo controversy has taught the church to be careful when speaking on matters of science, Father Pacholczyk said. For example, on the topic of evolution, the church continues to engage in an ongoing discussion about the proper understanding of evolutionary science.

A person seeking to understand humankind's place in the universe should seek to understand both faith and science, the priest said.

As Brother Consolmagno put it: "My religion tells me God created the universe. My science tells me how he did it."

Although the church is not against science, he said it acts as a check on science's rapidly advancing abilities.

In the early 20th century, for example, the Catholic Church called for a stop to eugenics, which aims to improve the human species by selective breeding.

"Eugenics is bad science," Brother Consolmagno added. "Even if it is good science, it still would have been wrong. That's an example, I think, where people who treat science without religion can fall into grave error."

Today, the church rejects technologies that devalue the dignity of the human person, such as cloning, embryonic stem cell research and the production of weapons of mass terror.

vibrant and growing faith of the young church of western North Carolina and the adults who work with them," said Paul Kotlowski, director of diocesan youth ministry.

"Through the various workshops and homilies, participants were challenged to realize the power of their baptismal call to a life of conversion to holiness and to be a leaven in society," he said.

In keeping with Pope Benedict XVI's proclamation that June 28, 2008 to June 29, 2009 is a year dedicated to St. Paul, the conference's theme was meant to invoke the spirit of St. Paul by highlighting the message of his letters.

The mission statement for this year's conference as composed by the Diocesan Youth Advisory Council states, "St. Paul reminds us that we have an identity in Jesus Christ, who instills strength within us to live our faith."

"I hope that those who took part in this year's conference realize that they are part of something much bigger than themselves," said Kotlowski, referring to the universal church. "They are called to build the kingdom of God."

Each year at the conference several awards are presented to clergy, youths and adults who have displayed outstanding leadership and service in the area of youth ministry.

At this year's conference the John Paul II Award, which recognizes ordained men who exemplify love for the youth of the church, was presented to Father Patrick Hoare, parochial vicar of St. Mark Church in Huntersville.

The Bishop Begely Award, for youths involved in social justice and outreach, was presented to Nicole Lehman of Holy Spirit Church in Denver.

The St. Timothy Award, for a youth exemplifying outstanding discipleship, was presented to Eric Fischer of St. Mark Church and Katie Finegan of Haywood Catholic Youth — a youth group comprised of young people from St. Margaret of Scotland Church in Maggie Valley, St. John the Evangelist Church in Waynesville and Immaculate Conception Mission in Canton.

The Bishop Curlin Award, for an individual or group exemplifying outstanding pastoral care, was presented to Kim and Derick Medlin of Holy Cross Church in Kernersville.

'Signs of erosion'

Attorney traces federal conscience-clause protection to Roe decision

BY BETH GRIFFIN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — "Signs of erosion" of support for federal conscience-clause protection began to appear about 10 years ago and have continued at the state level, attorney Susan Stabile told a group of Catholic health care leaders May 21.

She discussed two potential federal threats to conscience claims, and concluded that neither one would specifically repeal conscience protection for health care workers.

Stabile, who holds the Robert and Marion Short distinguished chair in law at the University of St. Thomas School of Law in Minneapolis, spoke on "Legal Challenges to Catholic Health Care: The Elimination of the Conscience Clause and Related Concerns."

She delivered the address during the 25th Catholic Healthcare Administrative Personnel program May 18-22 at St. John's University in New York.

Stabile cited Department of Health and Human Services regulations adopted in December 2008 to ensure that "recipients of department funds do not support coercive or discriminatory practices" in the delivery of health care. She said the regulations did not create new restrictions or grant substantive rights.

Earlier this year, HHS proposed rescinding the federal conscience-clause protection. A 30-day period of public comment on the rescission ended April 9.

She predicted they will be rescinded by the Obama administration, but said the repeal would have little or no legal effect because conscience protection will still be granted under existing statutes.

Nonetheless, Stabile said the efforts to repeal the regulations reveal that some conscience protections are vulnerable to efforts to weaken them by national advocacy campaigns, state governments and the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists.

Forced confrontation

She traced federal health care conscience-protection statutes to the 1973 Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision, which she said forced confrontation of the issue by effectively legalizing abortion.

Federal legislation passed between 1973 and 2004 protects individuals and institutions from being discriminated against for refusing to participate in actions they find morally objectionable, including abortion.

Most states also have conscience-protection laws, she said.

"Existing conscience laws have come under increasing attack by, among others, abortion-rights activists, who want to require all health care personnel and hospitals to provide 'the full range of reproductive services,' including abortion," she said.

"Signs of erosion started to be seen about 10 years ago and have continued at the state level," she said.

In addition, she said, "mainstream medical journals are rife with articles and editorials that show hostility to health care providers who refuse to participate in abortion and other morally objectionable procedures."

Stabile distinguished between Catholic and secular providers of health care and other social services.

"For the Catholic Church, running hospitals, nursing homes, schools and other social services is not a secular activity and cannot be completely separated from its core religious mission," she said.

"The activity is part of living out the healing mission of Christ and is rooted in a commitment to promote and defend human dignity and promote the common good," said Stabile.

She said, "When a Catholic organization cares for the sick and elderly or provides for education, it is performing an act as religious as those that take place inside of the church itself. We know that means that when Catholic entities provide social services they must do so in a way that is consonant with its religious principles."

Intersecting reality

Stabile said the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' 2001 "Ethical and Religious Directives for Catholic Health Care Services" outline the church's moral teaching on issues Catholic health care providers may face.

They forbid abortions and all other procedures that contradict church teaching.

Stabile described an "intersecting reality" between the Catholic and the secular approach to health care.

She said abortion, emergency contraception, sterilization and physician-assisted suicide are among "certain medical procedures and practices that have come to be viewed by a not insignificant number of people in this country as part of basic health care and by others as ... at least acceptable options for people to choose."

She said the procedures are inconsistent with Catholic principles and the bishops' ethical directives.

Stabile said conscience analysis is complicated in a pluralistic society.

"We don't all share a set of common assumptions about what is right and what is wrong. That raises a question as to what personal moral decisions we ought to protect," she said.

"We can't really argue in a pluralistic society with separation of church and state that the government should respect only those claims resulting from a well-formed Catholic conscience," she said.

She added the American belief in the right of self-determination forms the basis of much of the nation's social policy.

"We also live in a society where we move from negative rights — that is, a right to be free from interference — to positive rights — that is, entitlements

Moral measures

Health reform urgent but abortion must be off the table, bishop says

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Although there is an urgent need for "comprehensive health care reform leading to accessible and affordable health care for all," Congress must not include abortion as part of a national health care benefits package, the chairman of the U.S. bishops' domestic policy committee said.

Bishop William F. Murphy of Rockville Centre, N.Y., who chairs the Committee on Domestic Justice and Human Development of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, outlined the bishops' criteria for health care reform in a brief statement to the Senate Finance Committee May 20. The next day, the USCCB sent letters with the same message to the House, Senate and White House.

Calling health care a "critical component" of the ministry of the Catholic Church, Bishop Murphy said the church brings "strong convictions and everyday experience" to the issue.

"The church provides health care, purchases health care and picks up the pieces of a failing health care system," he said. "The Catholic community encounters and serves the sick and uninsured in our emergency rooms, shelters and on the doorsteps of our parishes. One out of six patients is cared for in Catholic hospitals."

But he said the current federal policy of not compelling Americans to pay for abortions with their tax dollars must remain in place under any health reform plan.

He also expressed the bishops' opposition to "the inclusion of other procedures or technologies that attack or undermine the sanctity and dignity of life."

"No health care reform plan should compel us or others to pay for or participate in the destruction of human life," Bishop Murphy said. "To preserve this principle is morally right and politically wise as well. No health care legislation that compels Americans to pay for or participate in abortion will find sufficient votes to pass."

He called health care "a basic human right and a requirement to protect the life and dignity of every person."

"All people need and should have access to comprehensive, quality health care that they can afford, and this should not depend on their stage of life, where or whether they or their parents work, how much they earn, or where they live or where they come from," he said.

Bishop Murphy offered four "basic assumptions" and eight key criteria for judging any health reform plan.

— very easily," she explained.

"We blur the line between permitting something and deciding that thing is an affirmative good that should be promoted," she continued. "That the law permits something does not mean

Bishop William F. Murphy of Rockville Centre, N.Y., listens to a question from a Catholic News Service reporter during an interview in Washington March 24. Bishop Murphy, chair of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Domestic Justice and Human Development, said Congress must not include abortion as part of a national health care benefits package.

"The basic assumptions we offer are these: 1) a truly universal health policy with respect for human life and dignity; 2) access for all with a special concern for the poor; 3) pursuing the common good and preserving pluralism, including freedom of conscience and variety of options; and 4) restraining costs and applying them equitably across the spectrum of payers," he said.

The criteria he named were: respect for life, priority concern for the poor, access for all, comprehensive benefits, pluralism, quality, cost controls and equitable financing.

He said pluralism would be judged on "whether (the reform plan) allows and encourages the involvement of the public and private sectors, including the voluntary, religious and nonprofit sectors, in the delivery of care and services" and "whether it ensures respect for religious and ethical values in the delivery of health care, for patients and for individual and institutional providers."

"The moral measure of any health care reform proposal is whether it offers affordable and accessible health care to all, beginning with those most in need," Bishop Murphy said. "This can be a matter of life or death, or dignity or deprivation."

The House and Senate are drawing up separate plans for health care reform; key leaders have said they hope to complete work on health reform legislation by the summer recess in August.

it is right or moral or that we must facilitate it.

"We need to distinguish a zone of interference from things to which one has a legal entitlement. But we don't do that very well," she said.

'The ultimate pro-life expression'

Volunteers promote international adoptions of Down syndrome babies

BY PAUL SANCHEZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WESTERLY, R.I. — A Maryland-based organization is working against the trend of aborting Down syndrome babies by placing those children from around the globe with loving families in the United States.

Reece's Rainbow assists couples in adopting Down syndrome children from other countries.

Founded in June 2006, Reece's Rainbow has already found families for more than 175 children with Down syndrome from 32 countries around the world, including Armenia, Haiti, Mexico, Ghana, Russia, Liberia, Vietnam and Korea.

An entirely volunteer organization, Reece's Rainbow prides itself on the fact that 100 percent of every dollar donated goes to the child, family or fund designated by the donor.

For decades doctors have recommended an amniocentesis test for pregnant women 35 and older because their age dictates a greater risk for chromosomal defects. Because the test carries a slight chance of miscarriage, it has not been routinely offered to younger women, who end up giving birth to the majority of Down syndrome babies.

But a 2007 recommendation from the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists encouraged doctors to offer a new screening procedure to all pregnant women, regardless of age. A sonogram and two blood tests in the first trimester now can detect the extra 21st chromosome that causes Down syndrome.

An estimated 90 percent of all prenatal detections of Down syndrome are said to end in abortion.

Reece's Rainbow is not an adoption agency, but a nonprofit, volunteer organization that serves as a connecting point for Down syndrome children and potential adoptive families. It focuses on saving the lives of children who might otherwise face life, or death, in mental institutions abroad.

The organization also works to help birth families who choose to keep their children, and helps them begin their own Down syndrome associations that fight for the rights and inclusion of special-needs children in their own countries.

Reece's Rainbow was founded by Andrea Roberts, who has a Down syndrome child named Reece who has changed her life.

"Yes, my son is the catalyst for Reece's Rainbow. But I lean on my belief that God has a specific purpose for everyone, and this is his calling for me through Reece," Roberts said. "Not everyone gets such an obvious call. I spent many years drifting through life, with no idea where I was headed. I love to help others and my love for Reece fuels my passion to defend and protect others like him."

Shelley Bedford and her husband have adopted two boys from two different countries through Reece's Rainbow. Their son, Xander, adopted from Ukraine in August 2007, has Down syndrome and bilateral clubbed feet. He has had major foot reconstruction surgery and is learning to walk at age 5.

Their other son, Grifyn, also 5, was adopted from Serbia in April 2008. Grifyn was the first child with Down syndrome to ever be adopted in Serbia. Bedford now volunteers with Reece's Rainbow to assist other families who are adopting from Serbia.

The Bedfords live in Alabama where Shelley's husband is in the U.S. Army.

"The most rewarding part is seeing the families meeting their new children," Bedford said. "It is amazing to watch the journeys that families go through and how God pulls it all together. It is an honor to be a small part of helping unite children with their forever families."

Bedford said people were surprised when she and her husband announced they were adopting a Down syndrome child.

"No one understood why and they really didn't understand what to expect," she said. "Now they see our children and they realize that they are just normal kids, with personalities, likes and dislikes like everyone else. Our boys are loved and accepted by all of our family and friends."

Roberts said she opposes abortion, as do many people active with Reece's Rainbow. However, Reece's Rainbow primary focus is to assist with adoptions and foster understanding and acceptance through example.

"Our group is open to anyone with a love for children and people with Down syndrome. Discussions about such controversial things are discouraged because we want to keep the focus on the life-saving efforts of the ministry," she said.

Maureen Mulready, a Catholic from Liverpool, England, who has lived in the United States for nearly 20 years, said she thinks Reece's Rainbow represents the ultimate pro-life expression and applauded the rescuing of Down syndrome babies from lives in institutions where they would likely be mistreated.

"If society does not show compassion for its most vulnerable members, then it is doomed for worse things," Mulready said.

"In my opinion, the fact that Reece's Rainbow is helping to secure all of these adoptions of Down syndrome kids conveys to others that these children deserve the right to live just like other children," she said. "They are spreading a pro-life message of compassion and acceptance."

perinatal hospice for mothers who carry their babies to term despite receiving a poor prenatal diagnosis.

"Perinatal hospice provides a great service for many moms," said Tracy Winsor, a parishioner at St. Peter Church in Charlotte and regional perinatal bereavement coordinator.

But, she said, the problem is that "Down syndrome parents never get referred."

This new service "is part of our effort to support moms who are carrying to term," said Winsor. "We want to have a very specific service dedicated to Down syndrome because that population is largely underserved."

According to Winsor, the abortion rate for parents who are informed their unborn children have Down syndrome is 90 percent.

She attributes the high termination rate to a lack of information and understanding of Down syndrome within the medical community.

"As an issue of public health, we need to do a better job of providing information and supporting parents who receive these diagnoses," said Winsor.

There are other options, "even if a family feels that they can't raise a child with Down syndrome," she said.

One of the things most people don't realize is that "there are actually waiting lists associated with families who want to adopt a child with Down syndrome," said Winsor.

Winsor recently held a training session for peer ministers or counselors who will work specifically with Down

Kristin Pettler, a parishioner at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte and mother of three children, attended the training. Pettler's 3-year-old daughter Kaitlin has Down syndrome.

"It hurts my heart when I find out that other parents don't fully understand what they are doing," said Pettler of her reason for getting involved.

As a mother of a child with Down syndrome, Pettler wants to be able to help other families by sharing her experience.

"I want to let them know the future is still bright," she said.

The biggest challenge the group faces now is getting the word out about its ministry.

"We know that these women exist in the community," said Winsor.

The problem is getting referrals from the medical community.

"Doctors can unknowingly pressure women," said Pettler, referring to the vulnerable state of most women at the time of their diagnosis.

"At that point they don't understand the full ramifications and they are pressured to make a decision within 24 to 48 hours," she said.

As far as the negative connotation that comes with receiving a diagnosis of Down syndrome, Pettler said she thinks it is the "fear of the unknown."

"There is such pressure for everything to be perfect in our society," she said, but "when you stop and think about it we never know the future because it's always in God's hands."

"As a community of faith and society, we have to struggle with making certain that we are extremely welcoming and supportive of these families," said Winsor referring to the ultimate goal of Elizabeth Ministry.

Pettler hopes to do her part.

"We are all different," she said. When it comes to children with Down syndrome, she said "the difference is just a little bit more obvious on the outside."

Book chronicles JFK's 1960 struggle to become first Catholic president

REVIEWED BY AGOSTINO BONO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The United States broke ground in 2008 as Barack Obama was elected the first African-American president, with race being virtually a nonexistent issue after his nomination by the Democrats.

Almost 50 years earlier, though, prejudice was a major issue when another breakthrough was logged: the 1960 election of Democrat John Fitzgerald Kennedy as the first Catholic president.

Kennedy's Catholicism became an issue that punctuated the campaign with highly pejorative exclamation points.

A well-organized and well-financed campaign by some Protestant groups acrimoniously questioned whether his very religion disqualified him from high office. In rhetoric often crossing the line into religious bigotry, they said that the Catholic Church wanted to erase the separation of church and state and that Kennedy would be obliged to follow the orders of the pope and the U.S. hierarchy once elected.

How Kennedy fought this and eked out a narrow victory over the Republican nominee, Vice President Richard M. Nixon, is the focus of "The Making of a Catholic President" by Shaun A. Casey, an Obama campaign religious affairs adviser and associate professor of Christian ethics at Wesley Theological Seminary in Washington.

The book also is a timely reminder that, even in a country where religious freedom is a constitutional right and no religious test for office exists, religion can be manipulated for political purposes.

It gives historical perspective on the use of religion and moral codes as a political weapon, especially to people trying to understand the rise of the religious right in the United States.

Today, the religious right cuts across denominational lines, united by an ideology joining broad swatches of evangelical Christians and conservative Catholics. In 1960, the dividing line was strictly denominational.

Casey, with meticulous detail, chronicles the public debate over Catholicism and the behind-the-scenes jockeying by Kennedy and Nixon. Nixon did not publicly raise Kennedy's Catholicism but privately funded Protestant groups airing the view that Kennedy's Catholicism disqualified him from the presidency.

Kennedy knew of Nixon's behind-the-scenes support but said nothing publicly, fearing it would be counterproductive and only magnify the religion issue.

Kennedy tried a variety of parries. At first, he did not raise the issue, discussing it publicly only if asked.

He emphasized his public record of 14 years in Congress as a representative and senator, saying this showed he had not bowed to the Catholic hierarchy and noting that his oaths of office to Congress were similar to the one he would take as president to defend the Constitution.

Finally, Kennedy did some hair-splitting, saying that as a Catholic he was subject to the hierarchy on issues of faith and morals, but not on public policy. He even said he would resign the presidency if his official actions would come into conflict with his conscience.

The specific policy issues drawing 1960 Protestant ire included fear that Kennedy would establish diplomatic relations with the Vatican, support federal funding of Catholic schools and oppose artificial birth control information in U.S. foreign aid programs.

They seem rather insipid when compared to today's incendiary moral-political issues of abortion, embryonic stem cell research and same-sex marriage.

Anti-Kennedy forces also raised the issue of "mental reservation," a Catholic teaching that says a person can morally lie if it serves a greater good such as to save lives. They said that by using "mental reservation" Kennedy could oppose a pro-Catholic agenda as a candidate but do the opposite once in office.

One wonders if with this argument anti-Catholic bigotry did not cross the line into self-parody. By 1960 there was already a long history of politicians, regardless of their religion, saying one thing to get elected and then doing another to stay in office.

Catholic politicians, at least, had a name for this.

Bono, a retired Catholic News Service staff writer and a former Rome bureau chief, was a freshman at Marquette University in Milwaukee during the 1960 presidential campaign.

Doubt can be overcome by disciples

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"I doubt it." "I've had my doubts about her." Common enough expressions, used casually to convey moderate skepticism about the truth of a statement or a person's character.

But what about the kind of deep-seated doubt that supplants one's faith in Christ? Can a doubter be a disciple?

If the readings today are any indication, doubt has been on the flip side of faith for quite a long time.

Indeed, in the first reading Moses is compelled to use all his powers of persuasion and Israel's own history to assure the people that the God of the entire universe has chosen them to be his special people, and that worship of the one true God — not the practice of idolatry — is their only proper response.

In similar fashion, St. Paul must convince the Christian community in Rome that they are no longer fearful slaves but adopted children of God and heirs with Christ. However, persuasive arguments aren't always enough to dispel doubt and restore faith.

Today's Gospel shows that even seeing isn't necessarily believing. The same 11 disciples who had been closest to Jesus experienced doubts that overshadowed their worship of the risen Christ, even as he appeared to them.

Obviously, when we wrestle with our own uncertainties about God's love and provision, or when we deeply question God's purpose for our lives, we stand in solidarity with some pretty distinguished doubters.

A closer look at today's readings tells us that faith does not come by simply pretending that doubt — that most human of emotions — doesn't exist.

On this particular solemnity of the church's year, we are reminded that the Spirit given to us by the Father of the risen Lord accompanies us always, propelling us beyond doubt and fear so that not only can we "be" disciples, we can "make" disciples of others.

Questions:

With what doubts or fears have you wrestled lately?

How can you better cooperate with the Holy Spirit to overcome doubt and walk as God's adopted son or daughter?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"When they all saw him, they worshiped, but they doubted" (Matthew 28:17).

Vatican launches iPhone, Facebook applications for communications day

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Vatican is launching iPhone and Facebook applications in an effort to help Catholics, especially younger generations, use new technologies to create a culture of dialogue, respect and friendship.

The new applications are part of a brand new Vatican Web site — www.pope2you.net — that went live on World Communications Day, which was celebrated May 24 in most dioceses.

Sponsored by the Pontifical Council for Social Communications, the new site was created to help attract young people to and spread Pope Benedict XVI's message for World Communications Day, the head of the council, Archbishop Claudio Celli, told reporters May 18.

This year's communications day message is dedicated to "New Technologies, New Relationships: Promoting a Culture of Respect, Dialogue and Friendship."

"We thought that it was good to present the message to the young generation through technologies that they know how to use," the archbishop said during a press conference unveiling the new site.

"The pope is inviting us to promote a culture of dialogue, of respect and friendship," especially among young people, he said.

"We think this pontifical council itself has to use new technologies to promote new relationships around the world," he said, adding that "we must take advantage of what the new technologies are offering us at this very moment."

Pope Benedict XVI, meanwhile, urged everyone, especially young people, to use the new media "in a positive way and to realize the great potential of these means to build up bonds of friendship and solidarity that can contribute to a better world."

During his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square May 20, the pope said new communications technology has brought about a fundamental shift in how information is spread and how people communicate and relate to one another.

He asked all those "who access cyberspace to be careful to maintain and promote a culture of respect, dialogue and authentic friendship where the values of truth, harmony and understanding can flourish."

He also called on young people to "bear witness to your faith through the digital world."

"Employ these new technologies to make the Gospel known, so that the good news of God's infinite love for all people will resound in new ways across our increasingly technological world," he said.

Archbishop Celli said the pope's World Communications Day message inspired the council to create a simple, fresh site to work as a hub from which users can find new ways the universal church is present in the digital world.

The site offers viewers a link to a new application on the social networking site Facebook.

Titled "The Pope Meets You on Facebook," the new Pope2You application lets people send and receive "virtual postcards" of Pope Benedict along with inspiring text culled from the pope's various speeches and messages.

Archbishop Celli said there are about 20 different postcards to choose from but that they hope to offer more selections later so that people can "spread around the messages and insights from the Gospel."

The Pope2You site also links viewers to a new way for people to receive news about the Vatican and the pope through their iPhones or iPod touch portable music players.

In conjunction with the Vatican Television Center and Vatican Radio, H2Onews will distribute audio and video reports exclusively through the iPhone in eight different languages, including Chinese.

It is "the first application of video news dedicated to the Catholic world, through which you can follow the travels and speeches of Benedict XVI" as well as major Vatican events, the Pope2You site says.

The news clips of the pope and the Vatican will be the same ones currently offered on the Vatican's video channel on YouTube, unveiled in January.

The main Pope2You site also offers a direct link to the Vatican's channel on YouTube and a Wiki link that lets readers study the pope's 2009 communications message.

There is also a five-minute video presentation of Archbishop Celli explaining the new site and its purpose.

The archbishop said even though the new site was meant just to mark the occasion of World Communications

Day, Vatican officials are waiting for user feedback to see whether the site will become permanent.

"Right now we don't have a program or idea for the future (of the site), but if young people respond positively to the initiative then we'll see what to do in the future," he said.

The site and its applications were developed by Italian Father Paolo Padrini, a diocesan priest from Tortona.

He also helped develop the iBreviary application for the iPhone and the Catholic Facebook application called Praybook, which allows users to access and share with others traditional Catholic prayers and texts from the Liturgy of the Hours.

In Internet age, church cannot avoid debate, Vatican spokesman says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Recent Vatican communications controversies have shown that in the Internet age the church cannot avoid debate and in fact must be prepared to explain its teachings more convincingly through new media, the Vatican's spokesman said.

"In a world such as ours, we would be deluding ourselves if we thought that communication can always be carefully controlled, or that it can always be conducted smoothly and as a matter of course," the spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, said in a lecture May 18 at the Westminster seminary in London.

Father Lombardi said that, like any great institution today, the Catholic Church is going to come in for frequent criticism. Thanks in large part to the Internet, the "chorus of voices" that takes part in such debates is larger and more diverse, he said.

The church's strategy should be to enunciate its positions, evaluate criticism, and then give a clearer and more penetrating response, he said.

"It is a mistake to think that we ought to avoid debate. We must always seek to conduct debate in a way that leads to a better understanding of the church's position — and we must never get discouraged," he said.

Father Lombardi said it's inevitable that the church's message will sometimes be misunderstood, distorted or rejected by an increasingly secular world.

"We cannot fool ourselves into thinking that a perfect communications strategy could ever make it possible for us to communicate every message the church has to offer in a way that avoids contradiction and conflict," he said.

Father Lombardi said the Internet and other new media tools have risks and "enormous potential for manipulation and moral corruption." But he said the church cannot ignore the great potential of online media if it wants to "keep the truths of the faith in close touch with the emerging culture and the younger, growing generations."

The Vatican spokesman said the task of Catholic communicators is to keep working harder to develop and use new media to communicate the Gospel and promote a culture of dialogue. If successful, he said, the church can one day say that "the Internet is truly blessed."

"We are able to instill a sense of community of saints, a commitment between the school and the parish and between the generations," said Ashbrook, who teaches religion and Spanish.

In an effort to teach beyond the classroom environment, Ashbrook instructs her students to take faith a step further in a greater appreciation for life based in Catholic community.

As eighth-graders begin their final year at Immaculata School, they are paired with adult parishioners who stay in touch throughout the school year through letters, cards and daily prayers for their students.

For some of the students, the sponsors are people they see regularly during the school day, unaware they have a special bond through prayer with them. For another student, the sponsor was the woman sitting behind her at Mass on Sunday; for others, they are unknown faces among the parishioners.

"I have done this every year since Maria began the program," said sponsor Diane Salkewicz. "There is a spiritual bond for life when you are connected and praying for the needs of someone."

"There is a positive presence in your life," said Erin Brooks, Salkewicz's special student. "It's fun to get letters and nice to be prayed for."

For the first time this year, Salkewicz's daughter Jennifer was a sponsor to eighth-grader Courtney Altman.

"Eighth grade was a challenging year for me," said Jennifer Salkewicz of her motivation for joining the project. "It would have helped then to know someone was praying for me. I will look forward to doing this again."

Courtney Altman's grandmother, Mary Wall Tucker, agrees the program is a benefit for the students.

"This has given her a sense of validation and a good connection to spiritual life. She's aware now that God's right there for her," said Tucker.

A Mass and luncheon were held for program participants May 20. As they found their names on the tables, conversations began — strengthening the bonds that had been developing throughout the school year through cards, letters and heartfelt spiritual journeys that took both students and sponsors to deeper connection with their Catholic faith.

"You feel like there is someone to talk to about spiritual things," said student Mia Maj of her sponsor, Gail Whitney. "We've become friends because we had each other in prayers."

When ethics spoke to power at Notre Dame

Welcoming Obama may invite reflection, change his conscience

There's a lot to be learned from the commencement controversy at Notre Dame.

When opposition first emerged to the university's decision to invite President Barack Obama to receive an honorary degree and speak at the May 17 graduation, Holy Cross Father Theodore Hesburgh, former Notre Dame president, said in an interview with the student newspaper:

"No speaker who has ever come to Notre Dame has changed the university. We know who we are. But, quite often, the very fact of being here has changed the speaker."

Obama had to be affected by his visit to Notre Dame. It remains to be seen to what extent the national debate about abortion will change. It will take years to tell.

To its credit, Notre Dame has raised the debate to a higher level. Ethics and power met on that commencement platform; power now has a heightened awareness of the Catholic concern for human life issues in the national policy arena.

Perhaps eventually — not right away, but eventually — Obama may find himself reflecting, as his predecessor Lyndon B. Johnson did in his 1971 memoirs: "Nothing makes a man come to grips more directly with his conscience than the presidency. Sitting in that chair involves making decisions that draw out a man's fundamental commitments. The burden of his responsibility literally opens up his soul."

"No longer can he accept matters as given. No longer can he write off hopes and needs as impossible. In that house of decision, the White House, a man becomes his commitments. He understands who he really is. He learns what he genuinely wants to be."

Obama took something more than a doctoral hood and diploma back to the White House when he returned from Notre Dame.

He now has the memory of a warm and enthusiastic welcome from thousands of new friends who respectfully disagree — and said so publicly — with his policy positions on abortion and embryonic stem cell research.

He will not forget the wise words of Holy Cross Father John Jenkins, the current university president, who, while honoring him, reminded him that "easing the hateful divisions between human beings is the supreme challenge of this age. If we can solve this problem, we

JESUIT FATHER
WILLIAM J.
BYRON

have a chance to come together and solve all others."

American Catholics on all sides of the policy debates concerning human life can learn from the Notre Dame commencement experience. Curiously, it is a lesson taught years ago by a non-Christian who had an enormous impact on human history: Mahatma Gandhi.

A lawyer by training, Gandhi once said he learned "to find out the better side of human nature and to enter men's hearts. I realized that the true function of a lawyer was to unite parties riven asunder."

He resolved, he said, "never to yield to force and never to use force to win a cause." Gandhi led a nonviolent fight for India's freedom against the greatest empire in the world (the British). And he won.

To him, the essence of the principle of nonviolence was that "it must have its root in love. Its object should not be to punish the opponent or to inflict injury upon him. Even while non-cooperating with him, we must make him feel that in us he has a friend and we should try to reach his heart by rendering him humanitarian service wherever possible."

Notre Dame might want to edit that and say, "by offering him an honorary degree."

Examining Obama's Notre Dame speech

Commencement address significant but troubling

The decision of Notre Dame University not only to invite President Obama to give the commencement address, but also to award him with an honorary Doctor of Laws degree damages the reputation and contests the integrity of one of the most influential Catholic universities in the United States.

I would encourage you to read the text of Obama's speech given at the graduation ceremony in South Bend, Ind. The speech is certainly significant for a number of reasons.

Graduation speeches typically capture the current state of affairs, including relevant political, cultural, social and even moral considerations. And the speaker usually indicates how academic achievements and skills earned will respond to current crisis.

It also is significant because this speech is directed to a Catholic institution of higher learning that has enjoyed the reputation of tradition and excellence. To be sure, this speech was intended not merely for the community of Notre Dame, but for the entire Catholic community in the United States.

Most disturbing to the well-formed Catholic intellect and conscience is Obama's treatment of the issue of abortion and stem cell research.

He mentioned that "those who speak out against stem cell research may be rooted in admirable conviction about the sacredness of life, but so are the parents of a child with juvenile diabetes who are convinced that their son's or daughter's hardships can be relieved."

He makes no distinction between adult and embryonic stem cell research.

The Catholic Church is clearly in favor of stem cell research. But when this research necessitates the death of a living embryo, which results from embryonic stem cell research, then it is morally illicit.

Obama makes no clear distinctions in order to equalize the debate. He claims that both sides argue from conviction; both sides care about life; both sides make a legitimate case.

Obama then extends this dangerous approach to the issue of abortion. He employs the language of "fair-minded words" and "common ground" to appear

Guest Columnist

FATHER
MATTHEW BUETTNER

above the fray, beyond those who engage the argument.

Yet, one wonders whether he would use "fair minded words" to address those who are in favor of rape or whether he would seek "common ground" with those who endorse slavery or support the holocaust of Jews and Christians during World War II.

We cannot concede that the issue of abortion is little more than an irreconcilable debate between two adverse opinions or opposing perspectives without any reference to objective criteria. Those who are in favor of abortion want to retain the legal protection to commit murder, while those who are against it seek legal protection of the innocent human life that exists in the womb.

Interestingly, Obama asks that we "work together to reduce the number of women seeking abortions by reducing unintended pregnancies...." He may be referring to abstinence programs.

However, he is likely encouraging the use of contraceptives, which are not only morally evil, but often increase the need for abortion when they fail.

But ultimately, one wonders why he would seek to reduce the number of abortions when he has worked to promote abortion in the United States and around the world.

Either abortion is a good or it is an evil. The pro-abortion position claims that abortion is a good that expresses freedom and independence. Why would Obama work to protect an apparent good and then argue that this good should not be expressed unless he knows that in the end, it is an evil that unleashes devastating consequences?

Sadly, abortion and stem cell research are eclipsed by the challenges of a floundering global economy, environmental protection and other issues that characterize "the City of Man" in the president's speech to the university.

However, the speech is significant because it is addressed to the Catholic community at large. And its disturbing details reveal that we have much work to do to combat what our Holy Father wisely called "the dictatorship of relativism."

I encourage you to read the speech, study our faith, and be ready to defend the truth against those who threaten it.

Lament for Gollum

Fictional creature a reminder to overcome struggles through Christ

On my desk is a small statue of Gollum, the Hobbit-like character from J.R.R. Tolkien's "The Hobbit" and "The Lord of the Rings." Those who have read only "The Hobbit," where Gollum was introduced, have seen only an evil, angry little creature.

But those who have read "The Lord of the Rings," or seen its film adaption, witnessed something else. Gollum was a soul in torment, obsessed with wishing to possess a ring of pure evil that slowly and literally destroyed him body and soul.

St. Benedict reminds us to "Deny yourself in order to follow Christ" (Rule of St. Benedict 4:10).

Denying ourselves means an act of will, a deliberate choice to follow the example of our Lord and not to follow our own will. And it also means denying ourselves those things that could corrupt our good intentions.

"For what the flesh desires is opposed to the Spirit, and what the Spirit desires is opposed to the flesh; for these are opposed to each other, to prevent you from doing what you want" (NRSV; Gal. 5:17).

Poor Gollum. Those who knew him pitied him. Why? Because they recognized the struggle within him and understood that same struggle within themselves.

It is a common struggle; it is within our nature. All through "The Lord of the Rings," the reader witnesses the soul wrenching struggle within Gollum as he journeyed with the others.

On one side is the obsessive desire for the material (the Ring). On the other is his desire to break away from the influence of the Ring in favor of new friends who understand his struggle.

"Our inner self fights against the outer, and the outer against the inner. For flesh always desires useless and perishable things, the spirit seeks what is useful and always sighs for what is eternal" (Smaragdus of St. Mihiel, p. 173).

When Gollum allowed others to help him, he was able to struggle against the power of the Ring. Frodo, the hero of the story and the "Ring bearer," reached out to Gollum because he recognized and understood his struggle.

When Gollum chose to reject his friendship and turn his full attention to acquiring the Ring, he failed, eventually giving up his struggle and allowing the influence of the Ring to corrupt him. He turned against friend and ally to possess the Ring — a golden, material object.

Perhaps he was doomed to begin with. He killed his childhood friend to obtain the Ring. His obsession drove him away from family and friends until all he had in the world was the Ring, his "Precious."

This is the result of all addictive behavior; but worse — this is the ultimate result whenever we deliberately

Guest Column

GEORGE COBB
GUEST COLUMNIST

and consistently turn away from a loving God toward the material world, the world of the flesh.

So why do I keep Gollum on my desk? It is a reminder to turn to our Lord in the struggle to be more like him; but also it is a reminder of the importance of friends.

With Jesus helping us along the way, none of us is "doomed to begin with." Gollum reminds me of the importance of seeking out others in my personal struggles against the "rings" in life. If we share our common struggle, we will find we are not quite as alone as we think.

Gollum also is a reminder to me to remember to look for the good in all people and to see the face of Christ in each person I meet. So it is a reminder to always reach out to the Gollums of the world who may be struggling alone, and may ultimately fall, because they have been rejected by the society in which we live.

But most importantly, Gollum is a reminder to turn to the one person, the one friend, who understands our own struggles better than any other — our Lord Jesus Christ.

Pope says simplicity, sobriety, sacrifice aren't just for monks

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The principles of poverty, chastity and sacrifice for the good of the community, which are characteristic of monastic life, are valid for all Christians, Pope Benedict XVI said.

During his weekly general audience May 27 in St. Peter's Square, the pope used the example of the Byzantine monk St. Theodore the Studite to explain how the virtues that monks and nuns strive for should be emulated by all in everyday life.

St. Theodore, who was born in 759, emphasized the ideals of "renunciation of private property, freedom from material things, sobriety (and) simplicity," the pope told the crowd of about 14,000 people. "This extreme form is valid for monks, but the spirit is valid for everyone," he said.

The pope also praised St. Theodore's promotion of "philergia," or love of work, as "a way to find God."

St. Theodore's conviction that the monastery's earnings should be shared with the poor was an example that "we can all learn that the fruits of our work should be for the benefit of all," the pope said.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

Today's catechesis on the life and teaching of St. Theodore the Studite places us at the heart of the medieval Byzantine period.

Born in 759 to a noble and pious family, Theodore entered the monastery at the age of 22. He vigorously opposed the iconoclastic movement since, he argued, abolishing images of Christ entails a rejection of his work of redemption.

Theodore also initiated a thorough reform of the disciplinary, administrative and spiritual aspects of monastic life. A particularly important virtue according to Theodore is "philergia" — the love of work — since diligence in material tasks indicates fervor in one's spiritual duties.

He even described work as a type of "liturgy," asserting that the riches mined from it must be used to help the poor.

The Studite's Rule holds particular relevance for us today because it highlights the unity of faith and the need to resist the danger of spiritual individualism.

May we heed Theodore's summons to nurture the unity of the Body of Christ through well-ordered lives and by cultivating harmonious relationships with one another in the Holy Spirit.

Making the movement their own

Encouraging teens shy about pro-life activism

It's a difficult time to be a pro-life Catholic teen. Sometimes, it seems like those in favor of keeping abortion legal are more sensible.

They don't carry around placards with pictures of aborted fetuses (something that keeps one pro-life teen I know from getting involved in activism).

They don't pray loud novenas outside abortion clinics (which makes another girl I know nervous and embarrassed).

They don't say, "If you have any doubts at all, you're not Catholic." (It's normal to doubt when you're a teenager!)

In fact, a girl told me they often seem more tolerant and "with it," which could explain why President Obama was a hit at Notre Dame even though the church opposes his policies.

To a Catholic, though, the abortion debate isn't thorny at all: Abortion is murder. It is wrong. It must be stopped.

But this is a multi-opinioned, polyglot world. Stopping the spread of abortion is going to be a long road, and it's understandable if Catholic teens, faced with the enormity of the task and how often it seems to clash with the way they live today, shy away from pro-life activism.

Here are some ways teens can make the pro-life movement their own: Cultivate a culture of openness and acceptance within your school and your group of friends. Start talking today. Be an everyday advocate and help your friends make good decisions. They'll listen to you!

Often, pro-lifers will serve as "sidewalk counselors," intercepting women before they go into a clinic and talking to them about abortion. My question is: Why weren't these conversations occurring before someone got pregnant?

Afraid to make speeches? Teens have a lot of economic power, so let your wallet speak for you: Don't spend money on items or services made by companies who support abortion businesses.

Turned off by confrontational language and graphic pictures? There are other ways of showing solidarity.

One is by running supply drives for women's shelters and charities that provide free baby supplies to moms who have chosen to keep their kids. People always feel better knowing they're not in a traumatic situation alone.

Don't like prayer vigils or rosary rallies with music and liturgy that don't seem relevant to your experience? Ask a priest or youth minister for help and plan a prayer service that's both Catholic and comfortable for teens.

I page through my high school yearbook now and again, seeing the faces of old friends and people I knew. What's missing, though, are the faces that could have been there but never were — the 50 million victims of abortion in America who never even got a shot at doing the things we take for granted: breathing, dreaming, growing up.

No "deus ex machina" is going to come out of nowhere to change things; no number of bitter words or graduation protests will shift policy overnight.

It's going to take a lot of work, and we need to start changing things now by influencing decisions, saving lives and ensuring bright futures.

It can be done. Now that's sensible!

U.S. seminarians finish second in Clericus Cup soccer match

ROME — Dreams of glory for the Pontifical North American College soccer team were vanquished with a single corner kick to their goal in the final duel for the Clericus Cup tournament trophy.

The NAC Martyrs, the team fielded by the U.S. bishops' seminary in Rome, finished the season with a respectable second place after going undefeated into the final match May 23 against a team from the Neocatechumenal Way's Redemptoris Mater seminary.

The loss did not discourage the North American College rector, Msgr. James Checchio.

"They're winners," he said after the game. "They're great men; they played hard and they keep improving."

The important thing, he said, "is that they are coming together in unity and a spirit of cooperation, with brothers from other countries."

The Clericus Cup tournament for priests and seminarians studying in Rome was established in 2006 and first played in 2007; it now involves 386 seminarians and religious from 69 countries.

Martyrs' coach and goalie Gannon Jones said the loss was disappointing, "but I'm definitely pleased at our playing this year. This is the only game we lost, and only by one point. Our defense was very good."

The key is "to put your good sportsmanship to Christ," he said, because "winning is everything only if you win God."

Despite the heat and the high stakes for the title of champions, tempers appeared to be kept under control. A jab here and kick there, or a foul, didn't set off the players as they might in a match in a conventional league.

The blue "sin" card, an innovation of Clericus Cup play that signifies a timeout for "reflection" for any player who gets a little overheated, was not employed during the final match.

Hundreds of fans from both seminaries took shelter from the blazing sun under the covered stands on a hilltop soccer field that gave a unique, level view of the dome of the nearby St. Peter's Basilica.

To inaugurate the game, "Red Mat" players and supporters sang "Alma Redemptoris Mater," while Martyrs' fans sang "The Star-Spangled Banner" accompanied by a trumpeter.

Msgr. Checchio estimated that about half of the 208 seminarians at the North American College had come out to cheer on their red and blue team.

An extremely enthusiastic fan club, they stamped their feet, pounded the roof, shouted "NAC, NAC, NAC ..." to the tune of "Barbara Ann" and "Yes, we can! Yes, we can!" or admonished the referee with taunting chants.

Three fans in full Captain America, King Kong and Elvis garb pranced about at halftime.

Bob Mucci, a fourth-year seminarian from Brooklyn, N.Y., said he followed the team from the beginning of the Clericus Cup and said the North American team members "have only gotten better every year. Next year they'll have to win."

The Martyrs had hoped to win the leading scorer title with their Brazilian forward John Kalevski, who went into the game with 11 goals for the season. But he didn't get the chance to surpass Edouard Sinayobye of the College of St. Paul, who finished the season with 12 goals.

Kalevski, who is studying for the Basilian order, wanted to play soccer, and because his house did not field a team he joined the Martyrs.

Center back Victor Ingalls, a first-year student from Montgomery, Ala., said after the game that not winning the cup "is a disappointment, but it's a joy to be able to be in Rome and have all teams with the same goal — the joy in Christ."

Winning is not the point, he said. "We're all here to glorify the Lord."

Games are friendly, he said, because many of the men are friends.

"I know a lot of the players on Red Mat because we were at the Gregorian (a pontifical university) together," he said.

Claudio Starile, one of the referees for the Catholic sporting association that organizes the Clericus Cup, said that officiating at one of this league's games is "like being on holiday" compared to a conventional match.

"There is a big difference in behavior," he said. "Here there is a real desire to play: In other matches there is more of a desire to be aggressive."

Coach Jones said he got his team out twice a week for practice.

Of course, prayer is part of their game plan.

"We pray before and after a game — to not get injured and to enjoy it," Jones said. "We pray to express ourselves, using the gifts that God gave us."

VATICAN CITY — The 2009-10 Year for Priests will demonstrate that the Catholic Church "is proud of her priests, loves them, honors them (and) admires them," said Cardinal Claudio Hummes, prefect of the Congregation for Clergy.

In a letter released in late May, the cardinal said the yearlong celebration, which was proclaimed by Pope Benedict XVI and will be inaugurated by him June 19, also will recognize the variety of pastoral work performed by priests and the witness of their lives.

CHARLOTTE — Another option for Catholics preferring traditional burial is now available in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis consecrated Holy Redeemer Garden at Sharon Memorial Park in Charlotte June 1.

Members of the Knights of Columbus; Deacon Guy Piche, director of diocesan properties; and parishioners of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte gathered for the event.

"The Holy Redeemer Cemetery at Sharon Memorial Park is the fourth Catholic cemetery I have had the privilege of blessing in less than two years," said the bishop in an interview.

AN UNCERTAIN ERA

The U.S. flag is displayed on a car at the Burt GM auto dealer in Denver June 1. General Motors Corp. filed for bankruptcy protection in New York June 1, forcing the 100-year-old automaker, once seen as a symbol of American economic might and dynamism, into a new and uncertain era of government ownership.

Detroit archbishop praying for those affected by GM bankruptcy

DETROIT (CNS) — Archbishop Allen H. Vigneron of Detroit said he was praying for those affected by the General Motors Corp. bankruptcy.

"The news concerning General Motors adds to the disruption and uncertainty already faced by many of our fellow citizens," Archbishop Vigneron said in a June 1 statement. "All of those impacted by these latest developments are in my prayers."

GM, until recently the world's largest automaker, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection June 1.

Under the terms of the filing, the U.S. government, which has made billions of dollars in loan guarantees to GM since last year, will own 60 percent of the company.

The Canadian government, which has been assisting GM facilities in that country, will own 12 percent, and the UAW will own about 17 percent of the company, while bondholders will own most of the remainder.

But the bankruptcy filing also came with news that GM would close another 16 of its 49 remaining manufacturing and assembly plants.

GM announced earlier this spring that it would discontinue selling the Pontiac, Saturn and Hummer brands. Hummer is being sold to a Chinese industrial firm, and most of GM's European brands have been shed, sold or shielded from bankruptcy.

"I invite the Catholic faithful to join with me as we implore the Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of Perpetual Help, for her comfort in these times of economic distress," Archbishop Vigneron said in his statement. "And we humbly ask for her intercession with Jesus, her son, to strengthen all of those bearing the burdens of the challenges before us."

The GM bankruptcy came the same day after Chrysler, the United States' third largest automaker, came out of bankruptcy. The Italian automaker Fiat will take most of Chrysler's assets.

Michigan had the nation's highest unemployment rate even before the Detroit automakers started reeling last year from the effects of record-high gas prices and weakening auto sales.

Consumer advocate Ralph Nader criticized the bankruptcy plan in a June 2 statement.

"What about the act of closing dealers? Dealers don't cost manufacturers anything. The franchise agreement makes certain of that. So why are we further inconveniencing motorists, rupturing their relationship over the years with dealers that are closer to home and making them travel more and more?" Nader said.

"The answer is, the fewer dealers, the more likely the price of cars goes up. So there are all kinds of reasons why this should go back to Congress for thorough House and Senate hearings, if Congress wanted to adhere to its constitutional duties," he said.

Priest's decision to be an Episcopalian said to harm church relations

MIAMI (CNS) — Archbishop John C. Favalora of Miami expressed disappointment May 28 at both Father Alberto Cutie's decision to join the Episcopal Church and the public way he was received into his new church.

"This truly is a serious setback for ecumenical relations and cooperation" between the Catholic Archdiocese of Miami and the Episcopal Diocese of Southeast Florida, the archbishop said in a statement that also warned Catholics not to request the sacraments from Father Cutie nor attend Masses celebrated by him.

Father Cutie, who was suspended from his parish and Catholic radio posts after photos of him with a woman were released by a tabloid magazine, joined the Episcopal Church May 28 at a ceremony at Miami's Trinity Cathedral.

The woman, identified as Ruhama Buni Canellis, 35, also became an Episcopalian in the same ceremony.

"I have decided to become part of a new spiritual family within the umbrella of Christianity," he said in a statement.

A statement from the Episcopal Diocese of Southeast Florida said he would pursue becoming a priest in that church but it was not clear how long the process would take.

Archbishop Favalora said neither Father Cutie nor Episcopal Bishop Leo Frade of Southeast Florida had told him that the priest was considering joining the Episcopal Church.

Citing various sections of canon law, the archbishop said Father Cutie had separated himself "from the communion of the Roman Catholic Church by professing erroneous faith and morals and refusing submission to the Holy Father." Any sacraments he performs "would be illicit" and any Mass he celebrates "would be valid but illicit, meaning it does not meet a Catholic's obligation."

The statement also noted that Father Cutie "is still bound by his promise to live a celibate life," from which he can be released only by the pope.

Vatican announces papal trip to Czech Republic in September

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI will visit the Czech Republic in late September, participating in the nation's Sept. 28 observance of the feast of St. Wenceslaus, a 10th-century Czech prince and martyr.

During the Sept. 26-28 trip, the pope will visit Prague, Brno and Stara Boleslav, the town where St. Wenceslaus was murdered by his brother in 935 to protest his embrace of Christianity, the Vatican announced May 30.

The announcement was published as Pope Benedict was meeting Czech President Vaclav Klaus in the papal library. The pope and president discussed the situation in the Czech Republic, "looking in particular at some questions related to relations with the Catholic Church, as well as to the future of Europe, taking into account the importance of its cultural, spiritual and Christian patrimony," the Vatican said.

Church-state relations in the Czech Republic have been tense over demands for the restitution of Catholic properties confiscated under communist rule. In March, the Czech Supreme Court confirmed state ownership of Prague's historic St. Vitus Cathedral after a 17-year legal battle by the church.

After his audience with the pope, Klaus told Vatican Radio he was pleasantly surprised by "how the pope follows the situation in our country. Our meeting was not just an exchange of pleasantries, but we spoke in a very concrete way."

"Regarding preparations for the pope's visit, I must say they already are in an advanced phase. We are happy the pope will be visiting us because he will bring a clear message for everyone," Klaus told Vatican Radio.

Pope John Paul's beatification delayed, Italian newspapers say

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The beatification of Pope John Paul II may be delayed as the Vatican seeks more documentation regarding his almost 27 years as pope, Italian newspapers reported in late May.

According to the newspaper La Stampa, the chief holdup regards hundreds of letters he wrote before and after his election to Wanda Poltawska, a longtime friend and adviser to the pope.

Meanwhile, the newspaper Il Giornale reported that a commission of theologians meeting in mid-May decided the information contained in the official "positio," or position paper, was not complete enough.

In particular, the newspaper cited the fact that Cardinal Angelo Sodano, secretary of state under Pope John Paul, and Cardinal Leonardo Sandri, his deputy at the time, had not given testimony in the case.

Neither newspaper quoted any of the commission members by name nor included comments from current officials of the Congregation for Saints' Causes.

Passionist Father Ciro Benedettini, vice director of the Vatican press office, said June 1 there would be no official comment from the Vatican while the process was under way.

Dominican Father Daniel Ols, the Vatican's chief investigator for Pope John Paul's cause, told the Italian news agency ANSA June 1 that the process was proceeding with the Vatican's normal, cautious pace.

Pope Benedict XVI waived the five-year waiting period for the cause to begin, Father Ols said, "but at the same time, he wants the work to be done well and with maximum accuracy."

La Stampa published an interview with Poltawska June 1 in which she said she met Father Karol Wojtyla, the future pope, in 1950 when she was looking for a confessor and spiritual director to guide her in the long process of recovering from her internment as a political prisoner in the Nazis' Ravensbruck concentration camp, where medical experiments were performed on prisoners.

Along with her husband and often with their children, "we shared interests, important moments, spirituality and that love for nature that we experienced camping in the mountains of southern Poland and even in the golden cage that was (the papal villa at) Castel Gandolfo," after his election as pope in 1978, she said.

"From the first time I met him I knew he would become a saint," Poltawska said. "His holiness was evident; he radiated an interior light that was impossible to hide."

Poltawska said she has a "suitcase full of his letters," written over the course of 55 years.

"I cannot tell you how many I gave to the beatification cause," because she took an oath of secrecy regarding the cause, she said. "I did not destroy any of them. I selected some and decided to publish them in Poland, even though some people did not agree," she said.

To purge poverty

CCHD grants awarded to local organizations

SHELBY — Delegations from 10 organizations working with the poor living in the Diocese of Charlotte gathered for a grants luncheon at St. Mary Church in Shelby May 21.

The organizations present were 10 of the 11 organizations selected to receive checks from the Catholic Campaign for Human Development (CCHD) for the 2009 funding cycle.

CCHD is the U.S. bishops' domestic anti-poverty program that supports community groups.

The local grant checks, totaling $40,334, were distributed by Mary Jane Bruton, CCHD director in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"First and foremost, we thank the Catholics of the Diocese of Charlotte for their generosity in the annual November CCHD collection. It is their contributions that make this grant program a reality," said Bruton.

Dioceses throughout the United States conduct an annual CCHD collection in November. Most of the funds are sent to the national CCHD office to support the organization's national anti-poverty mission, but a small portion of the collection remains in the dioceses to support local grants for grassroots organizations.

Ralph McCloud, national director of CCHD, spoke at the recent luncheon on the topic of "The Challenges of Poverty."

Observing that two of the recipient organizations had the word "neighbor" in their names, McCloud applauded CCHD's community response to the poor and remarked how poverty can best be addressed by neighbors serving and empowering neighbors at the local level.

This year, four grants were awarded to organizations in the western region, two grants in the central region, three grants in the Charlotte-metro area and two grants in the Triad region.

Franciscan nun in Raleigh is CCHD diocesan director of year

RALEIGH (CNS) — Franciscan Sister Joan Jurski was named the Catholic Campaign for Human Development's 2009 director of the year.

Sister Jurski has been the CCHD director in the Diocese of Raleigh, N.C., since 1991. Also coordinator of the diocese's Office of Peace and Justice, she addresses the social concerns of a diocese that is more rural than urban, with 96 Catholic churches spread over 54 counties.

The annual award honors the daily and "often unsung efforts of the men and women" who serve their dioceses as local campaign directors, an announcement said.

Sister Jurski received the CCHD award in February during the annual Catholic Social Ministry Gathering in Washington, D.C.

In her acceptance remarks, she said CCHD, the U.S. bishops' domestic anti-poverty program, is one of the most effective evangelization efforts in the Diocese of Raleigh.

For many people, especially in rural communities, the assistance CCHD provides is often their first encounter with Catholics, she said.

Charlotte cemetery opens Catholic section

It is the third Catholic section to be opened at an independently-owned cemetery in the diocese in the past 10 months.

The Garden of St. Matthew at Forest Lawn Cemetery in Matthews opened Aug. 12, 2008 and a Catholic section at Northlake Memorial Gardens in Huntersville was consecrated Dec. 2, 2008. A cemetery at the site of the future Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury was consecrated Sept. 1, 2007.

In 2006, the Diocese of Charlotte implemented a moratorium on constructing and expanding columbaria and conducted a study on the use of columbaria and cemeteries.

"The Holy Redeemer Cemetery fulfills the requirements of our diocesan Policy on Cemeteries, which requires that a resting place for the bodies of the deceased and a resting place for cremated remains be available all at one location," said Bishop Jugis.

"The Holy Redeemer cemetery is a pastorally sensitive approach, offering equal access at one location to all our Catholic parishioners who desire a resting place for either the body or for cremated remains," the bishop said.

Sharon Memorial Park was opened in 1939. The cemetery offers private estates, hedge estates, traditional ground burial and a cremation columbarium.

Holy Redeemer Garden is the newest section in the park and the first Catholic cemetery in the city of Charlotte.

An 8-foot granite crucifix at the center of the Catholic section serves as an identifiably Catholic symbol within the independently-owned cemetery.

"It stands as a reminder of Christ's love for all humanity," said Bishop Jugis.

"St. Paul says that if we have died with Christ, then we shall also live with Christ," the bishop said. "We place our beloved dead at the feet of the crucified Lord, knowing that they continue to live in Christ and that their bodies are safe under his watchful care as they await the resurrection on the last day."

BURIAL or CREMATION?

•The Order of Christian Funerals — the Vatican-approved rite used for celebrating Catholic funerals — indicates three reasons for the preference of burial of the body of the deceased over the cremation of the body:

- Jesus himself willed to be buried;
- the body at the funeral rite expresses in a natural way the manner people had been accustomed to relating to the person while he or she was living, namely through a human body;
- the body at the funeral rite expresses Jesus' teaching regarding the supernatural dignity and destiny of the human body.

•The Order of Christian Funerals presents cremation as an exception to burial and allows Catholics to be cremated "when extraordinary circumstances make the cremation of a body the only feasible choice."

•In March 2007, the Diocese of Charlotte issued its new policy on cemeteries and columbaria, which states parishes may offer at one location a resting place for both the bodies and the cremated remains of the deceased.

•The policy gives the diocese the option to create Catholic sections in local cemeteries and to receive or purchase land for the establishment of a Catholic cemetery.

Sister Mary Cecilia Lewis 1917 – 2009

Teacher, musician dies in her 73rd year as Sister of Mercy

BELMONT — Mercy Sister Mary Cecilia Lewis died May 30 at Marian Center in Belmont after an extended illness. She was 92.

A funeral Mass was held at Sacred Heart Convent in Belmont, followed by burial in Belmont Abbey cemetery.

She was born Helen Virginia Lewis in Memphis, Tenn., Feb. 13, 1917. Upon entering the Sisters of Mercy on June 24, 1935, she took the name Sister Mary Cecilia. She was received into the religious order Feb. 2, 1936 and had been in her 73rd year as a Sister of Mercy.

A gifted teacher and musician, Sister Lewis was an educator for her entire ministerial career, including her years at Sacred Heart Academy in Belmont, where she was principal, and at Sacred Heart College, where she served as chairperson of the music department for more than 30 years.

Sister Lewis also was organist and choir director for her congregation.

She began her teaching career in 1937 and was missioned to Sacred Heart School in Salisbury. In 1939, she was assigned to St. Mary's School in Wilmington.

She also taught at O'Donoghue School in Charlotte before returning to teach at Sacred Heart Academy and Sacred Heart College in Belmont.

Although busy with her teaching schedule, Sister Lewis actively served the community at large where many people knew her as a piano instructor for children and adults.

She was a member of the board of directors of the Gaston Fine Arts Council and the Gastonia Community Concerts Association, as well as secretary of the diocesan Liturgical Commission.

In addition, she was active in the Charlotte Piano Teachers Forum, serving as its president, vice president, librarian and board member. In 1984, the forum awarded her a citation of honorary membership for her meritorious service.

In 1971, she added two new ministries. The first consisted of a year of work at Charlotte Ear, Eye, Nose and Throat Hospital; the second was 10 years with Contact Telephone Counseling.

For many years, she served as a pastoral volunteer at Gaston Memorial Hospital and as a hospice volunteer, visiting men and women living with AIDS. She was a member of the board of directors of the House of Mercy, a facility sponsored by her order for men and women with AIDS.

Sister Lewis graduated from Sacred Heart Academy in 1934 and from Sacred Heart Junior College in 1935 with an associate's degree in liberal arts.

She attended Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., and received her bachelor's degree in liturgical music from Manhattanville College of the Sacred Heart in Purchase, N.Y.

She then returned to her studies at Catholic University of America, earning a master's degree in music education.

Mercy Sister Mary Cecilia Lewis

During her sabbatical year of 1980-81, Sister Lewis completed a master's degree in spirituality at Mundelin College in Chicago.

While there, she served as a volunteer for Sarah's Circle, a center for homeless women in uptown Chicago.

Sister Lewis enrolled in postgraduate study at Wake Forest University, Peabody Conservatory, Appalachian State University and Catholic University of America.

She held certificates of professional advancement from the North Carolina Music Teachers Association and the Music Teachers National Association, and memberships in the American Association of University Professors, American Guild of Organists, College Music Society, Charlotte Music Club and North Carolina Music Educators Conference.

Sister Lewis is survived by the Sisters of Mercy South Central Community and by several cousins.

Memorials may be made to the Sisters of Mercy, Sacred Heart Convent, 100 Mercy Drive, Belmont, NC 28012-4805; to House of Mercy, 701 Mercy Drive, Belmont, NC 28012; or to Gaston Hospice, P.O. Box 3984, Gastonia, NC 28054.

Pro-life activists condemn murder of abortion doctor right-to-life groups saying such extreme acts only hurt the pro-life cause.

"As a people of life and for life, violence has no place in our message, which is protection for all from conception until natural death," Maggi Nadol, Respect Life director in the Diocese of Charlotte, said June 3.

"We reject violence inside the abortion centers in ending the life of the unborn and we reject violence outside the abortion centers," she said.

Dr. George Tiller, 67, of Wichita, Kan., was fatally shot while serving as an usher at the city's Reformation Lutheran Church during morning services, according to The Associated Press.

The suspect arrested in the shooting was officially charged June 2 with one count of first-degree murder. Criminal justice officials have accused him of threatening two people at the church and additionally charged him with aggravated assault.

In 1996, a man with the same name was charged in Topeka, Kan., with criminal use of explosives for having bomb components in his car trunk and sentenced to 24 months of probation, the AP reported. However, the conviction was overturned on appeal the next year after a higher court said evidence against him was seized by law enforcement officers during an illegal search of his car, the AP reported.

Tiller — whose clinic is one of just a few in the nation where abortions are performed after the 21st week of pregnancy — had been a target of abortion opponents since the 1970s. He was shot in both arms by a protester in 1993 and his clinic was bombed in 1985.

Speaking on behalf of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia, chairman of the bishops' Committee on Pro-Life Activities, expressed profound regret upon learning of Tiller's shooting death.

"Our bishops' conference and all its members have repeatedly and publicly denounced all forms of violence in our society, including abortion as well as the misguided resort to violence by anyone opposed to abortion," Cardinal Rigali said in a June 1 statement.

"Such killing is the opposite of everything we stand for, and everything we want our culture to stand for: respect for the life of each and every human being from its beginning to its natural end. We pray for Dr. Tiller and his family," he said.

"The pro-life movement works to protect the right to life and increase respect for human life," said David O'Steen, executive director of the National Right to Life Committee. "The unlawful use of violence is directly contrary to that goal."

Members of the president's faith-based advisory council, who are among those working for common ground on abortion, also condemned Tiller's murder.

President Barack Obama, who supports legal abortion, also expressed his dismay at the shooting death of the abortion doctor and said such violence wouldn't be tolerated.

"However profound our differences as Americans over difficult issues such as abortion, they cannot be resolved by heinous acts of violence," he said May 31.

At least one abortion opponent condemned what Tiller did while condemning the act that took his life.

MORE AMERICANS CONSIDER THEMSELVES "PRO-LIFE" than "pro-choice" for the first time since Gallup began asking this question:

With respect to the abortion issue, would you consider yourself to be pro-choice or pro-life?

"I believe George Tiller was one of the most evil men on the planet; every bit as vile as the Nazi war criminals who were hunted down, tried and sentenced after they participated in the 'legal' murder of the Jews that fell into their hands," said Randall Terry, founder of Operation Rescue. "But even Mr. Tiller — like other murderers — deserved a trial of his peers, and a legal execution, not vigilante justice."

The murder will most likely tarnish the image of anti-abortion activists and hurt the credibility of advocates who use peaceful means to bring about an end to legal abortion in the U.S., Terry said.

"His killing presents us a severe challenge," he said.

Catholic bishops in Kansas and neighboring Colorado condemned the murder, stating that although they vigorously oppose abortion, violence against those who perform the procedures is counterproductive and contrary to Catholic teaching.

"Many Catholics have over the years engaged in peaceful protest outside of Dr. Tiller's clinic, praying for an end to abortion, and especially late-term abortions. I have on occasion joined them for this purpose," said Bishop Michael O. Jackels of Wichita.

"This position and hope cannot, however, serve as a justification for committing other sins and crimes, like the willful destruction of property and, even worse, murder," he said.

Bishop Jackels and the bishops who lead the three other Catholic dioceses in Kansas extended their condolences to Tiller's family. They said they were praying for the slain doctor's soul and said the fact that the shooting occurred in a church only adds to the horror of the crime.

Other condemnations of the murder came from Catholics United, Students for Life of America, Priests for Life, Religious Leaders Seeking Common Ground on Abortion, the Pope John Paul II Bioethics Commission, Maryland Right to Life and Cleveland Right to Life.

"We fear, however, that this murder is a byproduct of increasingly hateful and intolerant language on the part of some militant opponents of legal abortion — language that has often sought to demonize people like Dr. Tiller to the point of dehumanization," said Chris Korzen, executive director of Catholics United.

"In the wake of Dr. Tiller's death, we call on all sides of the abortion debate to commit to charitable dialogue and pursuit of common ground solutions," Korzen said. "It is only through this sort of respectful communication that we can find real solutions to abortion and avert tragedies like the one ... in Kansas."

Pope ordains priests, warns of wordly spirit in the church

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI ordained 19 priests and urged them to make sure their ministry is not contaminated by a worldly mentality.

Priests should dedicate their lives to prayer and service, and never lose sight of the self-sacrifice of Christ, the pope said during the lengthy liturgy in St. Peter's Basilica May 3.

The Mass marked the annual celebration of the World Day of Prayer for Vocations. The new priests, who will serve in the Diocese of Rome, included 13 from Italy and six from other countries on four continents.

After prostrating themselves on the floor of the basilica as a litany of the saints was chanted, each of the candidates knelt before the pope as he imposed his hands on his head, part of the ordination rite.

In his sermon, the pope quoted the First Letter of John, who contrasted the spirit of the Gospel with the spirit of the "world," a term he used to refer to all that is hostile toward God.

St. John said that "the world does not know us" because it did not know

God, a lament that remains true today, the pope said.

"It's true, and we priests experience this: the 'world,' in John's meaning of the term, does not understand the Christian; does not understand the ministries of the Gospel. In part because in fact it does not know God, and in part because it does not want to know him," he said.

Accepting God would place this worldly attitude in "crisis," the pope said.

"Here we need to pay attention to a reality: that this 'world,' in the evangelical sense, threatens even the church, infecting its members and the ordained ministers themselves," he said.

"The 'world' is a mentality, a manner of thinking and living that can pollute even the church, and in fact does pollute it, and therefore requires constant vigilance and purification," the pope said.

The Christian vocation, he said, is to be free from evil and different from the world, though living in the world.

The pope emphasized the centrality of prayer in the life of each priest. This prayer should be Christ-centered, and its highest form is the Eucharist, he said. From prayer comes the effectiveness of all other priestly ministry, he said.

"The priest who prays often and prays well becomes progressively expropriated from himself and increasingly united with Jesus, the good shepherd, and the servant of his brothers," he said.

After the Mass, at his noon blessing, the pope urged the entire church community to pray for priestly vocations.

The pope recently proclaimed a year for priests that will run from June 2009 to June 2010.

In recent years, Vatican statistics have shown that the number of priests and seminarians in the world is increasing somewhat, but not as fast as the general Catholic population.

Year for Priests will show pride in, love for priests

Addressing Italian bishops May 28, Pope Benedict said the year should help priests "rediscover the grace and the goal of priestly ministry."

"It is a service to the church and to the Christian people that requires a deep spirituality," the pope said, because only by being united with the Lord can priests minister effectively through their preaching, their celebration of the sacraments and their assistance to the poor.

In his letter, Cardinal Hummes acknowledged that some priests had been involved in "gravely problematic and unfortunate situations," an apparent reference to recent sexual abuse scandals.

He wrote that while investigation, prosecution and punishment were necessary, "it is also important to keep in mind that these pertain to a very small portion of the clergy."

Most priests, he said, are "people of great integrity, dedicated to the sacred ministry" who sacrifice themselves and are "in solidarity with the poor and suffering."

Cardinal Hummes said that over the year the economic status of priests also will be addressed "since they live, at times, in situations of great poverty and hardship in many parts of the world."

The new Statistical Yearbook of the Church, just released with figures recorded as of Dec. 31, 2007, showed that the problem of priestly vocations continues.

The yearbook reported a very slight increase, less than 1 percent, in the number of priests between 2000 and the end of 2007.

The number of priests around the world rose from 405,178 in 2000 to 408,024, which the Vatican newspaper described as "not significant, in the light of regional differences."

Africa and Asia show dynamic growth, with increases of 27.5 percent and 21.2 percent, respectively, while the number of priests in the Americas held steady, according to L'Osservatore Romano, the Vatican newspaper.

Europe, however, showed a decline of nearly 7 percent, while the number of priests in Oceania decreased by more than 5 percent, it said.

During the Year for Priests, Cardinal

Hummes said, there will be study, spiritual exercises, conferences and theological seminars in dioceses around the world.

He said it should be an occasion of "intense appreciation of the priestly identity, of the theology of the Catholic priesthood and of the extraordinary meaning of the vocation and mission of priests within the church and in society."

Above all, the cardinal said, "may it be a year as well of religious and of public celebration which will bring the people — the local Catholic community — to pray, to reflect, to celebrate and justly to give honor to their priests."

The cardinal's letter was published in several languages on the Congregation for Clergy's Web site — www.clerus.org — but Vatican Radio reported May 27 that on the opening day of the Year for Priests, June 19, the clergy congregation would unveil a special Web site for the year at www.annussacerdotalis.org.

Seven Sisters of Mercy celebrate anniversaries

Celebrating 25 years as a "silver jubiliarian" was Mercy Sister Teresa Susana Dandison.

Mercy Sister Mary Hugh Mauldin introduced the Jubilarians to the guests at the celebration.

"You, of course, know our sisters from how they've served among you — foster mothers, teachers, college administrators, nurses, counselors, school principals," she said.

"We sisters know them other ways too — as women who strive to live together in love that the world may be encouraged in their call to love," said Sister Mauldin.

Sister Boulus, a North Carolina native, entered the Sisters of Mercy in 1949. Although her ministry has been mostly in administration, she said she would most like to be remembered as a math teacher.

She currently is director for both the food services for Sacred Heart Convent and the administrative offices of the Sisters of Mercy South Central Community.

Sister Donovan, a native of Long Island, N.Y., entered the Sisters of Mercy in 1950. Although much of her ministry was as an educator, she is gifted in finance as well. For 14 years, she was treasurer of the congregation in Guam, and from 1979 to 1996 she served as treasurer of the Sisters of Mercy of North Carolina.

Sister Durbin, a native of Nebraska, entered the Sisters of Mercy in 1950. In addition to her ministry in education, Sister Durbin has worked in the office of Holy Angels in Belmont and in the office of the president of the community.

For the past decade, she has served as director of the Media Resource Center for the Diocese of Charlotte.

A native North Carolinian, Sister Godwin entered the Sisters of Mercy in 1949. She has served as a teacher and has ministered for years as a direct caregiver. Currently, she helps care for ill sisters at Marian Center on the Sisters of Mercy campus in Belmont.

Sister McNally, a native of New York, entered the Sisters of Mercy in 1949. Her ministries have included nursing, teaching, counseling and practicing as a canon lawyer.

As a canon lawyer, she has served as a member of the marriage tribunals for the Archdiocese of Miami and the Diocese of Charlotte, and as a canon law teacher in formation programs for the Sisters of Mercy, the Benedictines of Belmont Abbey and the Trappists of Monks Corner, S.C.

Born in Richmond, Va., Sister Solari entered the Sisters of Mercy in 1949. She has served as a teacher and campus minister for many years. Currently, she is an assistant in the media center at Holy Trinity Middle School in Charlotte.

A native of Argentina, Sister Dandison entered the Sisters of Mercy in 1984. Widowed prior to her entry, she is a mother and grandmother. She spent some of her first years with the Sisters of Mercy serving in the Widowed, Separated and Divorced Ministry in the diocese.

She also has been a Mercy presence in the diocese's Hispanic ministry in Davie County since 1996, where she serves those who struggle with language and other difficulties in the health and government systems.

Women consecrated as spiritual mothers for priests

TULSA, Okla. (CNS) — Following a recommendation by the Vatican Congregation for Clergy, 33 women from the Diocese of Tulsa were consecrated as spiritual mothers of priests during a special Mass at Holy Family Cathedral.

They are the first spiritual mothers to be consecrated in the United States, said Father Mark Kirby, a Tulsa priest who directs a cenacle for priests in the diocese.

"Mary is the model for those whom God has called to serve the church by living as spiritual mothers of priests," Bishop Edward J. Slattery of Tulsa told the women during the March 24 Mass.

"With Our Lady, the spiritual mothers of priests have as the heart of their vocation the call to live a life of constant prayer and adoration while making a conscious effort to love generously and freely," he said.

Each of the women was presented with a medal and a certificate signifying her dedication to a particular priest, who was described to her but not named. The priests who expressed interest in having a spiritual mother do not know her identity, either; they only know someone is praying for them and their call to holiness.

The women were asked to spend time daily in adoration and intercessory prayer directed toward their adopted priests. Their consecration followed several weeks of formation. Now that they are consecrated, the women will continue as spiritual mothers for the rest of their lives.

The letter from the Congregation for Clergy, released in 2007, asked bishops to seek out women who would follow the example of Mary and "spiritually adopt priests in order to help them with their self-offering, prayer and penance."

The effort is intended to promote perpetual eucharistic adoration "for the reparation of faults and the sanctification of priests."

Series explores how women overcome boundaries within faith

REVIEWED BY ELEONORE FOURNIER-TOMBS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"Shall we accept merely what is good from God and not accept also what is bad?" (Jb 2:10)

Since he first courageously formulated it, Job's question has been asked again and again by human beings who find it consistently difficult to embrace pain and suffering. Catholics have found inspiration in Job's unwavering loyalty and love for God and have tried to imitate his lack of hatred and anger.

The message hasn't changed. The real test of a person is not to be good when it's easy, but to be good when it's really, really difficult. But what is being good? According to Job, it is remaining devoted to God.

According to Sister Joan Mueller, it's alleviating the suffering of those around you. According to most Catholics, it's somewhere between prayer and action; each person chooses his or her own interpretation.

The new St. Anthony's Press series titled "Called to Holiness: Spirituality for Catholic Women" explores just that. The three first volumes are part personal testimonies, part how-to manuals on overcoming challenges and being good — good to God, good to oneself and good to one's community.

"Making Sense of God," the introduction to the series written by Elizabeth Dreyer, is a guide aimed at empowering women to be theologians, that is, to understand God and worship him in a way that, well, makes sense.

"Grieving With Grace" is a touching little account of a year in Dolores Leckey's life following the sudden death of her husband. Her reprinted diary entries highlight her struggle to come to terms with her loss as she learns about herself and explores suffering around her.

Thinking back on that year, she writes: "At first I wrote as a way of coping. (But) the communion I experienced included not only my husband, but friends, public figures, culture in its many forms, and the social contexts in which we all live."

Leckey's insights will no doubt be a real comfort to any woman coping with loss. Loving and genuine, she also will appeal to anyone wanting to be inspired by the power of faith through suffering.

Finally, in "Living a Spirituality of Action," Sister Mueller, a member of the Franciscan Sisters of Joy, shares her experience as founder of Project Welcome, an organization providing support and services to Sudanese refugees settling in Omaha, Neb.

She encourages women to give their time to their communities, and movingly writes about her feelings of pain and discouragement as she tried to improve the lives of the refugees.

"Simply being good," she writes, "really isn't that simple." But, she adds, "a preferential option for the poor invites us to make a choice to serve another person simply because it is the right thing to do."

This series, though, is not only about moral choices. It is also about the meaning of Catholicism for women who for the last two millennia have typically been surrounded by male religious imagery and male leadership in the church.

It is about women who need to overcome boundaries within their own faith to fully develop as good human beings. After all, God chose to be born a man. He really only had two choices — to be born a man or a woman — but his decision left its mark on generations of followers.

Dreyer writes it is not only that human beings struggle to be close to God, but that women have a special challenge in relating to him. While women have had many role models in the Catholic Church, the leading figures have always been men.

After all, the reason that this series of books has come out is that there is a real need for women to find themselves within the church, a need for women to feel that they are not eternally second best.

What's more, based on the first three books, this series is not so much about learning one's place in the church as it is about creating it.

It's a practical read, and if readers go through the exercises, rituals, discussions and reflection periods suggested in the books, they are going to get quite a workout for their souls — whether they're women or men.

Sacrifice is a definition of God's love

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

When I think of personal sacrifice I am always reminded of something my mother did for me.

One day when I was 19 and out of money and gas, my mother gave me $20. At the time, it did not seem like such a big deal. Later, I learned that it was her last $20 and she had been saving it for cigarettes.

This was no small sacrifice for her, as she had been smoking since she was a teenager. Years later she ended up quitting, but at the time, giving up her cigarette money was demonstrative of what she was willing to do for her children.

In my coursework for a degree in theology, I learned this definition of love: To want good for another and be willing to do what it takes to make that good happen.

This is exactly how it was with my mother. She was willing to do whatever it took to make sure her children had what she could give them.

This weekend's readings are all about sacrifice — not just regular sacrifice, but total giving, a kind of sacrifice that ends in the shedding of blood. The Old Testament reading outlines the Mosaic Covenant regulation for sacrificing an animal, and the New Testament readings reveal the New Covenant in which Jesus is the lamb that is slain.

These passages help us enter into the commemoration of a great feast day, Corpus Christi, when we celebrate the ultimate sacrifice, the total self-giving of Jesus.

The sacrifice of the body and blood of Jesus is ever present to us at Mass; it is the center point of our faith and the doorway to heaven.

In this way the heavenly Father defines love. He wants the good for us (eternity with him) so much that he does whatever it takes (sacrificing his Son) so we can have that good.

The Corpus Christi (body of Christ) is an ever-present reminder of the love God has for us. This is made even more special in that we not only receive this truth in our mind and hearts, but the body of Christ enters our body, his sacrificed body saving ours.

Questions:

In what ways have you seen someone want good for another person and do what it takes to make it happen? What does receiving the body and blood of Jesus mean for you?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"While they were eating, he took bread, said the blessing, broke it, gave it to them, and said, 'Take it; this is my body.' Then he took a cup, gave thanks, and gave it to them, and they all drank from it. He said to them, 'This is my blood of the covenant, which will be shed for many'" (Matthew 14:22-24).

Vatican Museum director juggles protecting art, keeping it public

BY SARAH DELANEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROME — Accommodating ever-increasing crowds while protecting priceless works of art for future generations is the greatest challenge museum directors are facing today, said Antonio Paolucci, director of the Vatican Museums.

With 18 months under his belt as chief of the vast collection gathered by popes over the centuries, Paolucci also said his job was to educate museum visitors, who often do not understand what they are looking at.

He recently told architecture students at La Sapienza University in Rome that the famous labyrinth of galleries he oversees was "the archetype of all museums," unique in its history and formation but also difficult to manage for those same reasons.

Paolucci, the longtime director of the Uffizi Galleries in Florence, was appointed director of the Vatican Museums in December 2007. He is one of Italy's most prominent cultural spokesmen.

Anyone who has been to Rome and visited the Vatican probably has experienced the long line that snakes along its fortified walls; often people wait more than an hour to get into the Vatican Museums, just to find themselves shoulder to shoulder once inside.

In 2008, more than 4.5 million people visited the museums, Paolucci said, and those numbers show no signs of abating, even with the economic crisis.

To rationally take care of the flow of visitors, the trick for museum directors is to navigate between the overexposure of valuable works and excessive restriction.

"There is the 'Taliban' or extremist approach," he explained. "This type of director hopes that as few people as possible will visit, to avoid the risk of damaging the works."

"On the other side of the trajectory there is the permissive director, who is interested in getting as many people as possible, extending hours and making access available to anyone who wants to go," he added.

Balance is needed, he said, and museum authorities today should be emphasizing the "preventative conservation" of galleries and artworks, working on the flow of visitors, controlling the atmosphere, and changing the traffic patterns to avoid too much exposure to delicate works.

Paolucci's greatest frustration is the tendency of most visitors to ignore the many different galleries in the Vatican Museums to get to the Sistine Chapel.

"It's an anthropological phenomenon ... people have this single goal when they come to the Vatican Museums," he said.

It is the "unfortunate consequence" of the importance of the chapel, covered Antonio Paolucci, director of Vatican Museums, is one of Italy's most prominent cultural spokesmen. He said his greatest frustration is the tendency of most visitors to ignore the many different galleries in the Vatican Museums to get to the Sistine Chapel.

with Michelangelo frescoes, he said, "like a light that shines so strongly that it prevents one from seeing the rest."

Even the famous Raphael rooms that visitors pass through on the way to the chapel are barely looked at, he said. He blamed the "relentless schedules of the tourist industry" for herding people through in an average of one hour and 15 minutes.

He said most visitors ignored galleries with exceptional collections of Greco-Roman statuary; Etruscan, Egyptian and ethnic art and artifacts; the Pinacoteca, with its collection of medieval and Renaissance paintings; and the famous Gallery of Maps.

So while the quantity of museum visits is continually rising, the quality has suffered, Paolucci said, lamenting the "semantic blackout, a clouding over of the significance of things" of contemporary culture.

"Understanding a painting by Titian is like understanding a Shakespeare sonnet or a work by Cervantes," but people come to museums completely unprepared for the experience, he said.

"We are working on that, sending out student guides, helping to explain the works," he said. "We need to decipher the Vatican Museums for people."

Unlike many other collections in Europe that were originally gathered by generations of dynastic families like the Medicis in Italy, the Romanovs in Russia or the Habsburgs in Austria, the Vatican collections grew according to the tastes and ideas of each successive pope, Paolucci said.

"Each pope was different and brought with him his own culture, and so a different sort of collecting," he said.

Noting the unifying idea, he said, "All popes sought to use the figurative arts, because they understood the extraordinary importance and exceptional potential for persuasion, propaganda and education of artistic expression."

Paolucci credits Pope Julius II, the pope best known for commissioning Michelangelo to paint the Sistine Chapel, with beginning the museums by bringing to the papal palace the famous "Greek Laocoon" sculpture in 1506.

Soon after, Pope Julius added the "Apollo of Belvedere," which he brought from his own family palace.

The Vatican collection was founded on Greco-Roman statuary, and it was not a casual choice, Paolucci explained.

"It was a very precise ideological and cultural plan — the church of Rome that makes classical art its own, that Christianizes the classical era," he said.

That was the beginning of a "torturous, discordant accumulation of works of art," with no precise plan, which according to Paolucci "is what makes the Vatican Museums so unique and fascinating today."

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

For the month of June, as another school year comes to an end, here is a look at some of the Catholic schools that once served students in the Diocese of Charlotte but are now closed.

ARCHIVAL PHOTO

A nun plays a guitar for students outside St. John the Evangelist School in Waynesville in this undated photograph.

Asheville Catholic High School

The school was established as St. Francis School for Boys by Franciscan Friars in 1949. It stood on the old Glen Eden estate, with the mansion converted into classrooms and the stable into a laboratory.

On Sept. 3, 1957, Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh established Asheville Catholic High School as a co-ed institution staffed by three different religious orders: Sisters of Mercy, Sisters of Charity of Nazareth and Religious of Christian Education.

A new high school building and gymnasium/auditorium were completed on the same estate property in 1960. Bishop Waters dedicated the new facilities April 24, 1960. Due to declining enrollment, the high school closed in June 1972. The property was sold to Asheville-Buncombe Technical Community College in 1974.

St. Genevieve of the Pines, Asheville

The story of St. Genevieve's began in December 1907, when five women of Religious of Christian Education moved into a house on Starnes Ave. They had established a school in their home by January 1908. By September 1908, they operated the school in two houses located on N. Main Street (now Broadway) and had an enrollment of 80 students, six of whom were boarding students.

Next, the school moved to the former Victoria Inn on Victoria Rd. and became St. Genevieve of the Pines. Classes at the new campus started in January 1911.

In 1949, the sisters added Gibbons Hall for boys and began St. Genevieve of the Pines School for Secretaries in 1955.

The Religious of Christian Education ceased operating St. Genevieve's in 1971 due to a shortage of vocations and the age and poor health of the sisters. However, the institution continued instructing under the care of a board of trustees with some of the sisters remaining as teachers.

St. Genevieve's merged with Asheville Country Day School in 1987. Today it is called the Carolina Day School. The St. Genevieve property was sold to Asheville-Buncombe Technical Community College.

Notre Dame High School, Greensboro

The school was established in the former St. Leo Hospital on Summit Avenue. Bishop Waters dedicated Notre Dame High School Sept. 11, 1955 and classes started that same month.

The Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur originally staffed the high school, but a lack of vocations forced them to withdraw in June 1968, resulting in the closing of the high school. Prior to 1971, the building was demolished and the property was leased in 1972.

St. Benedict School, Greensboro

The parochial school opened Sept. 6, 1926 in a house on East Smith St. Four Sisters of Charity of Vincent de Paul taught 62 students, with the sisters' convent located on the floor above the classrooms.

St. Benedict School closed in 1954 when the newly built St. Pius X School opened. The school property was leased to a business in 1968, and has since then been converted into a parking lot.

Mt. St. Joseph Academy, Hickory

The Sisters of Mercy established the academy in 1880 as a finishing school for young ladies. Mt. St. Joseph Academy sat on 13 acres between Second and Fourth avenues SW and Sixth and Seventh streets SW. The property contained a convent, two small dwellings and stables.

In 1888, due to financial considerations and infrequent reception of the sacraments, the sisters closed the school and sold the property to the Ohio Lutherans, who converted it into a practical seminary.

Later, the seminary became the site of St. Paul Lutheran Church. After closing and selling the academy, the sisters moved to Charlotte and opened St. Mary's Seminary, the predecessor to St. Patrick School.

St. Francis of Assisi School, Lenoir

The school was located in a house beside St. Francis of Assisi Church on West College Ave. Franciscan Father Ildephonse Gillogly founded the school, which was dedicated in October 1947.

Two Franciscan Sisters from Allegheny initially staffed the school, which by 1956 had 50 students in first through eighth grades. The school was closed circa 1960.

St. John the Evangelist School, Waynesville

The school opened in September 1939 with an initial enrollment of 40 students in kindergarten through 12th grade taught by six Sisters of St. Francis from Milwaukee. Originally, the W. J. Hannah building provided classroom space as well as housing for the sisters.

In 1956, Bishop Waters dedicated the new "modern" school built on the corner of Church and Meadow streets. High school classes were taught on the lower level of the building while elementary students met on the upper level. When the sisters departed in 1963, the school closed temporarily. It reopened in August 1964 with the arrival of the Sisters of St. Francis of Tiffin, Ohio. They remained until 1979, at which time the Daughters of Charity took over.

The Daughters of Charity operated the school for one year. Thus, after 40 years of service to the Waynesville area, St. John School closed permanently in 1980.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Eternal truths, instant and perishable news

Internet offers additional challenges, opportunities for church

At the risk of "lese-majeste" (injury to majesty), it's good to see the Vatican is catching on.

"In a world such as ours, we would be deluding ourselves if we thought that communication can always be carefully controlled or that it can always be conducted smoothly and as a matter of course," said Jesuit Father Frederico Lombardi, the official Vatican spokesman, in a recent lecture.

Some of the church's recent problems with communication remind me of an incident some years ago in a United States archdiocese when accumulated snow from an early spring storm collapsed the roof of the cathedral. The rector of the cathedral called the archdiocesan newspaper editor to view the damage.

As they both looked at the broken ceiling and the plaster, glass and snow in the sanctuary, the rector cautioned: "Now, not a word to the press about this." A weak attempt at controlling the news.

Father Lombardi said that one of the challenges of the Internet is that it can destroy or confuse the hierarchy of the providing of information established by church agencies. There are no unfiltered messages anymore. The time for hierarchal news control has ended.

Think of it as the undersea trans-Atlantic or trans-Pacific cable that at one time carried a message untouched east to west, west to east. Now submarines from many nations are able to tap into that cable and listen to or even alter transmissions.

Within living memory, newspapers printed "extra" editions to publish breaking news. These were outmoded by radio broadcast for immediacy and then radio by television, which added moving pictures to immediacy. Now both of these have been supplanted by the Internet, which provides news constantly by the minute.

It is hard then, to "get out in front" of a news story.

One rule for effective, positive communication is to get the story out first with as full a disclosure as possible. If the roof falls in, say so accurately and quickly.

Father Lombardi, in his lecture at Westminster Theological Seminary in London, cited three recent incidents that drew media attention. They were the pope's speech on Islam in 2006 at Regensburg, Germany, the lifting of the excommunication of a bishop who denied the extent of the Holocaust and the pope's comment that distribution of condoms is not effective against AIDS.

In each case, Father Lombardi said, the criticism provoked additional Vatican responses. Although these responses arrived rather late, they were serious, penetrating and well-argued, he said.

But today, "late" trumps all three: serious, penetrating and well-argued.

Getting out in front of a story is a difficult change for a millennium-old organization, such as the Vatican, staffed by people comfortable in the polite academic world where arguments are carefully crafted, contemplated and presented without regard for time.

After all, a day for the Vatican is a minute for today's Internet culture.

The end result is that a response, despite its coherence, risks being viewed as an alibi or an excuse. There are no more news cycles.

That is why the speed of the processing of news makes even more valuable the skills brought to the process by professional reporters and editors. This is even more important when the news and information is often involved in the nuanced language of theology.

The need to speak the truth rather than seek approval means the church will often be counter to the values of society, said Father Lombardi.

Eternal truths, yes, but communicated within the context of instant and perishable news.

Only fools rush in Christian living requires action, not apathy

I don't consider myself brave. In fact, I typically consider myself a darned fool.

And a few nights ago I got to reaffirm that belief.

My wife and I were roused from bed by the sound of a bullet shattering our front window. A car was outside, gunshots were being fired, a woman was screaming.

As my wife hastily called 911, I responded differently — I ran outside to help. I discovered a man attacking my neighbor, a woman in her 50s, in her driveway across the street.

The 25-year-old perpetrator, who had threatened to kill my neighbor, was chased off and eventually apprehended by police. My wife and I then waited outside with the hysterical woman, who wailed "He was trying to kill me! He was trying to kill me!" until the cops came.

I later learned that about six shots had been fired. At least two of the bullets tore through my house and are now embedded in interior walls.

Not the type of redecorating my wife had in mind when we moved in.

When I told this story to friends and coworkers, many had a similar response: "Why did you run outside? Why didn't you just duck down and call the police?"

Valid questions, I'll agree. They remind me of that old saying: "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." I don't typically advocate rushing into gunfire, but I guess it just seemed like the right thing to do at the time.

Interestingly, I was the only one to run out to try and help the woman. And in the long minutes after the attack, my wife and I were the only ones in our typically-quiet suburban neighborhood to go out there and comfort her.

Even after the police arrived, nobody came over to see if she was all right. She could have been shot, stabbed, bleeding; she could have collapsed in her driveway or in the street. Nobody else came out or over to help.

Am I surprised? Not necessarily. It was gunfire, after all. But how many of us see stranded motorists on the side of the road and keep on driving? Someone else will call 911, we tell ourselves.

How many of us walk or drive by homeless people asking for help on a street corner? We pretend not to see them and do our best not to make eye contact.

I guess it's easier to look away, keep going and assume it's all someone else's problem, that someone else will take care of it. I guess going to work or to the mall or keeping to our ever-so-busy schedules is more important than risking our safety to help another human being.

Is that the right thing to do? Is that what Christ would want us to do?

It reminds me of another valid question: Why do firefighters run into a burning building when everyone else is running out? Maybe it's their job and they do it for the pay. Or maybe just because it's the right thing to do.

Firefighters are certainly brave, no doubt about it, as are all emergency-service responders. And all the men and women of our Armed Forces. And anyone who stands up and runs toward potential danger that would send the rest of us scurrying. They come running when we call them; they are there when we need them. That, if nothing else, makes them heroes. Some would even call them angels.

But heroism isn't just about standing up to danger. Sometimes it's about standing up to the impossible. Sometimes it's just about standing up for what's right.

The single mother who gets up every day to work three jobs to keep a roof over her kids' heads and food on their table — that's heroism.

The woman in a crisis pregnancy who risks sacrifice and condemnation to give her baby the gift of life — that's heroism.

The doctor who leaves his comfortable practice to serve the poor and impoverished in a Third World country — that's heroism.

The young man or woman who gives up a secular life to answer a call and serve a higher purpose in ministry to God and his people — that's heroism.

Any one of us, who defies his or her own selfish needs and the apathetic trends of our self-centered society to see Christ in all people and to truly be Christ to all people — that's heroism.

So maybe only fools do rush in where angels fear to tread. Or maybe, that next time we choose to act and make a difference, we may be the angels God has sent to do his work.

Jesus called

Different approaches to teaching faith may be needed to reach all people

Jesus called.

Not Jesus, our lord and savior, but Jesus, a Mexican-American man who occasionally comes to our parish.

He wanted to talk about God. We talked for a couple of hours.

Over the years I have seen him and his wife for various things. They come when they want something like marriage or baptism for their babies.

They come when they have financial, legal, medical or marital troubles.

Once they came to see me when they were about to lose their house to foreclosure. I sent money to save their property. They were grateful, but seemed to take it for granted.

In their eyes, the Catholic Church is a big, rich institution. The priest is a community official. You go to him when you need something, but not to talk about faith.

So, for the first time, Jesus and I sat down and really talked about faith.

He had recently gone through a conversion experience. A couple of weeks before, he had touched bottom, and a cousin took him to see a Pentecostal pastor. Jesus really listened.

He did not see the pastor as some sort of social service agency.

The pastor said the right thing. He told Jesus, "I can't help you, but there is One who can." Then he opened the Bible and pointed to Christ.

Good.

I was not defensive about it. I am glad when people authentically find God, no matter how. But I was discouraged.

Why, after all these years of helping them, did he go to the Pentecostal minister for conversion?

When Jesus came to see me, we also opened the Bible.

I read to him from the story of the cripple whom St. Peter met at the Temple gate in Jerusalem. The cripple wanted money.

St. Peter said to him, "Silver and gold I have not, but what I have I give to you. In the name of Jesus Christ, arise and walk."

I told him, "What do you think I have been preaching all these years in this church. Why didn't you ever come to see me about faith?"

I gave him a Bible and catechism. It was a start.

Before he left, we prayed together. We really prayed. I explained to him the significance of the sign of the cross, which he had been making automatically all his life. We agreed to talk some more.

When he left the great sorrow I felt still lingered. I was discouraged, not angry.

Jesus sees the Catholic Church through the prism of Mexican culture. We are the background music of life. The priest in Mexican culture is often a remote figure, not a spiritual companion.

Our churches are so big it is hard to speak to everyone's heart. We sacramentalize, but we don't evangelize.

Why?

Partly because many are not listening.

Partly because we are too busy with other things and we assume people already know the faith. But they don't.

Both Jesus and I have a bit of rethinking to do about our approach to religion.

But I won't miss another chance to talk about faith. It is the most important thing we do.

Busy days or vacations must never distract people from God, says pope

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Fulfilled vacations or hectic workweeks must never distract people from dedicating a little time each day and, especially every Sunday, to God, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"We must set aside time in life for God, to open our life to God with a thought, a meditation, a small prayer and to not forget Sunday is the day of the Lord," he said.

During his weekly general audience June 3 in St. Peter's Square, the pope used the example of Blessed Rabanus Maurus, a Benedictine monk and bishop, to show how a person can live a busy life without sacrificing spiritual study, meditation and prayer.

With an estimated 17,000 people gathered in the square, Pope Benedict continued his audience talks on important figures in the early church.

Rabanus Maurus' life demonstrates how one can be completely at the service of others "without depriving oneself of spending a proper amount of time in reflection, study and meditation," said Pope Benedict.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

Our catechesis today deals with another great monastic figure of the High Middle Ages, Rabanus Maurus.

Rabanus entered monastic life at a young age as an oblate, was trained in the liberal arts and received a broad formation in the Christian tradition. As the abbot of Fulda and then as archbishop of Mainz, he contributed through his vast learning and pastoral zeal to the unity of the empire and the transmission of a Christian culture deeply nourished by the Scriptures and the Fathers of the church.

From his youth he wrote poetry, and he is probably the author of the famous hymn Veni Creator Spiritus. Indeed, his first theological work was a poem on the holy Cross, in which the poetry was accompanied by an illuminated representation of the crucified Christ.

This medieval method of joining poetry to pictorial art sought to lift the whole person — mind, heart and senses — to the contemplation of the truth contained in God's word.

In the same spirit Rabanus sought to transmit the richness of the Christian cultural tradition through his prolific commentaries on the Scriptures, his explanations of the liturgy and his pastoral writings.

This great man of the church continues to inspire us by his example of an active ministry nourished by study, profound contemplation and constant prayer.

My happiest moment

A reflection of nearly 50 years in the priesthood

May 28, 2009, was the 49th anniversary of my ordination. As I prepare for my upcoming golden jubilee, I recall four highlights from my life as a priest.

Each was special, but the happiest one took place way back on the very day of my ordination. Here is a brief overview of those four events.

One day, early in the presidency of Ronald Reagan, I received a phone call from the White House, inviting me to a luncheon.

Was this a joke?

Apparently not; the president was pushing for private-sector solutions to social problems and turned to religious broadcasters for help.

The top Protestant TV evangelists were there, and since I had a nationally syndicated TV show, "Christopher Closeup," I was invited too.

Surrounded by fundamentalists who believed that I was not saved, I felt oddly uncomfortable. I learned that glory does not always bring joy.

In 1981, Cardinal Leo Joseph Suenens asked me to come to Belgium to meet King Albert Baudouin, who was the patriarch of the Catholic royal families of Europe.

The king asked me to conduct a spiritual retreat for his royal nephews and nieces.

It was a thrill, of course, but when the time came I was pleasantly surprised to see how normal they all were.

I remember asking two of his nieces from Spain, "Is it true that you are both princesses?"

"Yes," the younger one answered, "her mother is a Bourbon, and my mother is an Orleans."

At that moment, for the first time, I realized that Bourbon Street in New Orleans was not named after the drink! This event was pure joy.

A third highlight came in 1991 when I was invited to Dallas to speak before 400 bishops, archbishops and cardinals at their annual workshop.

The keynote speaker that year was Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, who later became Pope Benedict XVI.

To my utter shock, he stayed on to listen to my talk. It was the toughest audience I ever faced.

When I stepped down, Jesuit Father Avery Dulles was the next speaker. To this day I do not know how my talk went over, but this I do know: Father Dulles eventually became Cardinal Dulles while I have remained Father Catoir! I am happy anyway.

The real highlight of my life took place on May 28, 1960, the day of my ordination.

My father came forward for my first priestly blessing and burst into tears. He wrote this letter to me 25 years later:

"Dear Son, Congratulations on your silver jubilee. I never told you this before, but the fondest and happiest moment of my life was the day you were ordained, and I went up to get your first blessing.

"I was so emotionally charged I couldn't see where I was going. As I returned, I just dropped into a vacant pew, buried my head in my hands, and had a good cry.

"They were happy tears, but I deeply regretted the fact that your good mother did not live long enough to share this joy with me. I'm sure she was happily watching over us from heaven.

"Pray for me always. I am happy to say that I am your father and you are my son. With a heart full of love, Dad."

The experience of meeting a president, a king and a future pope all seem to pale in comparison to the joyful memory of my ordination day.

My father returned to God in 1992.

When the new St. John the Evangelist Catholic Church was consecrated Sept. 30, 2007, parishioners gathered to celebrate in the unfinished parish center just below the church.

One day soon, they had hoped, the rudimentary room would be finished.

Those hopes, fleshed out by hard work, were realized June 12. Some 150 parishioners feasted on a barbecue dinner celebrating the dedication of their newly completed parish activity center.

CHARLOTTE — A smile spread across the face of priesthood candidate Benjamin Roberts as he processed down the aisle at the start of his ordination Mass. That smile remained a permanent fixture throughout the ceremony.

"It was a glorious day," said Father Roberts, who formally dedicated his life to serving the Lord, the church and the people of God as he was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Peter J. Jugis at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte June 6.

During his homily, Bishop Jugis reminded the candidate of the importance of "daily conversation with Jesus in prayer."

Bob and Suzanne Wright of Fairfield, Conn., founded Autism Speaks in 2005. The Catholic couple was honored June 9 with the Servitor Pacis Award from the Path to Peace Foundation, which supports the work of the Holy See Mission to the United Nations.

Catholic couple recognized for autism advocacy

WASHINGTON (CNS) — When Nicholas Giangregorio, 8, was first diagnosed with autism before his second birthday, his family found it difficult to convince society to accept them.

The town pool wouldn't let the family in because they didn't want the child's stroller — his safety net — near the water. An usher at their Long Island church shut the back doors on the family because of the noise he made in the vestibule.

But since Bob and Suzanne Wright founded Autism Speaks in 2005, the Giangregorios have noticed a collective increase in awareness and understanding about the disease, a complex brain disorder affecting abilities to communicate and develop social relationships.

They learned how to approach the town and are now allowed to bring Nicholas to the pool, stroller and all.

And Michael Giangregorio, the boy's father, used the organization's resources to help organize an autism awareness Mass at St. Catherine of Sienna Church in Franklin Square, N.Y., this spring.

Michael Giangregorio said he owes a debt of gratitude to the Wrights, who were honored June 9 with a Path to Peace Foundation Servitor Pacis Award.

The award is often given to "unsung heroes" who serve "where the need is greater, where the wounds are festering and the pain unending," according to the foundation's Web site. The foundation was established to support the work of the Holy See Mission to the United Nations.

"They're my heroes," Giangregorio said of the Wrights, whose grandson Christian was diagnosed with autism at the age of 2.

Angela DiStefano, another parent who helped organize the Long Island Mass, said it was difficult to find autism resources in 1997, when her son John, now 14, was first diagnosed with the disease, which affects 1 in 150 children.

DiStefano made connections at the special education preschool he attended, but she still felt alone. Through Autism Speaks, she met parents going through the same struggles. "It has really opened up a different world for me," she said.

Opening up worlds of communication was the Wrights' intention.

Almost five years after its founding, Autism Speaks funds more than $30 million each year in new research. It has worked to see insurance legislation passed in five states. About 1 million people frequent the Internet's social networks. About 400,000 people participated in 80 nationwide walks this year.

The Wrights, who live in Fairfield, Conn., said their Catholic faith has always driven their desire to help others.

"God gave it to us knowing that we were going to do something about this," Suzanne Wright said.

"It seemed like, if not us, who?" Bob Wright added.

Likewise, faith helps keep the Giangregorios and DiStefanos strong.

"I don't know how I would have ever been able to go through anything without my faith," Angela DiStefano said. "I rely on God every day to get me through."

And John, her 14-year-old, picks up on this. He prays for people with problems and assures them they will be OK, and he sings in the youth choir at his church.

Giangregorio said his faith is important because it reminds him that his son is a blessing who taught him patience and because he needs miracles to believe in. But it always helps to have people like the Wrights on his side. "If that isn't something that should be recognized as a mission of peace, then I don't know what is," he said.

Mexican bishops condemn murders of priest, two seminarians

MEXICO CITY (CNS) — The Mexican bishops' conference has condemned the murders of a priest and two seminarians in the southern state of Guerrero as they were traveling to a religious retreat.

"We ... condemn the violence that is plaguing our country and demand that the authorities from all levels of government quickly carry out an investigation and find those responsible for this cowardly crime," said a statement issued June 15, two days after the killings. "From our faith, we express the certainty that Father Habacuc Hernandez ... and the seminarians Eduardo Oregon Benitez and Silvestre Gonzalez now enjoy the presence of our heavenly Father."

The three men were shot dead by gunmen while they traveled through a violence-plagued region known as Tierra Caliente, where drug-cartel activities have been on the increase. Media reports said the three men, who worked and studied in the Diocese of Ciudad Altamirano, were shot in the back. No motive has been provided for the attacks.

"We don't know exactly what happened, but everything points to organized crime," said Father Juan Carlos Flores, spokesman for the Archdiocese of Acapulco. "The deaths of these prelates is part of the violence that the entire state is living through."

The murders also were part of an upswing of drug-related violence in Guerrero. The state is best known for the beaches and glitzy villas of Acapulco, but also has marginalized regions, with human development index scores on par with sub-Saharan Africa.

"The deaths are a message for telling us that things are getting very serious," Father Pedro Pantoja, director of the migrant shelter for the Diocese of Saltillo, told reporters in Mexico City June 15.

Organized crime, he added, "could care less (who we are.) We're no longer honorable to them."

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope urges world leaders to tackle hunger at UN summit

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI urged international leaders to turn their attention to the growing problem of world hunger as they deal with the global economic crisis.

Looking ahead to a U.N. financial summit in New York June 24-25, the pope said the meeting should be carried out "in a spirit of wisdom and solidarity, so that the current crisis can be transformed into an opportunity."

The goal should be to "promote an equitable distribution of decision-making power and of resources, with particular attention to the number of poor, which unfortunately is increasing," the pope said June 14 at the Vatican.

The pope, who is preparing to release an encyclical on social and economic justice, said he wanted to remember in a special way the hundreds of millions of people who suffer from hunger.

"This is an absolutely unacceptable reality, and has been difficult to control despite the efforts of the past decades," he said, and that he hoped the upcoming U.N. conference and other international agencies would "make strategic choices — sometimes not easy to accept — that are necessary to assure basic nourishment and a dignified life for everyone, now and in the future."

The summit is aimed at identifying emergency and long-term responses to lessen the effects of the current economic crisis, especially on developing populations. It was expected to discuss transformation of international financial structures, a topic that has already prompted debate among nations.

Pope Benedict was preparing to publish his third encyclical, tentatively titled "Caritas in Veritate" ("Love in Truth"), in early July. It was expected to treat Catholic social teachings and apply them to a wide array of current problems, including poverty, war and environmental destruction.

Jobs, small business credit key for recovery, says Vatican official

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — More decent, productive employment and more credit for small- and medium-sized businesses are the best strategies for recovering from the global economic crisis, said the chief Vatican representative to U.N. agencies in Geneva.

There are real "fears that the coming years will be characterized by 'labor intensive restructuring' and a 'jobless recovery'" in which large corporations and stock markets will bounce back, but from which the world's workers will not benefit, said Archbishop Silvano Tomasi.

People need to turn the current crisis into an opportunity to reaffirm the importance of protecting people's dignity in the work world, "to encourage a lifestyle of sobriety, solidarity and responsibility; and to direct all economic activities to the common good," he said.

The archbishop made his comments June 10 during the International Labor Organization's annual international labor conference June 3-19 in Geneva.

As the global economy experiences its deepest downturn in 50 years, labor analysts predict the number of jobless persons around the world will increase by 50 million people, he said.

The archbishop said it was "an ethical requirement" for the international labor group to promote a "Global Jobs Pact" to stimulate job creation alongside other measures taken by world leaders to stimulate the economy and credit markets. The world has lost the sense that true value is derived from human labor, not just capital, he said.

"Productive work is at the base of the real economy rather than (financial) speculation that is prompted solely by greed for profit," he said.

The two avenues toward economic recovery that would be most effective and offer greater respect for human dignity would be to protect and expand employment and sustain small and medium-sized businesses, he said.

Smaller businesses are "particularly penalized by the severe credit crunch" today, he said, but since they account for such a large share of employment, inappropriate credit restrictions against them should be lifted so as to better support these firms.

"Decent work, then, is the main road to overcome the current crisis, a strategy that as well can create the conditions for a stable and lasting economic development," he said.

Local and national economies must look for ways to invest in people's creativity and talents, he said, and look for new "forms of participation in the system of production."

Music minister arrested, pastor resigns

ASHEVILLE — In recent weeks, St. Eugene Church in Asheville has been dealing with a resignation and a termination among its parish leaders.

Father John Schneider, pastor, resigned June 9 after being arrested and charged with obstruction of justice in a case involving a former parish employee.

The obstruction charge related to the deletion of files on the home computer of Paul Berrell, former parish music minister. In late May, Berrell was charged with taking indecent liberties with a minor. He was fired from his position shortly after his arrest, and is currently being held in the Buncombe County jail.

Bishop Jugis traveled to Asheville to meet with Father Schneider on the day of his resignation June 9, and with parish lay leaders and the Asheville Catholic School principal. The bishop said the sacramental life of the parish would not be interrupted by the events.

Jesuit Father Bill Ameche, in residence at the church until the end of July, will celebrate Masses. The parish pastoral council, in conjunction with Father Ameche and Deacon Michael Zboyovski, held a prayer and listening session at the parish June 17.

Bishop Jugis will celebrate a 7 p.m. healing Mass at the church June 23. A new pastor will be announced soon.

for sixth- through eighth-grade students of the parish to perform service work.

"This began in response to a need of the kids. They are required to do service work for school," said Poli. "It's much easier for high school students to find projects, but both the (younger) students and their parents were at a loss for ways to fill these service hours."

Poli's solution was to join the needs of the students and the community. The club has fostered relationships with local agencies.

"What we do is live by Mother Teresa's motto, 'Do small things with great love,'" said Poli.

At Christmas, club members spend a day purchasing presents for ARC of Buncombe County, which assists developmentally and intellectually challenged persons. During the year, the students hold a fundraiser to help the Asheville Humane Society, wrap Thanksgiving food donation boxes for the St. Vincent de Paul Society and work with the homebound of the parish.

Poli, adult volunteer Sheryl Peyton and several club members met June 6 to work at the church repairing books, cleaning classrooms and taking inventory of the supplies.

Two members, Patsy Hogoboom and Sylvia Porach, repaired books in their first service project with the club. As rising sixth-graders, they joined with Madeleine Hiriak, a veteran member, to scour the texts for damage.

"This is a good way to help the community and church," said Hiriak, a member of the National Junior Honor Society, for which service hours are a requirement.

"This is a nice, fun way to do this," she said.

"I'm a polio survivor and can't do some of the physical activities. With these projects, I can be personally involved," said Poli, while directing members Amy Rogers and Mary Elizabeth Williams, who gather supplies left in the classrooms throughout the year before beginning inventory.

As the members break for a snack, Poli acknowledged that the work they do provides joy — not only for the recipients, but also for the volunteers.

"They are learning how to be a community, and how a community can support a parish and a neighborhood," she said.

changes and perfects a priest," said Bishop Jugis, thus making "the commandment of the Lord possible — to love as he loves, to serve as he serves — because his love and grace have first been given to the priest, to purify and perfect him."

"Through the Lord's sanctifying grace, you become a sacrament of Christ the High Priest, capable of acting in the Person of Christ," Bishop Jugis told Deacon Roberts. "You are consecrated as a true priest of the New Testament to serve Christ the teacher, priest and shepherd."

"It was a powerful thing," said Father Roberts reflecting on the moment Bishop Jugis and priests of the diocese laid their hands on him during the Mass.

"My whole life has been preparation for this," he said.

Father Benjamin Roberts

Father Roberts was born in Charlotte and grew up in Lancaster, S.C., where he attended a Lutheran church.

Following high school, he began training to be a Lutheran minister. He studied Lutheran theology under the guidance of Rev. Andrew Weisner, campus pastor and chaplain at Lenoir-Rhyne College in Hickory.

Rev. Weisner introduced him to Father Conrad Kimbrough, a retired priest for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"Around the time that I started thinking about converting to Catholicism, I started thinking about the priesthood," recalled Father Roberts.

"Father Kimbrough was really helpful in helping to discern my vocation, not only by talking, but by showing what it means to be a priest," he said.

Father Roberts was received into the Catholic Church and confirmed by Father Peter Fitzgibbons at St. Philip the Apostle Church in Statesville Oct. 30, 1999.

After a year of working in a soup kitchen in inner city Chicago, Father Roberts entered the seminary under the Missionary Oblates of Mary Immaculate in Buffalo, N.Y., where he earned his undergraduate degree in philosophy from D'Youville College.

Priesthood candidate Benjamin Roberts lies prostrate before the altar during his ordination Mass at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte June 6. The congregation joined Bishop Peter J. Jugis (center) and visiting priests, deacons and seminarians in prayer for the church, its people and the priesthood candidate.

Next he entered his novitiate, a yearlong spiritual retreat in preparation for vows. During that time, Father Roberts discerned the call to become a parish priest. He left the novitiate in March 2005 and in August began formation for the Diocese of Charlotte at St. Charles Borromeo Seminary in Philadelphia, Pa.

Father Roberts has been assigned to St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro.

He said that he is looking forward most to performing sacramental ministry. "I love administering the sacraments," said Father Roberts, particularly "celebrating Mass and celebrating the sacrament of reconciliation."

"I always carry a purple stole," he said, a practice encouraged by one of his mentors. "The sacrament of reconciliation is that important."

Ordination Mass

Concelebrants of the ordination Mass at St. Patrick Cathedral included Abbot Placid Solari of Belmont Abbey; Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor; Father Christopher Gober, diocesan vocations director; Father Robert McDermott, dean of men at St. Charles Borromeo Seminary; and priests serving in the Diocese of Charlotte. Also in attendance was Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin.

During the rite of ordination, Father Roberts promised to fulfill the office of the priesthood. Kneeling, he placed his hands between Bishop Jugis' hands in a promise of obedience to him and to his successors.

The congregation was invited to join in prayer for the church, its people and the priesthood candidate as he lay prostrate before the altar.

During the rite's most solemn moment, Father Roberts knelt before Bishop Jugis, who laid his hands on his head. The celebration of the sacrament of holy orders was completed as the bishop extended his hands over the kneeling candidate and prayed the prayer of consecration.

Father Roberts was then vested with a stole and chasuble, outer garments of the priestly office. Bishop Jugis anointed his hands with sacred chrism and he was then presented with a chalice and paten, signifying his role as celebrant of the Eucharist.

The newly ordained Father Roberts then joined his brother priests to concelebrate the Mass, thus opening a new chapter in his life.

continued in the priest," said Father Roberts. "That is a truly humbling experience."

"It is in this beautiful experience of the great mercy of God that he has called me to share in his life in this way," he said.

Peaceful reflections

Contemplative living, nonviolence explored at seminar

BY KATHLEEN HEALY SCHMIEDER
CORRESPONDENT

MAGGIE VALLEY — The life and legacy of Trappist Father Thomas Merton were explored during a daylong seminar on peace and nonviolence.

Father Merton was a man who left "the solitude of the monastery and became the conscience of the peace movement in the '60s," said J. Patrick Mahon during his presentation at Living Waters Catholic Reflection Center in Maggie Valley May 30.

Mahon, a member of Pax Christi USA and peace activist, focused on Father Merton's spiritual writings during his presentation at the seminar, entitled "Contemplative Living and Nonviolence: Thomas Merton."

"I was always an 'in-your-face' activist," said Mahon. "The contemplative grounding in Merton is making me more mellow."

More than 30 people attended the seminar.

"We want to do anything that would help the people," said Augustinian Brother Bill Harkin, director of Living Waters.

"We feel as Augustinians, our ministry is to open any thoughts that can include the spiritual part of a Catholic," he said.

Father Merton was used as a prime example for contemplative living and the practice of nonviolence to achieve a path to understanding others and working toward peace.

Born in France in 1915, Father Merton's experiences during World War II and the loss of his parents brought about a search for purpose. In 1941 at age 26, he left a rather wayward life behind to join the Trappist monks at the Abbey of Gethsemani in Kentucky.

He was soon recognized as one of America's foremost writers on spirituality, following the 1948 publication of his best-selling autobiography, "The Seven Storey Mountain."

After achieving fame for his writings, Father Merton later admitted there were several things, particularly in "The Seven Storey Mountain," he wished he could rewrite. As his contemplative years continued, said Mahon, Father Merton's thoughts took on deeper understanding and compassion for his fellow man.

Father Merton realized the contemplative life of a Christian monk is not meant to center on an individual's spiritual state. Instead, it is meant to focus on the larger, contemporary concerns of the world.

His belief that nonviolence was a necessary way of life grew more certain, said Mahon, and his works and passion for peace found ready followers among a generation filled with conflicting feelings about an ever-shrinking world during a time of global tension and an unpopular war.

"There are a lot of parallels between the Cold War of the '50s and '60s and today with modern terrorism," said Mahon.

But Father Merton was not an absolute pacifist, noted Mahon. He said the monk admitted "I can see situations where we must defend ourselves."

It was during his time in Kentucky that Father Merton reached an epiphany on a street corner, said Mahon. Observing the activity and daily lives of those around him, Father Merton realized it was in the everyday encounters with people that Christ was ever present.

"We must recognize we are all one with God, in that ground of love, ground of being," said Mahon, reflecting on the teachings of Merton. "We must be aware of the evil in ourselves and work on what we have."

Father George Kloster, pastor of St. William Church in Murphy and Immaculate Heart of Mary Mission in Hayesville, was involved in organizing the seminar.

"It's important to set aside a day to reflect," said Father Kloster.

"We need to apply these teachings to issues of our own day, not only to the violence of war, but also to such things as domestic violence. We need to see the significance of nonviolence and move more in that direction," he said.

Bishop Jugis blesses new parish activity center water during the ceremony.

In his remarks, the bishop said the eucharistic celebration, in the church "just above you," is the center of parish life.

The Eucharist is to be lived in fellowship in the center and in the wider world, he said.

The bishop then headed up the sidewalk to meet with the 13 young people about to be confirmed that day. Parishioners celebrated, complete with cake, in the center after the confirmation Mass.

Work on the 4,000-square-foot parish center began about three months after the church was dedicated, as money became available to complete the project. It includes a gathering space for 250 to 300 people, a kitchen, conference room and two classrooms.

Parishioners did much of the work, installing dry wall and flooring, and painting the rooms. They made two trips to pick up a conference table and 10 upholstered high-backed swivel chairs that the Catholic Conference Center near Hickory donated.

The parish's Women's Circle held several fundraising events to provide kitchen equipment.

Father Larry LoMonaco, pastor, said later that he was "very relieved" that the center is finished.

"It turned out even better than I expected," he said.

St. John the Evangelist Church's next construction phase will involve the building of a bell tower containing an elevator, thus allowing inside access between the church and parish center.

A parishioner who is an architect has agreed to design the bell tower free of charge.

IN OUR SCHOOLS

Diocesan schools working to achieve new level of accreditation

CHARLOTTE — Catholic schools in the Diocese of Charlotte are embarking on a process to acquire a new level of accreditation.

The 18 schools are seeking District Accreditation, a relatively new form of accreditation available to school systems through AdvancED.

AdvancED is the unified organization of the Commission on International and Transregional Accreditation, North Central Association Commission on Accreditation and School Improvement, and Southern Association of Colleges and Schools Council on Accreditation and School Improvement (SACS CASI), through which Catholic schools in the Diocese of Charlotte are currently accredited.

Formed in 2006, AdvancED represents 27,000 public and private schools and districts across the United States and in 65 countries worldwide and educating 15 million students.

The accreditation process is designed to help schools and districts continuously improve through a unified, clear and powerful approach, according to AdvancED's Web site. The process is based on a five-year term accreditation that provides ongoing external checks, support and feedback, it says.

While all 18 diocesan schools have been evaluated regularly by SACS CASI and have successfully maintained full accreditation, AdvancED's District Accreditation adds additional requirements and sets a higher standard, according to Mike Ford, marketing director for the Diocese of Charlotte's Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools system.

"Achieving accreditation at the district level will verify that, as a diocese, we set a high standard for all of our schools and we have plans in place to ensure continued improvement," he said. "It will also ensure, at the same time, that all of our individual schools continue their levels of commitment to excellence with a plan in place for continued improvement."

A diocesan steering committee comprised of school and diocesan staff has been formed to work with the schools toward achieving District Accreditation by spring of 2010.

"It is another step toward making our Catholic schools in the diocese the best that they can be," said Ford.

Bringing the Abbey to the city

Belmont Abbey College to offer adult classes in Charlotte this fall

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — A new option for Catholic adults seeking continuing education is coming to Charlotte.

Belmont Abbey College will begin offering classes for their Adult Degree Program at Charlotte Catholic High School beginning this fall.

The program will offer degrees in business and education, and plans are underway to offer a liberal studies major beginning January 2010. A criminal justice major is another possibility.

"At last, here's an opportunity for Catholic adults who want to earn their college degrees and improve their lives to do so at a college that shares their Catholic values," said Ed Jones, marketing director at Belmont Abbey College.

"Our program allows them to get their degrees by coming to classes just two nights a week," he said.

Classes will be offered in eight-week sessions on Tuesday and Thursday nights. The idea for expanding to the Charlotte market came after a recent surge of growth within the program, which originated at the Sacred Heart College campus in 1979.

"The Adult Degree Program had around 380 students in 2007," said Lucas Lamadrid, vice president for enrollment management and student affairs at Belmont Abbey College. "Right now, the program has around 760 students."

The goal for the inaugural class at the Charlotte campus is 200 students. As of June 14, 109 applications had been received, according to Jones.

"The Charlotte campus is really exciting for us," said Bill Thierfelder, president of Belmont Abbey College in a recent interview with David Hains, communications director for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"I think this is a great opportunity for people to do something that is very close by and hopefully very convenient for them," he said.

Charlotte is a highly-competitive market for adult degree programs, but this is the first program offered by a Catholic college.

"There are eight to 10 well-established adult degree programs offered within a 10-mile radius of Charlotte Catholic High School, so we knew we had to do and say something different to stand out," said Jones.

"What better way to do that than to subtly emphasize our Catholic, Benedictine educational heritage of educating the whole person," he said.

It is that focus on educating the whole person through mind, body and spirit that sets this program apart from the others.

"We follow the Catholic intellectual tradition which says there is no conflict between faith and reason," said Thierfelder.

"We stand for the Catholic faith, we follow the teachings of the church and we do it with joy," he said.

Book says young women attracted to orders whose members wear habits

BY ROXANNE KING
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

DENVER — While the last 40 years have seen an overall drop in the numbers of women entering religious life, a new book released by the Council of Major Superiors of Women Religious says orders that are more visibly countercultural seem to be flourishing.

The council represents the superiors of more than 100 religious communities of sisters whose members wear an identifiable religious habit. A canonically approved organization founded in 1992 to promote religious life in the United States, the council notes that the average age of its member communities' sisters is under 35.

The book, titled "The Foundations of Religious Life: Revisiting the Vision," is a project of the council. It explores why the orders represented by the council are gaining numbers and how they are living out the vision of consecrated life described by the Second Vatican Council.

The book, released May 16, consists of essays written by six religious sisters representing five orders. The topics they address are: religious consecration, the spousal bond, the threefold response to vows, communion in community, and mission.

The Washington-based council is one of the two major organizations representing heads of women's religious orders in the United States. The other is the Leadership Conference of Women Religious.

"We wanted to write something that says, 'This is who we are and why we live this way,'" said Sister Prudence Allen, a Religious Sister of Mercy of Alma, Mich., who wrote the book's chapter on community life.

The other authors are: Mother Agnes Mary Donovan, a founding member of the Sisters of Life; Sister Mary Elizabeth Wusinich, also a Sister of Life; Sister Paula Jean Miller, a Franciscan Sister of the Eucharist; Sister Mary Dominic Pitts, a Dominican Sister of St. Cecilia in Nashville, Tenn.; and Sister M. Maximilia Um, a Sister of St. Francis of the Martyr St. George.

The introduction and conclusion were written by two canon lawyers, Sister Mary Judith O'Brien, formerly of St. John Vianney Theological Seminary in Denver, and Sister Mary Nika Schaumber. Both are Religious Sisters of Mercy of Alma, Mich.

"The book seeks to answer the question of why religious institutes are needed in today's society," Sister Allen told the Denver Catholic Register, newspaper of the Denver Archdiocese.

"We're hoping everyone will read it and love it," she added with a laugh.

Sister Allen is a professor of philosophy at St. John Vianney Theological Seminary in Denver and author of the multivolume work "The Concept of Woman."

Other religious sisters of the Denver Archdiocese who belong to the Council of Major Superiors of Women Religious joined Sister Allen's interview with the Denver Catholic Register to discuss their enthusiasm for the book.

Young women want to be challenged to live the religious life, said Nashville Dominican Sister Mary Gertrude, principal of St. Vincent de Paul School in Denver. The Nashville Dominicans are among the orders experiencing the greatest success attracting new vocations, according to news reports.

"It's very much a radical call to live and give yourself completely to Christ," she said. "There is a real identify to who we are and what we are about."

"We want to put religious life in front of young women today," said Mother Paul Magyar, superior of the Little Sisters of the Poor, who operate Mullen Home for the Aged in Denver.

She said the new book also should affirm existing vocations.

"I think it will help to strengthen the religious vocation that is already there," she added. The book shows that "we are faithful and happy in our vocation."

God's healing powers evident in world

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

In today's Gospel we read about the woman healed of 12 years of hemorrhaging by touching Jesus' clothes.

The passage from Mark 5 also tells us how Jesus brought back to life the daughter of the synagogue official, though the crowd ridiculed him, even as he entered her home to wake her from what they said was death, but what Jesus himself spoke of as sleep.

Catholics believe that Jesus continues his work of physical healing through the sacraments and in answer to the prayers of believers.

The church believes this so strongly that to certify that healings are of a miraculous nature, it has established an elaborate and tight process using medical and other authorities to rule out other possible explanations.

But there are lesser miracles, interventions by God that will never be subject to such scrutiny, but are nonetheless evidence of his continuing care, demonstrating his active presence in our lives.

Many of us have seen these lesser "miracles" in our own lives. We pray with someone who has a back problem and later they say they felt their back pop into place during the prayer.

We join in prayer with others and find that an older gentleman we have prayed over experienced a long period of relief from joint pain and stiffness.

Or we have felt the benefit of prayer, as I did, during and after the first of my two brain surgeries in November of 2003.

Two days after my neurosurgeon removed an egg-sized hemangioblastoma (benign) from the sensitive skull base region of my brain, he came into my room to find me sitting up in bed, having a lively conversation with my wife.

The doctor and his assistant both wore bemused looks as they approached my bed in intensive care.

In answer to my question, "Did I do well?" he responded, "You did spectacular!"

And while I am grateful to my surgeon for the four hours he operated on me, I'm even more grateful to God and the large network of people who were praying for me and my family, for the rather amazing recovery that followed.

Prior to and after the surgery, my wife and I felt the prayer that surrounded us. It was like being surrounded by concentric circles of love, palpable love.

God's grace does become manifest in his world. It is, after all, his world.

Questions:

Have you experienced God's healing touch in your own life? Why do you think God would want to continue to demonstrate his power to an unbelieving world?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"He said to her, 'Daughter, your faith has saved you. Go in peace and be cured of your affliction'" (Mark 5:34).

'God on the Go'

Catholic combines faith, high-tech savvy to invent new Bible format

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — One of the oldest and most read books in the world now has a new, high-tech look. And it weighs only 5 grams, or one-hundredth of a pound.

"God on the Go" is a USB flash drive containing the complete Bible in the New Revised Standard Version or the New Testament of the New American Bible. It is currently available only for PCs but a Mac-compatible version is expected out this summer.

Inventor Mark Mastroianni, a member of St. Edna Church in Arlington Heights, Ill., said the idea for "God on the Go" came to him in prayer when he was asking God how he could bring together his Catholic faith and his background in technology and product development.

"Why not combine the Bible with commonly used and readily accessible technological platforms?" he recalled thinking.

After months of research and talks with the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, which holds the U.S. copyright on the New American Bible, "God on the Go" was born.

Mastroianni was pleased to learn that the device also offers the ecologically aware a "green" alternative to the printed Bible, since the thin pages of most Bibles require the use of a specialty ink that is "very toxic to users and in the manufacturing process."

"God on the Go" also has special appeal for the millennial generation, no longer used to reading the printed word and instead accustomed to getting all their information in front of a computer screen, he said.

The USB flash drive offers a number of advantages over a hefty version of the printed Bible, Mastroianni said.

It can be carried around on a key chain, and because the Bible only takes up 10 percent of the space on the flash drive, the user can add his or her own photos, songs or important documents to carry along with the Bible.

It also includes a verse/subject index, allows users to bookmark favorite passages and can take users directly to the daily New American Bible readings on the USCCB Web site.

Mastroianni worked with Dominican Father Jordan Kelly, director of the Office of Evangelization in the Archdiocese of Chicago, on the project "almost from day one" and pilot tested "God on the Go" with a group of students at Marian Catholic High School in Chicago Heights during the fall semester of 2008.

The "feature that got the greatest response" from the 200 sophomores who tested it, according to Mastroianni, was a "mini-concordance" which gives users the ability to scroll through a list of feelings and to be linked to a Bible passage relevant to that emotion.

"I never thought the Bible could be this cool," he reported one student as saying.

Through www.4Marks.com, a Catholic social networking site, users of "God on the Go" also can trade their lists of favorite Bible passages with their friends.

The device can also be customized for group sales to parishes, schools and universities, Mastroianni said.

"The face of the physical drive can be etched" with a name or logo, he added.

Mastroianni hopes to have the full New American Bible available on a "God on the Go" device by sometime next year, pending the U.S. bishops' and Vatican approval of a new translation of the Old Testament.

Perpetual adoration anniversary celebrated

Poor Servants of the Mother of God.

"We are celebrating the real presence of Jesus in the Eucharist," Bishop Curlin said during his homily.

Perpetual adoration is the practice of exposing the Eucharist 24 hours a day, seven days a week. Volunteers are recruited from within the community and beyond to be present in the chapel at all hours of the day and night.

"A lot of our residents participate, but it also brings in a lot of people from off campus," said Edward Cordick,

Pennybyrn public relations director. "It makes this a very special place."

"We feel Christ's living presence through adoration of the Blessed Sacrament," said Sister Philo, a Sister of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul in High Point.

"It is a constant reminder of Christ, and a place where one comes to receive, healing," said Tom Burke, a parishioner of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point, who has been volunteering at the chapel for 15 years.

"Contrary to public opinion, there are a lot of religious people willing to keep the chapel manned 24/7," he said.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis celebrated Mass and led a eucharistic procession there to celebrate the 10th anniversary in 2004. Bishop Curlin said he was happy to return for the 15th anniversary.

"I believe the perpetual adoration chapel has enriched our diocese with immeasurable blessings," said Bishop Curlin in an interview. "It was an honor to officiate at its beginning, and an honor to see its continued growth."

"The challenge for us today," he said during his homily, "is not just to see Jesus in the tabernacle, but to bring him out with us to all the suffering people of the world."

Contrary action to Christ's teachings

Abortionist's murder in a church on Pentecost is sacrilegious

A notorious abortion provider was shot to death while ushering at a service in his Lutheran church on Pentecost Sunday by a person who, believing abortion is murder, found it right to murder the abortionist.

While holding no love for Dr. George Tiller, the notorious abortion clinic operator in Wichita, Kan., his murder in a church, especially on this day, is sacrilegious.

It is an insult to the pro-life cause and will pollute the debate at a time when the cause seems to be gaining in public favor.

The only way to prevail in a democracy is to win over a plurality of the public. This is where the battle is to be won, not in demonizing the opposition, not in vitriolic name-calling.

This murder was in no way a victory for the pro-life cause, for humanity. That the victim was doing evil things is no justification. The murder was morally and tactically wrong.

Tiller was a leading provider of late-term abortions in his Wichita clinic, which for years was the site of prayer vigils and demonstrations. Protesters blockaded Tiller's clinic during Operation Rescue's "Summer of Mercy" protests during the summer of 1991, and Tiller was shot and wounded in both arms at his clinic in 1993.

The clinic was bombed in June 1986 and was severely vandalized last month.

Just as Tiller was the symbol of the evil of abortion, so his killer will be used as an icon by those who use any excuse to attack religion.

Within hours of his death, the blogosphere was filled with the unmoderated, unmediated and uncharitable comments by those who want to portray the pro-life movement as hypocritical and by those saying Tiller got what he deserved.

Both are wrong.

"Our bishops' conference and all its members have repeatedly and publicly denounced all forms of violence in our society, including abortion as well as the misguided resort to violence by anyone opposed to abortion," said Philadelphia Cardinal Justin Rigali, chair of the U.S. bishops' pro-life committee, in a statement.

"Such killing is the opposite of everything we stand for, and everything we want our culture to stand for: respect for the life of each and every human being from its beginning to its natural end," he said.

Yet there are those who still don't get it, such as Randall Terry, founder of

Consider This

STEPHEN KENT
CNS COLUMNIST

Operation Rescue, who was arrested by federal agents during a 1991 protest in front of Tiller's office.

Said Terry: "But even Mr. Tiller, like other murderers, deserved a trial of his peers, and a legal execution, not vigilante justice."

So rather than being killed by an assassin, Terry felt Tiller should have been killed by execution. Where is the respect for life in that statement?

Whether it is by beheading, by suicide bombing or by gunfire, killing for a belief is wrong, especially when the reason is protection of life. Saying Tiller got what was coming to him is as reprehensible as charging religion with killing in God's name.

Contributing to the incendiary language is not helpful.

The 51-year-old assailant was charged with first-degree murder in Tiller's death. More than a decade ago, he became involved with anti-government groups, and then became "very religious in an Old Testament, eye-for-an-eye way," his former wife said.

He and his kind may believe in an eye for an eye. Christ taught to the contrary.

The 'hinge of salvation'

Catholicism has healthy view of flesh, sexuality

Recent legislation proposed in the North Carolina General Assembly reminds Catholics that parents are the primary educators of their children.

The Healthy Youth Act, scheduled to be voted on by the N.C. Senate June 18 and opposed by both Catholic bishops in North Carolina, would mandate comprehensive sexual education for students in N.C. public schools.

While the bishops favor the options of curricula based on abstinence-until-marriage or no sex education at all, it is important to understand that the bishops, and the Catholic Church, do not hold a negative view of sexuality in general.

When parents ponder what to say to their children on matters of sexuality, the first point of clarification should be that human sexuality is very good.

Many Christians, tragically, grow up believing that their bodies are "bad" and are obstacles to spirituality. While desires of the flesh can be disordered, let us not forget that as Christians we believe everything God created is "very good" (Genesis 1:31).

The idea that the human body is bad is actually a heresy, called Manichaeism. The Gnostic prophet Manichaeus condemned the body and all things sexual because he believed the material world was the source of evil.

Our sex-saturated culture has failed to see how valuable the body and sex really are. As the Catechism of the Catholic Church states: "The flesh is the hinge of salvation. We believe in God who is creator of the flesh; we believe in the Word made flesh in order to redeem the flesh; we believe in the resurrection of the flesh ..." (n. 1015).

Indeed, the fact that our God created us and became one of us makes our bodies very special.

As popular Catholic speaker Christopher West likes to say, the Catholic faith is a "very fleshy, sensual religion." We most intimately encounter God through our bodily senses and through material means.

The catechism explains: "As a being at once body and spirit, man expresses and perceives spiritual realities through physical signs and symbols" (n. 1146).

For example, in baptism the body is bathed with water and anointed with oil. In holy Communion, we consume the Body and Blood of Christ. Holy orders are conferred by the laying on of hands. And marriage is consummated by the "one flesh" union of spouses. In this complete gift of themselves, spouses experience a union that is sacred, because it images the love of God.

It is clear, then, that Christianity does not hold a negative view of sexuality.

Adcock is natural family planning program director for Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte.

Year for Priests important for everyone

We must not forget all that priests do for their flocks

Last weekend I had the honor of attending the priestly ordination of Father Benjamin Roberts.

I love ordinations. They are such joyous occasions, not only for the newly ordained and his family, but for the entire church family.

It is a ceremony that is steeped in tradition and showcases the beauty and solemnity of our faith.

Aside from witnessing the new priest profess his vows, the part that I enjoy most is seeing all of the priests from across the diocese, present on the altar for the celebration of the Eucharist. It is a powerful thing to see so many priests standing together, united in prayer.

Our church consists of a unique melding of individuals united as a eucharistic family. We are one in the Body of Christ.

But as members of the church on earth, we are human and, as such, we are flawed and susceptible to the tarnish of sin — priests included.

Unfortunately, the sinful actions of a few have repercussions that fall on the shoulders of the many.

Pope Benedict XVI recently announced that June 19, the solemnity of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, marks the beginning of the Year for Priests to emphasize the important role of priests in the mission of the church.

In an appearance on a recent episode of Vatican Television's "Octava Dies," Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, director of the Vatican press office, reflected on the upcoming Year for Priests and on the importance of supporting priests through prayer and maintaining spiritual solidarity as a church family.

"If the problem of union with God confronts all Christians, it especially confronts priests, who are sought after by everyone at all times and whose number is diminishing or remains small in the face of all the demands," Father Lombardi observed.

"Obviously, the holiness of priests is first of all their responsibility, but it also concerns the whole community of the faithful. It only takes a few unworthy priests to profoundly harm the credibility of the church," he said.

When members of our church community fall short of our expectations, I am always saddened by those individuals who allow the incident to negatively impact their own faith lives.

The Catholic Church is bigger than any one individual and we must not allow the failings of the few to pull us away from our union with the whole church family.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, we are blessed to have 75 active diocesan priests, 54 religious priests and 25 retired priests.

celebrate marriage and baptize new members into the church. They give talks and attend meetings. They volunteer with our youths and they visit the elderly.

And their desire to do all of this and more stems from a deep and profound calling to love and serve the Lord and his people.

Each has been chosen by God and has accepted the call. Every day they sacrifice their own personal wants and needs for the good of the church and the people they serve.

As laity our role is to support them in their mission to serve the church.

"The spiritual solidarity of the community is a powerful support for their spiritual and apostolic life," Father Lombardi said. "In sum, the Year for Priests is important not only for priests, but for everyone."

With that in mind, let us not forget the countless sacrifices that our priests make for us on a regular basis. Let us remember that as they continue to guide and shepherd their flocks, they depend on our prayers and continued support.

And let us allow this Year for Priests to serve as an opportunity for us to show our appreciation for our priests here in the Diocese of Charlotte.

People must hear Gospel, praise God in their own language, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Gospel message cannot be fully part of people's lives unless it has been faithfully translated into their language and is reflected in their culture, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Talking about the life and mission of Sts. Cyril and Methodius, ninth-century brothers and missionaries, the pope said the two recognized that although the Slavic people of Central Europe had embraced Christianity and were baptized, the people needed to hear the Gospel and praise God in their own language.

At his weekly general audience June 17 in St. Peter's Square, Pope Benedict said the two brothers not only helped invent an alphabet for the Slavonic language — an alphabet now known as Cyrillic in honor of one of the brothers — but they also carried out a theological battle against what is known as the "Trilingual Heresy."

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

As we continue our catechesis on the early Christian writers of the East and the West, we now turn to the brothers Sts. Cyril and Methodius.

They were born in Thessalonica in the early ninth century. Cyril, whose baptismal name was Constantine, was educated at the Byzantine Court, ordained a priest and became an acclaimed teacher of sacred and profane sciences. When his brother Michael became a monk, taking the name of Methodius, Cyril also decided to embrace the monastic life.

Having retrieved the relics of Pope Clement I during a mission in Crimea, the brothers successfully preached Christianity to the people of Moravia. Inventing an alphabet for the Slavonic language, they together with their disciples translated the liturgy, the Bible and texts of the Fathers, shaping the culture of the Slav peoples and leaving an outstanding example of "inculturation."

Pope Adrian II received them in Rome and encouraged their missionary work. When Cyril died in Rome in 869, Methodius continued the mission in spite of persecution. After his death in 885, some of his disciples, providentially released from slavery, spread the Gospel in Bulgaria and in "the Land of the Rus."

In recognition of the brothers' vast influence, they were named co-patrons of Europe by Pope John Paul II. May we imitate their strong faith and their Christian wisdom as we bear witness to the Gospel in our daily lives!

Life lessons for the Class of 2009

I can hardly believe it: My oldest son just graduated from high school!

It seems like yesterday that my wife and I were changing Joe's diapers. I know it's a cliché, but time sure does fly. And these are not just my thoughts: Countless moms, dads and guardians are expressing similar sentiments all around the world.

So what words of wisdom can we give to our new graduates?

While I'm sure you have gems of your own, allow me to share with you a few of the thoughts I gave to my newly graduated son.

"Congratulations! You should be proud of yourself. You have worked hard; you hung in there, even when things were difficult. That shows real character. Because when it's tough, it's easy to quit.

"It's always easier to walk away from problems, rather than work to resolve them. But the easy way is rarely the best way. Hard work and determination are essential ingredients to successful outcomes.

"This lesson is foundational, because while life is filled with many joys, it also is filled with many difficulties — especially if you continue to nurture a sensitivity to the sufferings of others both locally and globally.

"However, feeling empathy for others who are hurting is not enough. It's just the beginning, not the end. Hard, determined work must follow.

"If life on this planet is to have meaning, it must be put at the service of others — with a very special emphasis on the unborn, poor, hungry and those affected by war.

"But much in our culture does not encourage such care and selflessness toward our fellow human beings. Our consumer-oriented society continuously urges us to buy things we simply do not need, at the terrible price of ignoring the hunger and poverty of billions of fellow human beings.

"So be alert. Don't let the tempting, self-centered part of our culture grab hold of you. Don't let it numb you toward the sufferings of so many. Rather, set your sights on selfless service.

"The great humanitarian Dr. Albert Schweitzer said, 'I don't know what your destiny will be, but one thing I do know: The only ones among you who will be really happy are those who have sought and found how to serve.'

"Finally, on my bookcase, you know I have a little plaque that reads: 'Put God in the center — and everything will come together.' This is the single most important piece of advice I can give.

Making a Difference

"For a nation, a church, a marriage, a family, a single human life will never experience true wisdom, unity, peace and joy unless God is at the center.

"And the essence of the one true God is love. 'Love' is a verb; it is action-oriented. It works for the good of others. And by actively loving others, we prove and experience our love for God — and thus allow him to dwell at our center.

"Be determined to make a difference! Make sure that the world is a better place because of the love that you put into action.

"The late, great archbishop of Paris, Cardinal Emmanuel Celestin Suhard, once said, 'The world will belong to those who love it!'

"Graduation should not bring an end to education. Rather, it should encourage a lifelong adventure of learning, especially learning how to love more deeply.

"A life filled with love is each person's final exam. Please God, may we all graduate with flying colors!"

According to Jesuit Father John Kavanaugh, professor of Philosophy at St. Louis University, by age 75 the average American will have spent 14 years of his or her life watching television. Of those, four years will have been spent watching commercials alone.

Fortunately, a pro-life media apostolate is taking advantage of those statistics to use the media as a tool for promoting godly virtues and the sanctity of life.

SAN ANTONIO (CNS) — Liturgical matters, immigration reform and same-sex marriage were among the topics discussed by the U.S. bishops in public sessions at their June 17-19 spring meeting in San Antonio.

But the bishops also devoted time — in executive session — to the recent controversy over the University of Notre Dame's decision to award an honorary degree to U.S. President Barack Obama. They emerged from the meeting with a two-sentence affirmation of Bishop John M. D'Arcy of Fort Wayne-South Bend, Ind., for his "pastoral concern" for the university.

GROWING TOGETHER

Rafaela Garcia works in a garden at St. Alexander Church in Cornelius, Ore., in early May. Providing places where low-income or apartment-dwelling parishioners can grow their own produce has become increasingly popular within parish communities.

Parishes' gardens help struggling families grow own food

CORNELIUS, Ore. (CNS) — Farming feels like home for many families tending plots in St. Alexander Church's community garden.

"This is helpful for them," said Alejandro Tecum, as he signaled toward the half-dozen people digging and planting next door to the church in Cornelius. "Most of them came from the countryside in Mexico. They love to work the soil because they were doing that since they were children."

Providing places where low-income or apartment-dwelling parishioners can grow their own produce has become increasingly popular within parish communities. With climbing grocery prices and the bad economy, many families are finding it more and more difficult to get healthy food on the table.

Tecum is the micro-enterprise program coordinator for Adelante Mujeres, a nonprofit that aims to educate and empower immigrants. He shares sustainable farming practices with participants so they are able to grow their own organic food. The nonprofit also manages a farmers' market where participants can supplement their incomes by selling food.

When leaders at St. Alexander Church decided to build a garden, they didn't have to go far to find a project supervisor. Tecum also is a parishioner.

Concepcion Giron has used the information imparted by Tecum to plant onions, tomatoes, peppers and other fresh crops in the church's garden. Last year, Giron sold her extra produce after Mass at a table outside the church.

Tomasa Yanez uses her summer and fall bounty, which includes cucumbers, string beans and pumpkins, to make salads, tamales and other family favorites. She freezes her leftover crops to feed her family during the winter.

Liv Gifford, project manager for the Corvallis Interfaith Food and Farm Partnership, a program of Ecumenical Ministries of Oregon, has noted a shift in beliefs about food.

"I don't hear as often now 'Oh, they're low-income; I don't think high-quality local food is for them. They need to buy what's cheap,'" she said. "Gardening really helps remind people that good food is a human right."

St. Mary Church in Corvallis participates in a community garden at the Westside Community Church. Volunteers use a 500-square-foot plot to grow food for the parish's food pantry and soup kitchen. Plans also are under way for an organic produce cooperative.

Recently, Ecumenical Ministries coordinated a workshop to assist congregations in starting their own gardens. Two Portland parishes signed up and a third parish and its school were in the beginning phases of planning a community garden.

In Mount Angel, St. Mary Church has revived an old tradition called "solidarity gardens" to distribute fresh produce to parishioners in need.

Benedictine Father Philip Waibel, pastor, said farmers and gardeners bring in excess produce from their crops to be placed on a sharing table before Masses.

"We don't have space here at the parish, so we're asking people with their own gardens to be in solidarity with those who are in need and who can benefit from this," Father Waibel said.

Climate bill must have ample funding to help poor adapt, letter says

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A U.S. bishop and the head of Catholic Relief Services called on Congress to ensure "the poorest people and countries on earth" have adequate financial assistance to help them adapt to the effects of climate change.

Bishop Howard J. Hubbard of Albany, N.Y., chairman of the bishops' Committee on International Justice and Peace, and Ken Hackett, CRS president, made the comment in a June 22 letter to Congress on behalf of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

On June 25, the House was scheduled to vote on national climate change legislation called the American Clean Energy and Security Act. Bishop Hubbard and Hackett said in general they were encouraged by the measure's provisions aimed at protecting the poor and vulnerable at home and abroad in the latest climate change legislation.

They said they approved of "mechanisms put in place to provide adaptation assistance for poor and vulnerable populations internationally. However, we are deeply disappointed that the funding resources committed to international adaptation fall fundamentally short of what is needed initially and that additional increases in resources are pushed too far off into the future."

"Congress cannot leave the most vulnerable people without adequate help needed to protect their lives and dignity," they said, calling it "a matter of moral priority and policy."

"Addressing global climate change is both urgent and necessary. House consideration of this groundbreaking legislation begins a serious and overdue effort to face up to moral and environmental challenges and represents an important beginning," they said.

They noted that CRS is "already experiencing the tragic consequences of climate change in the lives of people living in poverty" in the more than 100 countries where the agency works.

Pope offers support to U.N. campaign to end use of child soldiers

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI offered his public support to the United Nations' efforts to prevent the recruitment and deployment of child soldiers and said he prays each day for suffering children around the world.

At the end of his weekly general audience June 24, the pope greeted Radhika Coomaraswamy, the U.N. secretary-general's representative for children and armed conflict, who was accompanied by Grace Akallo and Kon Kelei, former child soldiers.

The pope told the group he had deep "appreciation for the commitment to defend child victims of violence and weapons."

"I remember all the children of the world, especially those who are exposed to fear, abandonment, hunger, abuse, sickness and death. The pope is close to all of these little victims and remembers them always in his prayers," he said.

After meeting Pope Benedict, the group spoke at a conference on the need to increase protection for children in times of war and to provide comprehensive rehabilitation programs to children who have been forced to take up arms.

At the conference sponsored by the Rome-based Community of Sant'Egidio, Coomaraswamy said her office estimates there are about 250,000 children currently used as soldiers, in wars and guerrilla conflicts around the world.

"Communities of faith are communications networks," she said.

They are a key part of an "early warning system" sharing and giving information about kidnappings or murders of children, educating parents and children about the dangers of recruitment ploys and in making sure that church-run schools are "safe zones."

Pope signs first encyclical on social themes to serve common good

VATICAN CITY — For more than 100 years, Catholic social teaching has tried to help people face the world's social, political and economic challenges with the power of the Gospel.

Pope Benedict XVI announced June 29 that he had signed his first formal contribution to the list of papal encyclical letters on social themes and that it was titled "Caritas in Veritate" ("Love in Truth"). Although dated June 29, the letter was expected to be released July 7.

The pope said his letter would look at modern problems in the field of promoting development, and he asked for prayers for "this latest contribution that the church offers humanity in its commitment for sustainable progress in full respect for human dignity and the real needs of all."

Instead of focusing on theological beliefs, the social encyclicals written by most modern-day popes have tried to shape the way Christians and all people of good will can better serve the common good. Each social encyclical was unique in that it sought to respond to the most pressing social realities at the time.

Anticipating his first social encyclical, Pope Benedict said it would offer "a beautiful response" to the new realities and changes that had occurred since "Centesimus Annus" was promulgated 18 years ago.

Pope Benedict also said the publication of the document was delayed by the eruption of one of the worst global economic crises in decades. He said he wanted to update what he had drafted so the document would deal thoroughly with the current crisis and offer "a more adequate response" to the world's financial woes.

Catholic Common Ground Initiative honors Sister Carol Keehan

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The Catholic Common Ground Initiative presented its annual Cardinal Joseph Bernardin Award June 26 to Sister Carol Keehan, a Daughter of Charity who is president and CEO of the Catholic Health Association.

Sister Keehan was selected because of "her extraordinary contributions to creating common ground between church leaders and government officials, organized labor and Catholic health care providers, the rich and the poor," according to the citation presented to her in a brief ceremony at The Catholic University of America in Washington.

It praised Sister Keehan for her efforts to achieve national health care reform and for her work on a recent document by representatives of Catholic health care, the labor movement and the U.S. bishops' conference setting principles designed to ensure a fair process as health care workers decide whether to join a union.

from the bishops in San Antonio were a Spanish-language Lectionary and a Mass in Thanksgiving for the Gift of Human Life.

The Mass for life, first proposed nearly 20 years ago by Cardinal John J. O'Connor of New York, passed by a 183-2 vote, with three abstentions. The Spanish-language Lectionary was approved on a 181-2 vote, also with three abstentions. Both now go to the Vatican for confirmation.

But five sections of the Roman Missal being prepared for use in English-speaking countries failed to get the necessary two-thirds vote of the Latin-rite U.S. bishops during the meeting.

With 244 Latin-rite bishops in the United States eligible to vote on the questions, the required two-thirds was 163. With 189 eligible bishops attending the meeting, only 134 voted to accept the first section, Masses and prayers for various needs and intentions.

On four subsequent translations, the votes also failed to reach two-thirds, meaning the 55 bishops not present will be polled by mail on all five parts. That process is expected to take several weeks.

The items that failed to pass contain the Order of the Mass II; prefaces for various occasions; votive Masses and Masses for the dead; solemn blessings for the end of Mass; prayers over the people; and eucharistic prayers for particular occasions, such as for evangelization or ordinations.

On immigration reform, Cardinal Francis E. George of Chicago wrote on behalf of the full U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops to urge President Barack Obama and Congress to enact comprehensive reform before the end of 2009.

"It has been clear for years that the United States immigration system requires repair and that reform legislation should not be delayed," said the USCCB president in a prepared statement.

"I would ask President Barack Obama and congressional leaders of both parties to work together to fashion and enact comprehensive immigration reform legislation before the end of the year," he said.

He also urged "respect and observance of all just laws" and said the bishops "do not approve or encourage the illegal entry of anyone into our country."

Minding marriage

Archbishop Joseph E. Kurtz, of Louisville, Ky., chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee on Defense of Marriage, reported to his fellow bishops about the challenges in meeting their priority focus on marriage, especially the quick rate at which states and courts have been taking up legislation that legalizes same-sex marriage or prohibits it.

Six states now recognize marriage between same-sex couples, Archbishop Kurtz said, and others are considering the same type of laws or a range of others "allowing everything but marriage," that would give new legal rights to civil unions.

He said the key points that the ad hoc committee is focusing on to support marriage are:

— That marriage is inherently related to sexual differences and the complementarity of men and women.

— That marriage is for the good of children, who are themselves "a great good of marriage."

— That marriage is a unique bond reserved to men and women by nature.

— That same-sex marriage has negative effects on religious rights.

The bishops also heard brief reports from their conference vice president, Bishop Gerald F. Kicanas of Tucson, Ariz., about their other four priorities: faith formation and sacramental practice; the life and dignity of the human person; cultural diversity in the church; and promoting vocations to the priesthood and religious life.

Other actions

In other actions, the bishops in a 135-2 vote approved a recommendation from their Committee on Budget and Finance to keep the 2010 assessment on dioceses to fund the work of the USCCB at the 2009 level of just over $10 million. The vote was open only to bishops who head dioceses.

But Archbishop Kurtz, chairman of the committee, warned that he would probably be asking for an increase for 2011 when that assessment comes up at the bishops' November meeting in Baltimore. The assessments are calculated for each diocese based on a formula that includes offertory income, registered households and contributions to three national collections.

The bishops also approved funding of $450,000 for the New York-based John Jay College of Criminal Justice to complete a study of the causes and context of clergy sex abuse of minors. Commissioned by the bishops in the 2002 "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People," the study is expected to be completed by December 2010.

During their executive session, the U.S. bishops expressed "appreciation and support" for Bishop D'Arcy especially for "his pastoral concern" for the University of Notre Dame.

In a two-sentence statement made public June 22 in Washington, the bishops also affirmed Bishop D'Arcy's "solicitude for (Notre Dame's) Catholic identity and his loving care for all those the Lord has given him to sanctify, to teach and to shepherd."

The statement made no direct reference to the controversy over the university's decision to have Obama as commencement speaker May 17 or to a recent call by the board of directors of the Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities for the bishops to revisit their 2004 statement, "Catholics in Political Life."

At end of jubilee year, figure of St. Paul clearer

Vatican officials declared the jubilee year a success.

"The result has been positive, even beyond the most optimistic predictions," Cardinal Andrea Cordero Lanza di Montezemolo, archpriest of the Basilica of St. Paul's Outside the Walls, said at a Vatican press conference June 26.

At the Pauline basilica, which had often been overlooked by pilgrims to Rome, overflow crowds came to visit and pray at the tomb of the Apostle, the cardinal said.

Thanks to some architectural finessing, a portion of the tomb, a rough-hewn marble sarcophagus buried beneath the main altar, was for the first time made visible to visitors.

It was Pope Benedict who almost single-handedly gave the jubilee its content. In weekly talks, homilies and liturgical celebrations, he sketched a detailed portrait of the man considered the model of Christian conversion and the archetypal missionary.

St. Paul was the most prolific of the early Apostles, the man who took the Gospel of Christ into the world of non-Jews and helped set the church on a more universal path. The pope's main point was that this evangelizing spirit based on personal conversion needs to be rekindled among today's 1.1 billion Catholics.

"Dear brothers and sisters, as in early times, today too Christ needs apostles ready to sacrifice themselves. He needs witnesses and martyrs like St. Paul," the pope said when he proclaimed the jubilee.

As the year progressed, the pope found a "St. Paul angle" for his talks to bishops, religious orders, university students and his own Roman Curia. He had plenty of material to draw upon: St. Paul's 14 letters represent nearly half of the New Testament.

On Pope Benedict's foreign trips, St. Paul came along.

In Paris last year, as the global financial crisis worsened, the pope recalled St. Paul's preaching against idolatry and greed, and asked whether it wasn't relevant today: "Have not money, the thirst for possessions, for power and even knowledge, diverted man from his true identity?"

The pope's annual message for the World Day for Migrants and Refugees featured St. Paul as a "migrant by vocation" and an ambassador-at-large for Christ.

In talks to bishops from Asia, the pope suggested they try to learn from St. Paul's ability to evangelize in cultures that are new to Christianity, presenting the Gospel in ways that resonate with the traditional spiritual wisdom of their continent. Citing the Apostle's missionary courage, he told a group of newly appointed bishops to imitate St. Paul's persistence in the face of personal mistreatment and dangers.

Prayers and unity

Pope Benedict also applied the saint's lessons to contemporary rivalries and controversies within the church community.

In early 2009, during debate over several of his own decisions in the church, the pope quoted St. Paul's admonition to Galatian Christians not to "go on biting and devouring one another."

St. Paul understood that church unity was the primary requisite for a credible witness of the Gospel in the world, he said.

He struck a similar theme at the ecumenical vespers service Jan. 25, the feast of the conversion of St. Paul. That liturgy marked the close of the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity, and the pope was joined by Orthodox, Protestant and Anglican representatives in the Basilica of St. Paul's Outside the Walls.

In his homily, the pope emphasized St. Paul's message that without internal unity, Christians cannot bring peace and reconciliation to the ruptured societies across the globe.

Pilgrims who came to Rome enjoyed a special itinerary of nine sites linked to the life of St. Paul, including ancient churches built on sites where the Apostle resided, the Mamertine Prison where he was incarcerated by Roman authorities, and the Abbey of the Three Fountains where he was beheaded on the order of the Emperor Nero.

A plenary indulgence, the remission of temporal punishment due to sin, was offered for pilgrims who crossed the threshold of the "Pauline Doors," prayed at the tomb of St. Paul, confessed their sins, received the Eucharist and prayed for the pope's intentions.

It was also offered to Catholics participating in local events marking the jubilee year.

A series of concerts was offered in the Basilica of St. Paul throughout the year. Cardinal Cordero Lanza di Montezemolo said that when he broached the idea to Pope Benedict, to make sure there was no objection, the music-loving pope simply replied: "Are you inviting me?"

The cardinal said it was decided that at the ceremonial closing of the Pauline year, the "Pauline flame" that has burned in the basilica during the past 12 months would be kept lit, to symbolically keep alive "all that has been positive during this year."

Closing Pauline year, pope reveals results of tests on apostle's tomb

ROME (CNS) — Closing the year of St. Paul, Pope Benedict XVI announced that tests done on the presumed tomb of the apostle revealed the presence of bone fragments from a human who lived during the first and second centuries.

"This seems to confirm the unanimous and uncontested tradition that they are the mortal remains of the Apostle Paul," the pope said during an evening prayer service June 28 at Rome's Basilica of St. Paul Outside the Walls.

The basilica has long been held to be the burial site of St. Paul, but because of the destruction and rebuilding of the basilica, the tomb's exact location was unknown for centuries.

Vatican officials announced in December 2006 that several feet below the basilica's main altar and behind a smaller altar, they had found a roughly cut marble sarcophagus beneath an inscription that reads: "Paul Apostle Martyr."

Because part of the sarcophagus is buried beneath building material, Vatican officials determined they could not dig it out to open and examine the contents.

It was decided, Pope Benedict said, to drill "very tiny perforation" into the marble so that a small probe could be inserted in order to withdraw fragments, which underwent carbon-14 analysis.

"When I'm gone, who will receive the gifts God gave me?"

A will is your answer to the question. 60-70% of Americans die without a valid will. If you die without a will, the laws of the state you live in will determine how your assets are divided including assets to your family. Without a will or other charitable estate plan, charitable desires you may have for your parish, Catholic school, agency, diocese or the diocesan foundation will be ignored. Don't let your answer be silence.

RESPECT LIFE

Apostolate uses ads to promote, defend life

apostolate that creates and airs national television and radio commercials. The mission of Virtue Media is three-fold: first, to help save unborn babies from abortion; second, to offer hope and healing to post-abortive parents; and third, to educate the public about the sanctity of life.

By harnessing the potential of media to educate and inform the general public, Virtue Media has tapped into an expansive resource that allows for the spreading of positive messages in the media market.

The ads were first introduced in the Charlotte market in 2006 after Msgr. Richard Bellow, pastor of St. Mark Church in Huntersville, asked Tom Peterson, founder and president of Virtue Media, to speak at the parish.

With financial support from St. Mark Church, Virtue Media then partnered with North Carolina Right to Life, Inc. to launch a pro-life ad campaign called "Heart to Heart."

Real results

Using pro-life television ads from Virtue Media, the campaign, which was an ecumenical effort between Catholic and non-Catholic churches in the community, was aimed at reducing the number of abortions in the Charlotte area.

The ads first ran on major networks and cable stations from December 26, 2006 to March 25, 2007 and again during June, July, August and October of 2007.

According to North Carolina Right to Life, Inc., in 2007 there were nearly 1,900 fewer abortions in the Charlotte area than in 2006.

In August 2008, Bishop Peter J. Jugis sent a letter to pastors encouraging their support of the campaign.

"Television is the most effective and influential vehicle we have to touch minds and hearts in society," said Bishop Jugis in the letter. "The ads are positive messages which encourage people to choose life over abortion, and offer hope and healing to parents after abortion."

Within the past year several parishes in the Diocese of Charlotte have supported the campaign through either parish tithes or voluntary contributions from parishioners.

Virtue Media offers church presentation materials, including DVDs of the ads, to parishes that are interested in generating support.

How they work

At the end of each ad a number is provided for Option Line, a call center in Columbus, Ohio, which is run by CareNet pregnancy centers and staffed 24 hours a day by Christian groups.

At Option Line, callers are directed to local pregnancy help centers where they can receive counseling. In Charlotte, callers are directed to the Pregnancy Resource Center.

When Virtue Media television ads air nationally, approximately 22,000 women contact the pregnancy call line a month, according to Peterson.

He attributes such high numbers to the utilization of television as the most effective way to reach people.

"We're showing up where these women are," said Peterson. "When you put a powerful creative message out there, when and where they are watching, they will respond."

A powerful message

One of those powerful messages comes directly from Norma McCorvey, better known as Jane Roe, the plaintiff in the Supreme Court case Roe v. Wade, which legalized abortion in 1973.

In the ad, McCorvey, a convert to Catholicism, refers to the court case as "the biggest mistake of my life."

Now she is dedicating her life to spreading the truth about preserving the sanctity of human life.

"We have powerful national figures who are blessing us and our church with the truth," said Peterson, referring to Virtue Media ads featuring McCorvey and Dr. Alveda King, niece of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.

"It's powerful coming right from them," he said.

What's next?

Peterson has started a second Catholic media apostolate called Catholics Come Home, which he hopes will further the mission of Virtue Media.

Although these ads are focused primarily on bringing wayward Catholics back to the church, Peterson believes that by bringing more Catholics home, the pro-life movement within the church will be strengthened.

"The ultimate solution to stopping abortion is to have more hearts centered on Christ and more people active in their Catholic parishes," he said.

"Research has shown that if people are centered on Christ and active in their churches, they will support pro-life issues," he said. "Once somebody is grounded in faith, they can be formed in virtue."

Catholic presence strong at National Right to Life convention

CHARLOTTE (CNS) — A Catholic congressman, the founder of Priests for Life and a leading priest-ethicist were among the speakers and workshop presenters at the National Right to Life convention June 18-20 in Charlotte.

The convention, with the theme "Stop the Abortion Agenda," drew nearly 1,000 participants from 48 states and covered a wide range of topics affecting human life, including concerns raised by a proposed national health reform.

Father Tadeusz Pacholczyk, director of education for the National Catholic Bioethics Center, kicked off the convention with a presentation on "The Science and Ethics of Stem Cells and Cloning."

"There are seductive arguments regarding embryonic stem cell research, like 'These embryos are all going to be thrown away anyway,' but can we ever throw away another human being? This is not how we treat one another," he said.

There have been no medical cures or therapies yet using human embryonic stem cells, while there are a myriad of cures and therapies using the ethically obtained adult stem cells.

Failing to emphasize this key distinction to the general public is "unjust," according to Father Pacholczyk, who said the importance of keeping ethics in modern science cannot be overstated.

Father Frank Pavone of Priests for Life was part of a panel discussion on "The Church, the Media and the State."

Calling the media an information-eating machine, he challenged his audience to get educated, write stories and be available to share the truth with the media so they can do their job in challenging the state.

In the second panel titled "We Are the Sheep ... Where Are the Shepherds," Father Pavone joined pro-life leaders from several large Christian denominations, each with unique challenges promoting the sanctity of life in each particular faith community.

He said that nowhere in the mission of the church in the modern world is the power of authentic Christian unity expressing itself more visibly, powerfully and practically than in the pro-life work.

Among the other topics addressed at the convention were U.S. funding of domestic and international abortions and the suppression of research regarding the harmful effects of abortion.

College students serve overnight shift at homeless shelter

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

WINSTON-SALEM — Eight students from Wake Forest University's Catholic Campus Ministry recently spent the night at a local homeless shelter.

It was a service project that brought them outside of their comfort zones and gave them a glimpse into the lives of those less fortunate.

The students served at Samaritan Inn located in downtown Winston-Salem June 25-26.

Their duties included serving dinner, taking turns watching surveillance monitors throughout the night and helping to prepare breakfast in the morning. In between their chores they spent time getting to know the men in the shelter.

"I was really unsure of what this undertaking would be like," said Nikki Garcia, a senior, who had done some previous volunteer work at shelters but had never spent the night.

"Overall, it was a really great experience to reach out to people who may not see their own worth some days," said Garcia.

After dinner the students cleaned the kitchen, mopped the floors and spent time talking to the men.

"We got to attend the evening devotional service, during which one of the men told us about his life and read Scripture passages," said Rachel Fedders, a sophomore.

"Afterwards, other guests spoke out about their hardships and how the shelter had helped them to find hope," she said.

Hearing the stories gave the students a first-hand look into the personal struggles of people in their community.

"Often during times of economic hardship, it is difficult for the fortunate to see just how lucky they have been," said student Michael Montoya.

"I think that it is important for those who have been blessed to take a step back, realize that the down and out have had some bad luck, and lend some aid in whatever manner possible," he said.

Serving in the shelter also helped the students realize that even a small gesture can make a difference to a person who is struggling.

"As our campus minister told us, we don't have to be able to offer deep words of encouragement or know just the right thing to do or say to be able to help these people out," said Fedders. "Just by smiling and treating them with respect, we can help them remember that they are deserving of respect."

The students are planning to serve at the shelter again this summer.

Brian Mark Hilgert, 16, a parishioner of Holy Spirit Church in Denver and a member of Boy Scout Troop 80, recently achieved Eagle Scout, the highest rank in Boy Scouts. Father Carmen Malacari, pastor; Deacon James Atkinson; and Knights of Columbus joined Brian's family and friends for the court of honor ceremony at the church May 30.

Brian's Eagle project involved designing and building a children's memorial garden outside the church.

Located near the parish activity center, the two-tier garden includes a variety of plants and flowers as well as a statue of Jesus, a bird bath and stone animal sculptures.

In Troop 80, Brian has held the offices of senior patrol leader, assistant patrol leader and instructor. He plans to continue to assist and lead the troop activities alongside his father and troop leader, Art Hilgert, who is also an Eagle Scout.

Church starts ministry for high school athletes organization's Web site, the goal of CAC is to provide an integrated network of sports-oriented clergy and lay people to serve Catholic athletes, coaches and staff in the practice of their faith.

It also will allow them to utilize the unique platform given to them to reach the world for Jesus Christ and his church.

At St. Mark Church, Father Patrick Hoare, parochial vicar, and Jean Whelan, parishioner, decided to implement the group as another way for teens to get involved at the parish. The ministry was formed last summer as an alternative to the Life Teen youth group.

Life Teen has been very successful, but Father Hoare and Whelan felt that there were youths at the parish who still were not being served.

"We wanted another ministry for teens," said Whelan. "It is a different door to enter your faith."

Through prayer and research, they came across the CAC Web site. After contacting the organization, they received permission to use the existing college formula, which they tailored to meet the needs of the high school athletes.

"For many high school students, athletics is an important part of the high school experience," said Father Hoare. With CAC "we are taking something they love and tying it in with faith."

The group meets every other Wednesday during the summer. Their meetings begin and end with prayer and always include an athletic activity followed by a faith-sharing talk.

At the kick-off meeting, the youths were divided into groups to play indoor and outdoor basketball and ultimate Frisbee. After the games they had a cookout followed with a talk by Charlotte Catholic High School athletic director Kevin Christmas.

"I really am impressed with this group," said Christmas, who said he was inspired by the fellowship he saw among the athletes.

The group at St. Mark Church is the first high school division of CAC in the country. The national program hopes to use the group as a model for other high schools and churches around the country.

At each meeting, approximately 12 adult facilitators are on hand to supervise the activities.

"They are former athletes who love their faith," said Whelan.

In terms of youth involvement, leadership opportunities are available in the form of a teen advisory board.

The board, made up of rising high school juniors and seniors, attends all of the planning meetings and offers suggestions relating to the development of the program.

"They tell us what's working," said Whelan, who also mentioned that it was members of the teen advisory board who suggested that the group devote one of their meetings to eucharistic adoration.

"We focus on the virtues but also on eucharistic presence," said Whelan. "The mission is bringing Christ into your sport and showing him to others as you play your sport."

Whelan's daughter, Mary Kathryn, is a rising senior at Charlotte Catholic High School and a member of the CAC teen advisory board. She said the benefits of CAC vary for each of the members.

"Hopefully they get fitness, but also learn lessons about how to deal with stuff in high school and life in general," she said.

A member of the Charlotte Catholic High School women's soccer team, Mary Kathryn also said that CAC has helped her approach soccer with a more charitable attitude.

"Sometimes when I'm playing soccer I get aggravated and want to do things that are not very Christian-like," she said. "This just helps me remember that we have got to stay in our faith."

Christmas talked to the athletes about the importance of finding time for God each day, something he does by attending daily Mass. "If we can't give 20 minutes of our day to God then there is something wrong in our lives," he said.

His advice to the athletes: "Believe in yourself, believe in your faith and I don't think you have anything to worry about."

New book sees growing threats to Catholic health care, conscience

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Catholic health care faces cultural, legal, economic and political challenges that may lead to the end of its distinctively Catholic mission in the not-too-distant future, a Catholic law professor writes in a new book.

"Issues related to women's reproductive rights may provide the most difficult challenges to the ongoing struggles by the sponsors of (Catholic) hospitals in terms of preserving their Catholic identity," says Leonard Nelson III in "Diagnosis Critical: The Urgent Threats Confronting Catholic Healthcare," published in June.

Nelson, an affiliated scholar with the Birmingham School of Public Health at the University of Alabama, sees the future of Catholic health care in free clinics; specialized centers focusing on natural family planning and other church-approved reproductive medicine; and hospice care for the dying.

"They may need to move out of the hospital setting" to aspects of medical care that are "not subject to extensive government oversight," Nelson told Catholic News Service in a May 28 interview.

But the president and CEO of the Catholic Health Association sees no coming retreat from Catholic health care as we know it today, calling Nelson's book "really a very old thesis that reappears every five to 10 years."

"We have no reason to think we will or should close," said Sister Carol Keehan, a Daughter of Charity, in an e-mail to CNS. "We will keep conscience protection and we will continue to be a major presence in the health care of this nation."

Sister Keehan also said that "people who have not been in Catholic health care and have no knowledge of what it has meant in the lives of so many are too willing to give it up. It is a treasure, and the care of the sick is a sign of the kingdom, and we intend to be here being that sign."

Nelson, a member of St. Paul's Cathedral in Birmingham, sees a sort of Catch-22 in efforts to defend the Catholic identity of hospitals from moves to dilute conscience protections in those institutions.

"Catholic institutions could bolster their claim to statutory, if not constitutional protection, from (laws that require them to act in violation of Catholic teaching) by becoming more pervasively Catholic," he writes. "And if Catholic institutions are generally perceived to be serious about their Catholic identity, it may be easier to argue for legislative exemption from such laws."

"On the other hand, emphasizing the distinctive mission of Catholic hospitals may strengthen claims that public funding should be denied because of the sectarian nature of these hospitals," Nelson adds.

In the CNS interview, he cited a variety of reasons for what he sees as the current dire state of Catholic health care.

Among them are a lack of vocations leading to a switch in leadership of Catholic hospitals from women religious to laypeople, some of whom are not Catholics; the societal trend toward viewing abortion as a "right" that should not be affected by the beliefs of others; and the economic stresses that force Catholic hospitals into "all sorts of joint ventures and mergers" to maintain financial viability.

But the greatest threat might come from the concerted effort by groups that promote or provide abortions to "mainstream abortion" by making it part of every health plan and available at every hospital, Nelson said. "It's going to be constant. I don't believe FOCA (the Freedom of Choice Act) will pass. It will be more incremental, more subtle, but we will end up in the same place."

FOCA, which would wipe out many existing state laws and impede states' ability to regulate abortion, has not yet been introduced in the current Congress. President Barack Obama has stated it is not a high legislative priority for him.

In the near future, "insurance plans will all have to cover abortion and the full range of reproductive services, so Catholics will be paying for it that way," Nelson said.

Nelson blamed some Catholic politicians for advancing the view that it is OK to be Catholic and to support keeping abortion legal and said some bishops have not been sufficiently willing to denounce that view.

"Pro-choice" Catholic politicians threaten the continued existence of Catholic health care because they provide political cover and legitimacy to efforts to impose mandates on Catholic health care institutions to provide services in violation of the ERDs," Nelson writes.

The "ERDs" are the "Ethical and Religious Directives for Catholic Health Care Services," which guide Catholic health care facilities in addressing a wide range of ethical questions.

Nelson said he has been writing "Diagnosis Critical" for four or five years but has been interested in Catholic health care since he worked for a law firm 30 years ago that provided legal services to a Catholic hospital system.

Sharing God's love often difficult

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I recently started a new quest. It is a rather simple thing: I want to say "hi" to people when we pass each other on the sidewalk or grocery store aisle.

I'm tired of walking by people and neither one of us acknowledging the other's existence.

So far it has not gone well. Most of the time people either give me a strange look or ignore me completely.

Every once in awhile someone will look at me, smile and say "hello" back to me.

I don't know why this is such a hard thing for people to do, but I feel compelled to continue this mission.

My little "say hi" campaign is nothing compared to the quests we hear about in this Sunday's readings, though the results are similar.

Amos is called to be a prophet for the Lord. But not only is he not welcomed by the people to whom he gives God's word, he is asked to leave.

He complains, "I was no prophet, ... I was a shepherd and a dresser of sycamores," as if to say, "I never asked for this job, I liked my old job; no one ever ridiculed me there."

In the Gospel, Jesus sends the Twelve Apostles out, two by two, on a missionary journey. They are to preach repentance, heal the sick and drive out demons.

Jesus must have anticipated that they would not always be welcomed, so he gives them this instruction: "Whatever place does not welcome you or listen to you, leave there and shake the dust off your feet in testimony against them."

Following the Lord and bringing his message of love to the world is seldom easy.

Like Amos and the apostles, we will not always be welcomed with open arms.

But our motivation does not have to come from people responding to our mission. St. Paul reminds us that we who hope in Christ, "exist for the praise of his glory."

Bringing glory to God is success enough. We accomplish this when we spread the love God has given us with all we meet, even if it is just in passing.

Questions:

What are some ways you try to share the love of God with others?

Have you ever been rejected when trying to live your faith?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Jesus summoned the Twelve and began to send them out two by two" (Mark 6:7).

Ed McMahon, a Catholic University alumnus, dead at 86

BY CHAZ MUTH
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Known to millions for his trademark "Heeere's Johnny" introduction as the longtime sidekick to Johnny Carson on "The Tonight Show," entertainer and Catholic University of America alumnus Ed McMahon died early June 23 in Los Angeles at 86.

The Detroit native, who was raised Catholic, died shortly after midnight at the Ronald Reagan/UCLA Medical Center.

No cause of death has been released, but in the past few years McMahon had endured a number of health problems, including a 2007 neck injury, and had a highly publicized hospitalization for pneumonia last winter.

Though the entertainer publicly acknowledged recent financial difficulties that nearly forced him out of his lavish Beverly Hills home in 2008, he had been generous throughout the years with his time and money for Catholic institutions, including a scholarship endowment for Catholic University and serving as its alumni association's national president from 1967 to 1971.

McMahon's celebrity status added excitement to alumni events, especially homecoming, said Marion Gosney, alumni relations director at Catholic University.

"Ed helped strengthen the alumni association with his big personality," Gosney said. "He brought people together and was a loyal alumnus."

McMahon received a bachelor's degree in drama from the Washington school in 1949 and was awarded an honorary doctor of communication arts degree in 1988.

"Catholic University has lost one of its most renowned alumni with the passing of Ed McMahon," Vincentian Father David O'Connell, president of the school, said. "He took such great pride in his alma mater and rarely missed an opportunity to speak positively about his time here in various interviews and books."

Edward Leo Peter McMahon Jr. was born in Detroit, attended the Jesuit-run Boston College, and served in the military as a test pilot during World War II before enrolling at Catholic University.

While enrolled at Catholic University under the GI Bill, McMahon studied under Dominican Father Gilbert V. Hartke — who created the drama department at the school — and later led the campaign to raise funds to build a theater on campus in the priest's name.

"Ed was devoted to ... Father Hartke, only to follow in his footsteps to legend status: 'I owe so much to CU,' McMahon told me at Bob Hope's funeral a few years ago," Father O'Connell said.

"That's where my career got its start," he told the priest.

After stints on radio, McMahon shifted his attention to television in Philadelphia, and in the 1950s began appearing on a show called "Who Do You Trust?" hosted by Carson, and then accompanied the talk-show legend when he became the host of NBC's "The Tonight Show" in 1962, where he remained until 1992, when Carson retired.

McMahon's other credits included serving as host of "Star Search" and "TV's Bloopers and Practical Jokes." In 1969 McMahon provided the narration for the Serra International Foundation's film, "Generations of Influence," produced to promote religious vocations.

The longtime television personality is survived by his third wife, Pamela, and five of his six children. McMahon's son, Michael, died in 1995.

Angel gets her wings

Nun in Fawcett's hometown recalls her as 'first-grader with pigtails'

BY PAULA J. BEATON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CORPUS CHRISTI, Texas — Sister Patrice Floyd remembers actress Farrah Fawcett as "a little first-grader with pigtails" at Christ the King School in Corpus Christi, Fawcett's hometown.

Fawcett, who first rose to fame starring on "Charlie's Angels," died in Los Angeles June 25 at age 62 after a three-year battle with cancer. A private funeral Mass was celebrated for her at Our Lady of the Angels Cathedral in Los Angeles June 30.

A longtime educator, Sister Floyd, a Sister of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament, is a former principal of several Catholic schools in the Diocese of Corpus Christi. She said the Fawcett family lived across the street from Christ the King.

Born Mary Farrah Leni Fawcett on Feb. 2, 1947, in Corpus Christi, Fawcett was attending the University of Texas in Austin when a movie publicist saw photos of her after she was named one of the 10 most beautiful people on campus, according to an AP story.

The publicist suggested she consider a career in Hollywood and she took him up on it.

After small parts in a couple of TV shows, she was cast on "Charlie's Angels." She remained with the show for just one year, but she became a pop icon in the 1970s.

After leaving the show she starred in a few films that were panned by critics, but her starring role in the 1984 TV movie "The Burning Bed," as a wife who is a victim of domestic abuse, earned her an Emmy nomination.

About the same time she starred in a well-received off-Broadway play, "Extremities," about a woman sexually assaulted in her own home. She played the same part in a 1986 film version.

In 1973 she married actor Lee Majors, but they divorced nine years later. Since the 1980s she lived off and on with actor Ryan O'Neal, with whom she had one son, Redmond. The couple never married.

Though she was raised a Catholic, her faith never seemed to be a topic of her interviews but as she battled cancer she spoke about praying to God and hoping for a miracle.

In a documentary about her struggle that she produced and which aired on network television in May, she was often shown holding a rosary during her treatments.

Before her death, news reports said a priest came to her hospital room and administered the church's last rites.

Sister Floyd said that when Farrah Fawcett and Majors were in town, they often came by the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament Convent to see two of the older sisters who taught Farrah in school. Both nuns have since died.

The visits were always in the evening and Fawcett wore a disguise, Sister Floyd said. "The press would go wild when she was in town."

Many of the sisters knew the star, the nun said. Sister Collette Brehony, a Sister of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament who is now director of religious education at St. Gertrude Parish in Kingsville, had been her teacher at St. Patrick School.

"She was shocked the first time she saw her on TV," Sister Floyd said.

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

For the month of July, here is a look at Our Lady of the Hills Camp in Hendersonville.

ARCHIVES PHOTO

Campers ride horses at Our Lady of the Hills Camp in Hendersonville in this undated black-and-white photograph.

Purchased in January 1956 from the Brandeis Youth Foundation, Our Lady of the Hills Camp consisted of 250 acres just south of Hendersonville. The site included Highland Lake, also known as Madonna Lake; an Olympic-size swimming pool; an open-air gymnasium; the historic Trenholm-Rhett homestead; and many other features.

The property was originally part of a 1789 land grant to John Earle. It belonged to several prominent owners including George Trenholm, secretary of the Confederate Treasury, and William Aiken, former South Carolina governor.

After being purchased by the Diocese of Raleigh, the property was renamed the Catholic Assembly Grounds of North Carolina. The diocese originally intended to use the property for retreats, family vacations, conferences and a summer camp. Later, the property was primarily associated with diocesan youth ministry and Our Lady of the Hills Camp.

Some of the activities offered at the camp included archery, riflery, baseball, swimming, canoeing, dramatics, boxing and horseback riding. Part of the daily camp schedule included morning and evening prayer, Mass and rosary. Priests, religious orders, paid staff and volunteers all contributed to the daily operations of the camp.

Two noteworthy staff members, Carmen and Dorothy Falcone, assisted in running the camp for nearly 30 years. Carmen Falcone worked at Duke University as an assistant professor in the physical education department and coached wrestling and football. His wife Dorothy was a dietician at Duke Hospital.

With the aid of people like the Falcones, Our Lady of the Hills Camp made a positive impact on the surrounding community.

Oct. 19, 1955: Raleigh Bishop Vincent S. Waters purchases land for the Catholic Assembly Grounds.

June 10, 1956: Our Lady of the Hills Camp opens its doors for the first time. From its inception, the camp was racially integrated, making it the first non-segregated camp in the area.

June 14, 1956: Bishop Waters dedicates the Catholic Assembly Grounds.

Summer 1958: Our Lady of the Hills Camp becomes co-institutional as both boys and girls attend the same camp sessions.

Summer 1965: The camp introduces SCUBA diving as one of the activities.

October 1978: The Diocese of Charlotte Youth Ministry office relocates to Our Lady of the Hills Camp. The camp "winterizes" the former infirmary building for year-round use by youth ministry.

May 1985: The nationally-registered historic Trenholm-Rhett house is torn down due to deterioration. The antebellum homestead built in 1854 housed the camp chapel prior to destruction.

Aug. 16, 1985: The camp's closing ceremony concludes with Mass, a cookout and fireworks. The closure of the camp was a result of financial concerns.

Aug. 22, 1985: The Catholic Assembly Grounds property is sold.

1985: Highland Lake Inn and Conference Center is established on the former Our Lady of the Hills Camp location.

1999: Highland Lake Inn re-opens under new ownership. Our Lady of the Hills statue still remains on site to this day.

"Our Lady of the Hills"

There's a Catholic camp nestled in the mountains so green,

With the wandering trails and the lakes so serene.

Our Lady of the Hills we'll always be true,

This beautiful camp is a blessing from you.

We work and we play in your honor each day,

And the memories will stay as the years pass away.

1934 – 2009 Augustinian Father Anthony J. Tomasulo

Priest remembered for joy-filled attitude toward life, people

CHARLOTTE — Augustinian Father Anthony Joseph Tomasulo, parochial vicar of St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte, died in his sleep June 11 during an Augustinian convocation in Illinois. He was 75.

Father Tomasulo was born in Elizabeth, N.J., on May 5, 1934. He attended Villanova University in 1953, where he applied for entrance into the Order of St. Augustine. He was received as a novice in September 1955 and, after a year at Good Counsel Novitiate in New Hamburg, N.Y., he professed first vows Sept. 10, 1956.

He then attended Augustinian College in Washington, D.C., for his theological studies. He professed solemn vows in 1959 and was ordained to the priesthood at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington June 3, 1961.

He spent his first few years as an educator before devoting his ministry to parish work. He served in parishes in New York, Pennsylvania and Florida before becoming parochial vicar of St. John Neumann Church in 2007.

Father Tomasulo was diagnosed with a brain tumor in the 1960s. The operation to remove the tumor was successful and left him with an understanding that every day was a gift from God to be enjoyed, celebrated and shared with others.

His appreciation for life gave him a joy-filled sense of humor and an affirming attitude toward every person or situation he encountered.

Father Tomasulo often said his greatest loves were his family, life and experiences of brotherhood as an Augustinian.

His ability to laugh at life and at himself drew others close to him and helped him to minister to them as a friend, brother and priest.

Morning news that can lead to prayer

Heroes are of all faiths who share integrity with Christ

I like to pray first thing in the morning. It orients my day toward what is meaningful and reminds me what is important.

However, I confess that sometimes the morning newspaper tempts me to break my routine. I only have so much time before I need to dash to work, and when I give in to "just a peak" at the headlines I sometimes end up cutting into time for reflection.

Occasionally, though, I find a quick look at the morning paper actually leads me to prayer, and it was like that Saturday.

Two stories caught my attention. The first was the horrible death of Sarfraz Naeemi, a moderate Muslim cleric in Lahore, Pakistan.

Naeemi was a leading religious figure in the area and had come out in opposition to the Taliban whom he had denounced as murderers. He had condemned suicide bombings as un-Islamic.

Apparently in retribution, he was killed when his seminary and mosque were destroyed by suicide bombers, and the Taliban claimed responsibility.

The second story was on the obituary page. A young woman of 24 years, Thembi Ngubane, had died in South Africa from drug-resistant tuberculosis.

What made her death notable was the way she had lived her young life in Cape Town. Ngubane had AIDS, and in a part of the world where that is still a stigma that people often suffer in silence, Ngubane fought a very public battle with her illness.

She made recordings of events in her life like the first conversation she ever had with her mother about AIDS. She recorded the ordinary, day-to-day routines of living with a disease in a country where drugs are hard to come by despite the fact that nearly a third of young women have AIDS.

Her willingness to speak out publicly brought her to the attention of National Public Radio and to audiences throughout the world.

Now, both Sarfraz Naeemi and Thembi Ngubane, two people of vastly different backgrounds from different parts of the world, are silent. Somehow the world seems a little lonelier because of their passing, and a little more like a place where prayer is in order.

I've just finished a Christology class for the master's degree I'm pursuing, and one of the questions that class brought to the fore was Christ's question to the apostles: "Who do you say that I am?"

When I think of Christ, I always think of a man of integrity who lived his life with courage despite the obvious adversity coming his way because of his outspokenness. When he went to Bethany and raised Lazarus, he knew he would draw the attention of the authorities, and sure enough, after Lazarus was raised, Jesus' enemies began to plot how to kill him.

According to John's Gospel (11:54), Jesus went to the town of Ephraim, bordering on the desert, and stayed there a few days. It was there he made his monumental decision to go up to Jerusalem, sealing his fate.

Sarfraz Naeemi made a similar decision when he decided to speak out for the truth of his faith and condemn atrocities. He must have known he was putting his life on the line.

Similarly, Thembi Ngubane threw anonymity to the wind when she let the world know she suffered from a disease dreaded and stigmatized in her country. But by doing so, she opened the door to fresh air, to truth and enlightenment where there are sometimes darkness and shame.

Let us pray for all the world's heroes, for people of all faiths who share the word "integrity" with Christ.

Why are we looking for the loophole?

Capital punishment is becoming an intrinsically evil act that cannot be justified

To the many recent reasons already marshaled against capital punishment — from the multiple examples of wrongful convictions to its expense — now add this: It doesn't work.

Such an appeal to pragmatism supersedes even morality and economy in our time.

Eighty-eight percent of the top criminologists in the United States believe the death penalty is not a deterrent to homicide, according to a study published this month by the Northwestern University School of Law.

"The consensus among criminologists is that the death penalty does not add any significant deterrent effect above that of long-term imprisonment," concluded the study.

Three-quarters of the respondents agreed that debates about the death penalty distract Congress and state legislatures "from focusing on real solutions to crime problems."

Too many people use the fact that Catholic Church teaching does not rule out capital punishment in order to support their position in its favor. True, the church does not rule it out, yet it hardly offers a ringing endorsement.

Catholic teaching accepts the death penalty if it "is the only possible way" of defending lives against an aggressor. But the Catechism of the Catholic Church also notes that "the cases in which the execution of the offender is an absolute necessity are very rare if not practically nonexistent."

Can anyone honestly say that in the American system of justice capital punishment meets that moral standard? Why are we looking for the loophole?

When granting that pinpoint exemption, the catechism didn't have in mind an advanced, first-world country such as the United States with its supermax prisons. Killing the offender might possibly be permissible in nomadic, tribal societies which have no other means of incarceration.

States are legally bound to avoid cruel or unnecessarily painful punishment, said Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center.

This makes it a medical procedure,

Consider This

STEPHEN KENT

"so doing all you can means usually having a doctor involved," he said, thus involving yet another organization with its own code of ethics.

The American Medical Association forbids physicians from having any direct role in lethal injections, including "an action which would assist, supervise or contribute to the ability of another individual to directly cause the death of the condemned."

So, is the picture clearing?

An intrinsically evil act is one that is objectively wrong in and of itself, and which therefore can never be justified by circumstances or consequences. Capital punishment in the United States is approaching that definition.

Death penalty advocates who appropriate the catechism's "only when and then if" provisions in their argument are similar to a teenager asking his mother for permission to use the car, and is told to ask his father.

The father's response is: "You may use the car, but only if it is in connection with school or work; you can't go more than 10 blocks from home and have to be back in the driveway at 9:30."

"Mom," the teen says, jingling the keys on the way out, "Dad says it's OK for me to use the car."

The grudging exemption granted by the catechism for highly unusual circumstances stretches beyond any reasonable interpretation that could be taken as granting permission.

The bottom line is that Catholics should not be looking for the loophole to do something that is inconsistent with our Christian view of the value of life and the dignity of the human person.

CRIMINOLOGY EXPERTS do not believe the death penalty effectively deters people from committing murder.

The death penalty significantly reduces the number of homicides.

Contraceptive brochure: 'You are married. Now don't get pregnant'?

Ironic that state gives moral instruction on birth control, while people pay little attention to church's moral teachings

Just when people ought to start making babies, my state tells them how not to.

In the state of Maryland (and probably in other states), when a couple receives their marriage license, the envelope contains a brochure titled "Family Planning for You."

I think it's strange.

Just when couples are morally free and socially responsible enough to create new life, society says, "Wait a minute, do you really want to have that child?" It is as if the state is saying, "You are married. Now don't get pregnant."

This is not a Democratic or Republican thing. Both parties have promoted this.

The brochures were first printed in 2006 under the previous Republican administration. They prominently carried the names of former Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich Jr., and former Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele. Steele is the Republican National Committee chairman and a Catholic.

The newer brochures bear the name of current Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who like Steele is Catholic.

Isn't it strange that Catholic officials of both parties are promoting forms of birth control that the church does not consider moral?

Here are Catholics putting their name on a brochure advocating the pill, condoms, sterilization, NuvaRing, Depo Provera, the "diaphragm & spermicide" and the morning-after pill. This last form of birth control is really a chemical abortion.

The brochure's only mention of natural family planning is in a segment called "Fertility Awareness Methods." It accurately states that NFP can be used "to avoid or achieve pregnancy."

But then, unlike all the other forms of birth control, it notes, "You must get special training to use these methods," but it does not say where to get this special training.

The implication is that natural family planning is too complicated for most people, which is not true. And what about the couple? Which of these messages are they meant to take away?

Marriage is a state of life in which couples can and should be open to new life. Yet they are given a worried message of "concern."

Ominously, the state offers questions to be considered: "Am I ready to become a parent? Will I be able to finish school? ... Will I be able to get or keep a decent job with health care benefits for my child and myself?"

Who knows these answers? I doubt

Parish Diary

FATHER PETER DALY

my parents did. But as to the question asking essentially if a couple really wants to be a mother or father, the answer ought to be, "Sure, that's why we got married."

Why is the government asking these questions? It seems it is trying to discourage pregnancies among married couples. Isn't it strange that the state sees fit to tell married couples how not to have babies?

One other question about these brochures occurred to me. If the state decides to recognize same-sex marriage, will it give out this same brochure to same-sex couples?

Probably not. And if not, what does that say? Are the two types of relationships really different? If heterosexual relationships and homosexual relationships are not both biologically generative, is that enough difference to treat them differently in law?

Last summer we marked the 40th anniversary of Pope Paul VI's encyclical on human life, "Humanae Vitae." It is ironic that the state gives moral instruction on birth control, while people pay little attention to the moral teaching of the church.

This brochure is inappropriate.

More places for prayer, Gospel needed for new vocations, says pope

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Young men need more places and more opportunities to listen to the word of God and reflect in silence so that they can better hear if God is calling them to the priesthood, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The low number of priestly ordinations in some parts of the world should not lead to discouragement, he said July 1 during his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square.

Instead it should be the impetus to increase the number of places dedicated "to silence and to listening to the word, and to take better care of spiritual direction and the sacrament of confession so that God's voice, which always continues to call and confirm, may be heard and readily followed by many young people," he said.

The pope dedicated his catechesis to the church's celebration of the Year for Priests, which began June 19.

He said there was a close link between the year of St. Paul, which ended June 28 and the current Year for Priests.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

There is a close link between the Pauline Year, which concluded last Sunday, and the church's current celebration of the Year for Priests.

As we have seen, St. Paul, in his life and his writings, teaches us that the mystery of Christ must stand at the very heart of our lives as individuals and as a community. This is true in a very special way of priests.

In St. John Mary Vianney, the patron saint of parish priests, we see a wonderful example of a priest whose person was completely identified with his ministry. The priest's personal identity, grounded in his calling and his sacramental configuration to Christ, may not be separated from his pastoral activity.

Indeed, the ministry of every priest is essentially "cultic" in the fullest sense of the word: it is meant to enable the faithful to offer their lives to God as a pleasing sacrifice (cf. Rom 12:1).

It is my hope that this Year for Priests will help all priests to appreciate the immense grace of their vocation, consecration and mission.

During this year may the whole church pray and work more fervently for the sanctification of priests, an increase of priestly vocations and a greater appreciation of the role of the priest in the life of the ecclesial community.

Forgiven but not yet purified

Sin's toxic effect creates cosmic debt that must be paid, forgiveness not withstanding

God is just. His infinite mercy, however, does not cancel his justice. The toxic effect of our sins creates a cosmic debt that must be paid.

Yes, we are forgiven, but we cannot enjoy the beatific vision until our soul is purified. This is the teaching of the church on purgatory. It is not spelled out fully for us, but we do know that after death a soul is not yet ready for heaven until it is completely purified.

This is where suffering comes in to play.

Suffering, when understood properly, is a great mystery because it can bring many spiritual blessings.

Permit me to pose a hypothetical question to you: Suppose Hitler sincerely asked for God's forgiveness moments before he died. We are certain that the Lord in his infinite mercy would forgive him.

Nevertheless, considering the monumental devastation and misery he caused, Hitler would have to pay in some way an enormous debt for his infamy.

It is like that with us too, even though we have sins not as monumental.

There is a thing called the "temporal punishment due to sin." This is part of the fullness of God's plan.

Mary, the mother of Jesus, continually asks us to fast and do penance in reparation for the sins of the world. She even warns against future catastrophes if we do not do penance.

Whether you believe in the validity of Mary's urgings or not, you should ponder the fact that millions of people make pilgrimages to Marian shrines all over the world. Many do so to offer their sufferings and humiliations in a spirit of reparation.

God wants us to share in his redemptive action. Even though he has personally forgiven us for our sins, there is still a toxic residue which we call the "temporal punishment due to sin."

As such, the purification of each person's soul is still underway even after death. This concept helps us to understand that suffering is not merely a negative thing; it has a meaningful and fruitful spiritual benefit in terms of eternity.

This knowledge helps us cope better with the pains and agonies of this life.

Suffering is the coin that purchased our redemption, for Christ surrendered himself to the Father, taking upon himself the sins of the world. This is what St. Paul means when he tells us to join our suffering to the suffering of Christ.

Suffering is a mystery we do not

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST

fully understand, but in the process of purification suffering is key. By our agonies we are able to participate in the Lord's work of redemption.

When I read St. Paul's words, "Help carry one another's burdens; in this way you will fulfill the law of Jesus Christ," I see beyond the idea of doing good deeds in this world. I see that suffering is redemptive.

Unhappiness comes to us in life. Good and worthy people suffer more than they deserve. In the cosmic scheme of things, however, by sharing in the cross of Christ we are cleansed.

It is perfectly normal to rebel and ask why we have to suffer, but in the mystery of life we learn that the cross is good. It earns us the gift of heaven.

At some point in the mysterious future, God's justice and mercy will meld, which makes it possible for his mercy to triumph in the end.

So for now be at peace in the knowledge that by offering your pains and humiliations for yourself — and the poor souls in purgatory — you are very pleasing to God.

ALBEMARLE —Bishop Peter J. Jugis celebrated a special Mass for the 75th anniversary of Our Lady of the Annunciation Church in Albemarle July 11.

Following the Mass was the dedication of the parish office in honor of Olive Rooney, former parish secretary of more than 30 years, and a dinner to celebrate the church anniversary.

"Everybody who has come here has loved the place," said Father Peter Fitzgibbons, pastor of Our Lady of the Annunciation Church. "It's a marvelous parish."

STITCHING A BRIGHTER FUTURE

Catholic parishioner Clare Liptak displays a few of the donated sewing machines that will be sent to Tanzania to help women there sew clothes for themselves and their families. A member of Mary, Mother of God Church in Hillsborough, N.J., Liptak shipped 30 machines to the African nation in 2008 and hopes this summer to ship 50 more, along with fabric and other sewing supplies.

Parishioner collects sewing machines for poor in Africa

HILLSBOROUGH, N.J. (CNS) — Clare Liptak is combining her Catholic faith with a love of sewing to help the poor in Africa stitch together a better life.

Liptak, a member of Mary, Mother of God Church, collects fabric and sewing machines to send to women in Tanzania to sew clothes for themselves and their families. She and her friend Kathleen "Kat" Wilson have 140 sewing machines in storage at Mary, Mother of God Church and another 19 at Liptak's home.

Liptak shipped 30 machines to Tanzania in 2008. This summer, she hopes to send 50 more along with fabric, sewing supplies, carpentry tools, equipment for a culinary program and children's books. The container being used to ship the items is supposed to be loaded Aug. 7.

The machines remaining in storage are awaiting shipment to poor families in rural Kentucky, she said.

"It is really a lot of fun to do this, and the people who donate are very generous," Liptak said. "Often the machine has been in their family a long time and they want it to be used. They don't want their grandmother's sewing machine to be thrown away."

Liptak traveled to Tanzania in 2008 and plans to return in June 2010.

Liptak and Wilson call their project "Give It Up for Good." They began collecting sewing machines in 2004 to send to the poor in Appalachia.

In 2006, Liptak heard about the daughter of a co-worker who was going on a humanitarian mission to Tanzania coordinated by the Brotherhood of Hope. In 2007, Liptak's interest in Tanzania increased when a visiting priest from that country, Father Venance Ndalichako, spoke during a Mass about his association with schools in that country. After Mass,

Father Ndalichako visited Liptak's home, where she lives with Joe, her husband of 27 years and "No. 1 volunteer."

"Kat and I were in the living room cleaning sewing machines," Liptak said. "I guess Father Ndalichako realized we were serious."

The meeting went so well that Father Ndalichako, who teaches economics at St. Augustine University in Mwanza, Tanzania, served as their tour guide when Liptak and Wilson visited Tanzania in November. He also arranged for them to stay at the home of Bishop Protase Rugambwa, head of the Kigoma Diocese.

Liptak and Wilson visited several schools in Tanzania, including the St. Gaspar Vocational Training Center in Dar es Salaam, which teaches tailoring.

"The principal at St. Gaspar's told us enrollment has increased because of the supplies we sent," Liptak said. "We were really thrilled to have made a difference like that."

Liptak said that the sewing machines make valuable tools in Tanzania, where the unemployment rate in some areas tops 90 percent.

All the machines sent by Liptak are electric, but some of the older models have a treadle, which allows for manual operation. This is important in areas where power outages are frequent, Liptak said.

Liptak said her outreach to Africa and Appalachia is an outgrowth of her faith and a desire to serve the community.

"I also like to sew and I would like to go around the world meeting women who sew. Sewing machines don't seem to be valued much anymore. A lot of people don't sew maybe because clothes are inexpensive, but also because people don't really have time," she added.

Nation called 'fortunate' to have Alabama physician as Obama nominee

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Sister Carol Keehan, president and CEO of the Catholic Health Association, said July 13 she thinks "this nation is so fortunate to have Regina (Benjamin) as surgeon general."

The Daughter of Charity made the comment in reaction to President Barack Obama's announcement earlier that day that he was nominating Dr. Regina Benjamin to be the surgeon general of the United States.

The Senate must confirm the nomination.

Benjamin, a Catholic, is founder and CEO of Bayou La Batre Rural Health Clinic in Bayou La Batre, Ala. She is renowned for her outreach to the poor, seeing patients regardless of their ability to pay for her services.

When her clinic was destroyed by Hurricane George in 1998 and again by Hurricane Katrina in 2005, Benjamin personally financed its reconstruction.

Benjamin belongs to the Shrine of the Holy Cross Church in Daphne, Ala., a historically African-American parish that her mother helped found.

She holds a medical degree from the University of Alabama School of Medicine in Birmingham and a master's degree in business administration from Tulane University in New Orleans.

She was the first African-American woman and the first person under 40 to be elected to the board of trustees of the American Medical Association.

Pope Benedict XVI awarded Benjamin the Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice Cross, a papal honor, in 2006. She also began a three-year term on the CHA board that year.

Msgr. Michael Farmer, chancellor of the Archdiocese of Mobile, Ala., said Benjamin was nominated for the papal honor because of "her commitment to her faith as well as for putting her faith into practice."

FROM THE VATICAN

Tourism is a chance to appreciate diversity God created, says Vatican

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Tourism offers a unique opportunity to encounter the tremendous diversity God created on earth, said the Pontifical Council for Migrants and Travelers in a message for World Tourism Day.

"In contemplating diversity, the human person discovers traces of the divine in the footprints of what is human," the council said in the message signed by the council's president, Archbishop Antonio Maria Veglio, and secretary, Archbishop Agostino Marchetto.

The Vatican released the message July 10 for the celebration sponsored by the U.N. World Tourism Organization. The theme of the Sept. 27 event is "Tourism — Celebrating Diversity."

For people of faith, "differences as a whole open ways by which one can draw near the infinite greatness of God," the message said.

Fear of what is different and fear of the unknown lie at the root of prejudice, discrimination and misunderstandings between cultures, peoples and religions, it said. Diversity is not a threat or a danger, but an opportunity to be enriched by different cultures, it said.

People must do everything possible "to transform discrimination, xenophobia and intolerance into understanding and mutual acceptance through the roads of respect, education and open, constructive and binding dialogue," said the message.

Tourism puts people in contact with different religions and different ways of living or seeing the world and its history, it said.

Even travelling the World Wide Web is a form of virtual tourism that allows people to observe diversity at a close range and build bridges with those who are different, it said.

The council said it hoped mutual knowledge will build "a more just, supportive and fraternal society."

will begin a 3-week session in July. Theology on Tap is a casual forum where people gather to learn and discuss church teachings. Doctrinal congregation says direct abortion can never be justified

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Commenting on the controversial case of a 9-year-old Brazilian rape victim who underwent an abortion, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith said the concern the church needs to show the girl does not change the fact that abortion is wrong.

In declaring that the doctors and others who were involved in helping the girl procure an abortion automatically incurred excommunication, the church does not intend to deny the girl mercy and understanding, said the statement published in the July 11 edition of the Vatican newspaper L'Osservatore Romano.

The penalty of excommunication "places in evidence the gravity of the crime committed (and) the irreparable damage caused to the innocent who was killed, to the parents and to all of society," the statement said.

In early March doctors at a hospital in Recife performed an abortion on the girl, who was pregnant with twins, weighed a little more than 66 pounds and reportedly had been raped repeatedly by her stepfather from the time she was 6 years old. Abortion in Brazil is illegal except in cases of rape or if the mother's life is in danger.

Interviewed by the media after the abortion, then-Archbishop Jose Cardoso Sobrinho of Olinda and Recife noted that abortion always was a sin and that, according to canon law, anyone participating in the abortion — including the girl's mother and her doctors — would automatically incur excommunication.

In the midst of expressions of outrage from around the world over what appeared to be a lack of pastoral concern and compassion for the girl, Archbishop Rino Fisichella, head of the Pontifical Academy for Life, said the church's first reaction should have been to minister to the girl.

The girl "should have been defended, hugged and held tenderly to help her feel that we were all on her side," said Archbishop Fisichella.

The doctrinal congregation said the statements from church leaders led to some confusion about the position of the church.

"In this regard, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith reaffirms that the doctrine of the church on procured abortion has not and cannot change," the statement said.

To deliberately abort a fetus is to kill an innocent human being, it said, but said that performing an abortion to save a mother's life is different from carrying out a medical procedure that may have the side effect of causing a miscarriage as long as the death of the fetus was not the goal of the intervention.

Refreshing the spirit

Pope Benedict XVI walks with other church officials in the Italian Alpine village of Les Combes July 13 as he arrives for his annual vacation. The pontiff will stay in a chalet near the French border with a view of Mont Blanc until July 29.

During his Angelus July 12, the pope called on vacationers to drive safely and asked that they use their time off to renew body and soul and grow closer to God.

He said he was praying for those on vacation or pilgrimages, that they would find "refreshment in body and spirit and an opportunity to draw closer to the Lord in prayer and thanksgiving."

DIOCESAN REQUIREMENTS FOR REPORTING MINISTRY-RELATED SEXUAL ABUSE OF A MINOR

1. Any individual having actual knowledge of or reasonable cause to suspect an incident of ministry-related sexual abuse is to immediately report the incident to the Chancery.
2. The Chancery will then report the incident to the proper civil authorities. The individual reporting the incident to the Chancery will be notified of the particulars regarding the Chancery's filing of the incident with civil authorities.
3. This reporting requirement is not intended to supersede the right of an individual to make a report to civil authority, but is to ensure proper, complete and timely reporting. Should an individual choose to make a report to civil authority, a report is still to be made to the Chancery.

MONTAGNARDS ARRIVE THROUGH CATHOLIC SOCIAL SERVICES

CHARLOTTE — Employees from the accounting firm Deloitte and Touche recently put down their calculators and picked up furniture to help a local refugee family.

Fifteen employees from the firm's Charlotte office, which serves as the external auditor for the Diocese of Charlotte, worked with the diocesan Refugee Resettlement Office of Catholic Social Services to set up a two-bedroom apartment for Ep Ka, a Montagnard farmer now living in Charlotte, in preparation for the arrival of his family from Vietnam.

The June 5 effort was part of the firm's annual "IMPACT Day," in which Deloitte and Touche employees perform service projects in their communities.

Montagnards, from the French for "from the mountain," are indigenous people of Vietnam's Central Highlands who assisted U.S. Special Forces during the Vietnam War.

Ka was forced to flee his family and homeland two years ago under threat of imprisonment by the communist government for being a "nonviolent protestor." Traveling by night and hiding in the jungle by day, he fled across the border to a refugee camp in Cambodia.

He was eventually interviewed by the U. S. State Department and referred to CSS's Refugee Resettlement Office in Charlotte. Upon arriving in the United States, Ka shared an apartment with several other Montagnard men who had been resettled in Charlotte through the Refugee Resettlement Office.

Ka worked daily at the job the office acquired for him, but his ambitions centered on reuniting with his wife and three children and establishing a new home for them in the United States.

Finally in May 2009, Ka received word that his family would arrive in Charlotte June 17. The Refugee Resettlement Office helped him locate a two-bedroom apartment, but needed assistance with furnishing it.

The Deloitte and Touch employees helped set up donated furniture, connected the washer and dryer, and stocked the kitchen with necessities and culturally-appropriate foods. The employees also presented Ka's family with a gift card to buy needed clothing.

"At the end of the day, I felt really good about the work I had done and the happiness we had brought for someone and their family who greatly needed our help and support," said employee Kira Parker.

Because of a decrease in donated items and funding cuts, the Refugee Resettlement Office is in critical need of groups willing to help set up apartments for other new refugees. Office members will offer step-by-step guidance in the process and preparation.

The workshop was designed to help Catholics use the exegetical approach to understanding the Bible, meaning that the Scriptures' authors were inspired by the Holy Spirit so that the texts convey a divine revelation. The approach analyzes the literary genre, the culture of the audience, the writers' historical purposes and the transcendent meaning of the text. During the workshop, participants compared the English translations with their Korean-language Bibles.

as a beacon of the faith in Stanly County," wrote Father Fitzgibbons in the 75th anniversary edition of the church directory.

"Despite trial and trouble, this light has not gone out but has grown in beauty. Our parish has seen consistent growth, not only in numbers but most importantly in faith," he wrote.

"It is the great people of God who have really kept this parish together. They fought to retain their faith and it is very dear to them," said Father Fitzgibbons. "They do not take it for granted."

"It is the great people of God who have really kept this parish together. They do not take (their faith) for granted."

— Father Peter Fitzgibbons

Church history

The first Catholic residents arrived in the area in 1887.

From then until 1934, visiting priests celebrated Mass in Stanly County. During that period many families traveled by train to Salisbury to attend religious services.

The first Masses were celebrated in a frame house on North Second Street, that was purchased for $5,000.

The building served as the rectory until 1941. During those years Father James Cowan celebrated Mass in the living room until a monetary gift from Our Lady of the Annunciation Church in New York made the first church possible.

The building was completed Sept. 1, 1934 and dedicated Sept. 4. At that time, the congregation consisted of nine Catholic families.

The growing textile industry brought more Catholics to the area and the parish grew modestly to 35 families by the mid-1940s.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis is pictured with members of the Daughters of Mary at the reception following the 75th anniversary Mass of Our Lady of the Annunciation Church in Albermarle July 11.

When the church celebrated its 25th anniversary in 1959, there were 75 families. Today there are 320 families, including a large population of Hmong and Hispanic parishioners.

Highlights

In 1966 the parish hall was constructed, giving parishioners a place to hold religious education classes as well as host social events.

By 1970 it became apparent that the church could no longer accommodate the 102 families who attended services.

Funding for the new church began with a generous contribution from the estate of Father Cowan, who had served as pastor from 1934 to 1968, and his late mother, Margaret Cowan.

The building, which was designed to hold 380 parishioners, was dedicated by Raleigh Bishop Vincent S. Waters July 31, 1971.

The former church was donated to the Albermarle Junior Women's Club and moved to Rock Creek Park where it is used by various community organizations.

In 1984 the church celebrated its golden jubilee. In 1989 a mission, Our Lady of the Americas, was established in Biscoe. In 1990 then Bishop Michael J. Begley dedicated the newly-built family life center in Albermarle.

Pope, Obama discuss bioethics, G-8 summit

"Dignitas Personae" ("The Dignity of a Person").

When presenting the gifts after their 35-minute closed-door meeting, the pope gave Obama a signed, white leather-bound copy of the encyclical, "Caritas in Veritate" ("Charity in Truth"), then gave him the light-green soft-cover instruction on bioethics issued last December by the Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

"Oh, what we discussed earlier," said Obama, referring to their closed-door discussions. "I will have some reading to do on the plane."

Obama was given the instruction to help him better understand the church's position on bioethics, Msgr. Georg Ganswein, papal secretary, told journalists in the pool covering the visit.

Obama arrived at the Vatican shortly before 4 p.m., and a squad of Swiss Guards saluted him in the St. Damasus Courtyard of the Apostolic Palace.

U.S. Archbishop James Harvey, prefect of the papal household, was the first to greet the president, and he accompanied Obama to a meeting with Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, Vatican secretary of state.

Pope Benedict and Obama sat at a desk in the papal library and discussed the Group of Eight summit — the meeting of the world's wealthy industrialized countries, which concluded that morning in L'Aquila, Italy. The summit focused on the economic crisis, climate change and global tensions.

After the pope welcomed Obama, the president said: "Thank you so much. It's a great honor for me. Thank you so much."

Pope Benedict told the president, "You must be tired after all these discussions."

Obama responded that the meetings were "very productive" and marked "great progress" and "something concrete," although the precise topic they were discussing at that point was unclear.

The pope and Obama discussed issues that represent "a great challenge for the future of every nation and for the true progress of peoples, such as the defense and promotion of life and the right to abide by one's conscience," according to a Vatican statement released after the audience.

The two men also discussed world issues addressed at the G-8 summit, as well as immigration and the issue of reuniting families, the Vatican statement said.

The meeting with the pope and a separate 20-minute meeting with Cardinal Bertone also touched on international politics, such as the peace process in the Middle East, "on which there was general agreement."

"Dialogue between cultures and religions, the global economic crisis and its ethical implications, food security, development aid — especially for Africa and Latin America — and the problem of drug trafficking" were discussed, the Vatican said.

"Finally, the importance of educating young people everywhere in the value of tolerance was highlighted," it said.

At the end of the meeting, Pope Benedict told the president, "A blessing on all your work and also for you."

The president responded: "Thank you very much. We look forward to building a strong relationship between our countries."

Exchanging ideas, gifts

The Vatican spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, told reporters after the audience that "great serenity and great cordiality" characterized the meeting. Father Lombardi said he spoke with the pope after the meeting and the pope "seemed extremely satisfied with how the meeting went."

"The president explicitly expressed his commitment to reducing the numbers of abortions and to listen to the church's concerns on moral issues," he said.

Denis McDonough, deputy national security adviser for strategic communications and a member of Obama's entourage, later spoke to reporters about many of the points in the Vatican statement, adding that the two men also discussed Cuba, Honduras and outreach to Muslim communities.

"I think the president was eager to listen to the Holy Father, was obviously eager to learn more about his views" on issues such as abortion and stem cells, he said.

McDonough said the president asked the pope to pray for his family and expressed his appreciation for the role Cardinal Oscar Rodriguez Maradiaga of Tegucigalpa, Honduras, was playing in trying to resolve the political crisis in his country after the June 28 coup that ousted President Manuel Zelaya.

After their closed-door meeting, Obama introduced the pope to his wife, Michelle, their daughters, Malia and Sasha, and Michelle Obama's mother, Marian Robinson.

There was a private exchange of gifts and a moment for photographs. The pope gave each of the girls a silver key chain with a bas-relief image of the pope, and Michelle Obama and Robinson received papal medals.

Obama's entourage also included Gen. James Jones, national security adviser; Mona Sutphen, White House deputy chief of staff; Robert Gibbs, White House press secretary; and David Axelrod, senior adviser to the president.

In addition to the encyclical and Vatican bioethics document, Pope Benedict gave Obama a mosaic showing St. Peter's Basilica and Square and a medal marking the fifth year of his pontificate.

The president told the pope the mosaic, which was made in the Vatican's mosaic studio, "was very beautiful" and would have "a place of honor" in the White House.

Obama gave the pope a liturgical stole that had been on the remains of St. John Neumann, the first U.S. male citizen to be proclaimed a saint.

U.S. President Barack Obama and his wife, Michelle, meet with Pope Benedict XVI at the Vatican July 10.

St. John Neumann, Philadelphia's fourth bishop, is enshrined in a glass casket under an altar at St. Peter the Apostle Church in Philadelphia. New vestments have been placed on his remains four times since his 1860 death — in 1903, 1962, 1989 and 2008.

The pope thanked the president for the gift and looked very pleased, saying the saint had been "a wonderful person."

The saint was a Redemptorist priest, and the Baltimore province of the order gave Obama the stole, which had been removed from the casket in 2008.

Father Lombardi told pool reporters that giving the pope such a relic was "a sign of care, of sensitivity."

Possibility for good

Patrick Whelan, president of Catholic Democrats, told Catholic News Service in Rome July 10 that with Obama's visit and the nomination of Miguel Diaz, a theologian, as ambassador to the Holy See, "I think there is a new era about to be launched — a positive, productive one."

"I think people at the Vatican realize he has some grounding in Catholic social teaching" and that he is able to mobilize and motivate young people for good, Whelan said.

On the issue of abortion, "Obama has taken a third way — the whole abortion-reduction strategy is not just window dressing," he said. "I think they (Obama administration officials) are very committed to doing something to reduce abortions without resorting to criminalization."

Whelan said studies have shown that poverty has a huge impact on abortion rates and "I think the best thing for the unborn was Obama's economic stimulus package."

McDonough said Obama had been influenced by Catholic social teaching and by Catholic social service programs, particularly when he worked with Catholic-funded programs as a community organizer in Chicago.

Speaking as a Catholic, the deputy said, "The president, in both his words and in his deeds, expresses many things that many Catholics recognize as fundamental to our teaching."

"One is that the president often refers to the fundamental belief that each person is endowed with dignity," he said, adding that Obama "often underscores that dignity of people is a driving goal in what we hope to accomplish in development policy, for example, and in foreign policy."

AROUND THE DIOCESE

Diocese of Charlotte launches Year for Priests Web page

BY DAVID HAINS
COMMUNICATIONS DIRECTOR

CHARLOTTE — The priesthood is receiving special recognition on the Diocese of Charlotte's Web site.

Pope Benedict XVI has declared June 2009 through June 2010 as the Year for Priests, a time to recognize the important roles that priests play in the life of the church.

"The centrality of Christ brings with it the correct appreciation of the ministerial priesthood, without which there would be neither the Eucharist, nor even the mission nor the church herself," the pope said in announcing the year.

He called for the dates to coincide with the 150th anniversary of the death of St. John Vianney, who was famed for his priestly ministry.

The Diocese of Charlotte has set up an interactive Web page that will allow visitors to share stories of their experiences with priests and gratitude for their sacramental, spiritual and pastoral leadership.

The page also will feature videos relating to the Year for Priests, personal essays on the priesthood and a link to information about vocations in the diocese.

The diocese is served by approximately 144 active and retired diocesan and religious order priests.

Priest appointed pastor of St. Eugene Church

ASHEVILLE — Bishop Peter J. Jugis has appointed Father Edward Sheridan as pastor of St. Eugene Church in Asheville and administrator of Asheville Catholic School.

The appointment of Father Sheridan will take effect Aug. 1.

Although Fr. Sheridan is coming out of retirement for the assignment, he said he is delighted to return to full-time ministry and looks forward to many years of service to the church and school in Asheville.

Father Sheridan has been a priest for 46 years. Ordained to the priesthood in 1963, he is 71 years old.

He has served as pastor of numerous parishes throughout the Diocese of Charlotte, including in Asheville, Charlotte, Hickory and Winston-Salem.

He served as the first superintendent of Catholic schools for the diocese. He also has served as school administrator at three diocesan high schools and has been involved with parish-based schools for many years.

Lectures explore church's views on human rights, common good

BY KATHLEEN HEALY
SCHMIEDER
CORRESPONDENT

HENDERSONVILLE — The Catholic Church's understanding of human rights and the common good were recently explored at lectures throughout the diocese.

Jesuit Father Joseph Koterski, an associate professor of philosophy at Jesuit-run Fordham University in New York, returned to the diocese for the fifth consecutive year to speak on the topic at parishes in Asheville, Charlotte, Hendersonville and Winston-Salem.

"I hope to give a sense of what the position in the Catholic Church is and how it differs from secular discourse," said Father Koterski during his lecture at Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville June 29.

The priest's lectures, sponsored by the diocesan Office of Justice and Peace, utilized passages from the Catechism of the Catholic Church; the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace's Compendium of the Social Doctrine of the Church, which provides a concise and complete overview of the church's social teaching; and the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith's "Dignitas Personae" ("The Dignity of a Person"), which addresses a range of bioethics issues including stem cell therapies, embryo experimentation and infertility treatments.

Father Koterski also explored the relationships between ethics, the nature of the human person and reality as a whole.

"Utilitarian and libertarian meanings refer to the common good as the sum total of the individual good. Often the same words are used, but they mean different things," he said.

In the catechism, "common good" is used not just to refer to individual interests. The church uses the term "common good" to refer to the public good, where it is good for everyone."

In regard to political and moral discussions, Father Koterski referred to the fundamental doctrine of duty to God and others as opposed to the secular principle of maximizing pleasure and minimizing pain.

Jesuit Father Joseph Koterski

"Our human rights are inextricably paired with our duties," said Father Koterski. "Dignity comes with human nature."

To deal with current societal issues, it becomes a moral obligation to address the issues of the common good through church teachings, he said.

Within the last century the church began to address the idea of human rights as well as Christian duty. Father Koterski said there is continued work underway to provide answers for Catholics facing secular positions that call into question the Christian response to issues such as abortion, capital punishment and other global concerns.

By focusing on the concept of humans made in the likeness of God, Father Koterski compared and contrasted the differences between the morality, anthropology and reality of the church and the secular world.

"The church should teach with much clarity what the principles are, but the church is not responsible for solutions," said Father Koterski.

However, he noted the efforts made to bring these principles to fruition for the benefit of society.

"The Catholic social system has devised some wonderful systems including hospitals and schools," he said.

As societal changes continue to challenge Catholics to remain faithful to church teachings in a world focusing more on the immediate rather than the immortal, Father Koterski said our rights and responsibilities become more entwined.

The need to reinforce the church's position is being addressed from within the hierarchy, but ultimately, said Father Koterski, it is with each person that church doctrine will find its way into the community forums.

"You have to be able to state your opinion," said Father Koterski. "It only works if you speak up to the public domain."

programs and in economic recovery efforts if they are to have real and lasting benefits, the pope said.

Charity, or love, is not an option for Christians, he said, and "practicing charity in truth helps people understand that adhering to the values of Christianity is not merely useful, but essential for building a good society and for true integral development," he wrote.

Critiquing the crisis

In addressing the global economic crisis and the enduring poverty of the world's poorest countries, he said, "the primary capital to be safeguarded and valued is man, the human person in his or her integrity."

The global dimension of the financial crisis is an expression of the moral failure of greedy financiers and investors, of the lack of oversight by national governments and of a lack of understanding that the global economy required internationally recognized global control, Pope Benedict said.

"In the face of the unrelenting growth of global interdependence, there is a strongly felt need, even in the midst of a global recession, for a reform of the United Nations organization, and likewise of economic institutions and international finance, so that the concept of the family of nations can acquire real teeth," the pope wrote.

"To manage the global economy; to revive economies hit by the crisis; to avoid any deterioration of the present crisis and the greater imbalances that would result; to bring about integral and timely disarmament, food security and peace; to guarantee the protection of the environment and to regulate migration: for all this, there is urgent need of a true world political authority," he said.

Pope Benedict insisted that the idea of the world's richest nations scaling back development aid while focusing on their own economic recovery overlooked the long-term economic benefits of solidarity and not simply the human and Christian moral obligation to help the poor.

"In the search for solutions to the current economic crisis, development aid for poor countries must be considered a valid means of creating wealth for all," the pope said.

The economic growth of poorer countries and their citizens' demands for consumer goods actually benefit producers in the world's wealthier nations, he said.

The pope said that "more economically developed nations should do all they can to allocate larger portions of their gross domestic product to development aid," respecting the obligations they made to the U.N. Millennium Development Goals aimed at significantly reducing poverty by 2015.

Life matters

Pope Benedict said food and water are the "universal rights of all human beings without distinction or discrimination" and are part of the basic right to life.

He also said that being pro-life means being pro-development, especially given the connection between poverty and infant mortality, and that the only way to promote the true development of people is to promote a culture in which every human life is are inextricably united.

If society does not respect human life from its conception to its natural end, "if human conception, gestation and birth are made artificial, if human embryos are sacrificed to research, the conscience of society ends up losing the concept of human ecology and, along with it, that of environmental ecology," he said.

Development programs and offers of aid that encourage coercive population-control methods and the promotion of abortion do not have the good of people at heart and limit the recipients' motivation to become actors in their own development and progress, the pope said.

In addition, he said, an anti-life mentality in the world's richest countries is related to the lack of concern for the poor.

"How can we be surprised by the indifference shown toward situations of human degradation when such indifference extends even to our attitude toward what is and is not human?" the pope asked.

"While the poor of the world continue knocking on the doors of the rich, the world of affluence runs the risk of no longer hearing those knocks on account of a conscience that can no longer distinguish what is human," he said.

Better business

Pope Benedict also emphasized church teaching that making money and being wealthy are not sins, but that the way the money is made and the way it is used can be.

The encyclical condemned corruption, the exploitation of workers, the destruction of the environment, the continuing practice of wealthy nations imposing such high tariffs on imports that they shut poor countries out of the international marketplace and, especially, an "excessive zeal" for enforcing patents, especially on

"The primary capital to be safeguarded and valued is man, the human person in his or her integrity."

medications that could save the lives of thousands of poor people if they were available at a reasonable cost.

Pope Benedict called for "a profoundly new way of understanding business," which recognizes that investors are not a company's only stakeholders, no matter how the business is structured and financed.

Employees, those who produce the raw materials, people who live in the communities where the company is based, where its products originate and where its products are sold all have a stake in the business, the pope said.

He also said that investing always has a moral as well as an economic significance.

"What should be avoided is a speculative use of financial resources that yields to the temptation of seeking only short-term profit without regard for the long-term sustainability of the enterprise, its benefit to the real economy and attention to the advancement — in suitable and appropriate ways — of further economic initiatives in countries in need of development," he said.

Texas author's book links saints to Scripture

BY ANGELA CAVE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Theresa Doyle-Nelson couldn't find any books about saints mentioned in the Bible.

So she wrote one herself.

"It dawned on me: Maybe this is my book to write," Doyle-Nelson said.

Setting out to do research, she found the Internet rife with mediocre information, with one Web site even canonizing Adam and Eve. Starting from scratch, she used a list of saints from "Butler's Lives of the Saints" published in 1756, and did her own investigating.

The result is the author's first book, "Saints of the Bible," which was published in March. The saints are arranged by church feast days starting with Mary, the mother of God, on Jan. 1 and ending with the Holy Innocents on Dec. 28.

Each saint's history is briefly chronicled and accompanied by Bible verse references.

Doyle-Nelson, a former elementary schoolteacher, said she kept the book at about a fifth-grade reading level.

"I don't like things that get too lofty or sophisticated," she told Catholic News Service in a telephone interview.

Reviewers and readers have responded positively to its brevity and simplification of a complex topic. After its first two weeks on shelves, 800 copies were sold. One of her Protestant friends had never heard the story of St. Raphael the Archangel — patron of young people, peacefulness and healing — until reading her book because the saint is only mentioned in the Book of Tobit in the Old Testament.

She said several readers have enjoyed reading about lesser-known saints.

In addition to informing adults, "Saints of the Bible" would serve as a resource for confirmation candidates, Doyle-Nelson said. Her Web site, <http://theresadoyle-nelson.com>, features teaching tools she created to correspond with the book.

Doyle-Nelson has written about Catholicism for journals and magazines for 12 years, covering such topics as house churches in the New Testament, religious art and Mary's queenship. She lives in Pipe Creek, Texas, with her husband and three sons.

Faith in God will provide more than we can imagine

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

My friend Dave, a microbiologist, was preparing for a lab experiment last week. He tried to explain his task to me in laymen's terms, and I think I understood, sort of.

Basically it was this: Certain microbes, if introduced into a certain environment, would alter it through the action of their normal life function.

Dave said he spent hours calculating how many microbes to use in this experiment. He decided to check his conclusion by trying to examine these microbes under a microscope, although he didn't expect to see much since their natural setting blurs the image.

But he accidentally mis-set the microscope and was surprised to get a clear look. What he saw was that this microbial community was exponentially thicker than previously believed.

His numbers were way off.

Dave was amused and gratified. "It just goes to show you that God has so much more for us than we can ever imagine!" he said.

A scientist of abiding faith, Dave knows the truth revealed in this weekend's Scriptures. Elisha's barley loaves provide for more people than seems possible. Jesus' miraculous multiplication of the five loaves and two fish feeds more than 5,000 men.

In each case there was plenty left over too.

God provides for our need and has more besides — more than we can imagine.

Yes, it is hard to imagine how Jesus can make five loaves of bread satisfy 5,000 people. But knowing how isn't what's important for our faith. What's important is knowing that God can do it and God chooses to do it.

God doesn't gather from some supply. God creates — infinitely. That is who God is.

God also is Love. So God gives to us — infinitely.

God even shares with us his act of creating! Endless new music is created every day — drawn from a bottomless well of ideas that also enter the minds of countless artists, writers, scientists, chefs, teachers, etc., for generations.

For our part, we are called to trust in what God places in our lives for the sake of his life and to receive and share his creation in the spirit of love through which he offers it.

Questions:

What has God provided in your life that has been "more than you could imagine" from him? How have you accepted and shared such gifts?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"And when they had eaten, there was some left over, as the Lord had said" (2 Kings 4:44).

Movie magic

Daniel Radcliffe stars as Harry Potter, Emma Watson as Hermione Granger and Rupert Grint as Ron Weasley in "Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince."

Vatican newspaper praises values in new Harry Potter film

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican newspaper gave the new Harry Potter movie four stars for promoting "friendship, altruism, loyalty and self-giving."

As "Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince" was set to open worldwide July 15, L'Osservatore Romano, the Vatican newspaper, once again downplayed concerns that the film and book series by J.K. Rowling promote magic and witchcraft.

"Certainly, Rowling's vision lacks a reference to transcendence, to a providential design in which people live their personal histories and history itself takes shape," the paper said in its July 14 edition.

But, it said, the new film and the books make clear "the line of demarcation between one who does good and one who does evil, and it is not difficult for the reader or the viewer to identify with the first."

"This is particularly true in the latest film," the review said. "They know that doing good is the right thing to do. And they also understand that sometimes this involves hard work and sacrifice."

The magic in Harry Potter is similar to the magic found "in classic fairy tales," it said.

When the book is finished or the film credits roll, what is remembered are "the values of friendship, altruism, loyalty and self-giving" rather than the magic tricks, the newspaper said.

L'Osservatore said the film "Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince," the sixth Harry Potter film, is the best adaptation so far.

"As the characters—now adolescents on the threshold of adulthood—have grown, the tone of the story has as well, and the film benefits," it said.

The Vatican newspaper said the fact that the teen stars are starting to experience a bit of romance, "with the right balance, makes them more credible" because "they are called to face the same problems as their 'Muggle' peers."

In the Harry Potter series "Muggles" are people not endowed with magical powers.

Summer success

Students use computers at St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem July 1 during a session of the school's Read Naturally summer program.

School program helps students' reading skills

WINSTON-SALEM — The computer lab at St. Leo the Great School was a busy place of learning this summer.

The lab hosted a summer reading enrichment course based on Read Naturally, a research-based program that combines teacher modeling, repeated reading and assessment and monitoring to improve oral reading fluency and reading comprehension.

Fourth-grade teacher Patti Eiffe, second-grade teacher Lindsay Hodgson and librarian and French teacher Christine Hurley assisted 52 students during the 1-hour sessions over the 5-week course June 16 through July 16.

"We have a variety of students with a wide range of needs this summer," said Eiffe. "Some students are already reading above their grade levels, but the practice that this program provides — and the high interest level of the non-fiction stories of the program — keep them motivated to make even further improvements."

Eiffe said the program also served students who may be struggling with reading.

"They range from rising first-graders to rising eighth-graders. The program is flexible enough to meet their needs, whether for help with specific phonetic patterns or with oral reading fluency and comprehension," said Eiffe.

The program is in its fourth summer at the school and continues to grow.

"Some of our students are St. Leo students who also use the program during the school year," said Hodgson. "But increasingly, we are reaching out to other children in our local parishes and communities to help students who don't have access to the program in their own schools."

This summer, English is a second language for many of the students who participated.

"The practice that the program provides, and the opportunity to 'read along' with a proficient reader, gives them the chance to build their confidence and their skills," said Eiffe.

St. Leo the Great Church sponsored 17 of the 52 students in this summer's program.

"Thanks to the generosity of St. Leo parish, we are able to offer scholarships to children who can really benefit from the program, but would not be able to afford the tuition," said Hodgson.

Helping students to improve is what drives the teachers involved.

"What means the most to us is seeing the glow in a child's eyes when he or she first experiences reading success," said Hurley.

"During one of our sessions, a rising eighth-grader brought his mom who spoke no English into our lab to watch him work and see the progress he was making," said Hurley. "When we saw the pride on her face and his — well, that made our whole summer worthwhile."

1923 — 2009: The Honorable Robert Daniel Potter

Catholic judge remembered for humility, courage, commitment

CHARLOTTE — The Honorable Robert Daniel Potter, senior U.S. district judge for the Western District of North Carolina, died July 2 at Carolinas Medical Center following a brief illness. He was 86.

A Mass of Christian burial was celebrated at St. Patrick Cathedral July 7. Internment followed at Belmont Abbey cemetery in Belmont.

While Potter, a parishioner of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte, was a judge known for stern lectures and long sentences, friends and colleagues remember him as a man of deep humility, integrity, courage and commitment to his family.

He was born April 4, 1923 in Wilmington. Following service as a second lieutenant in the U.S. Army from 1944 through 1946, he graduated from Duke University in 1947 and then Duke University Law School.

In 1950 he began practicing law in Charlotte and, five years later, opened a law office as a sole practitioner until he became a judge in 1981.

In 1966, he ran and was elected to the Mecklenburg County Commission; he served until 1968. Upon the recommendation of U.S. Sen. Jesse Helms, in 1981 President Ronald Reagan appointed Potter as a U.S. district judge for the Western District of North Carolina.

He later served for many years as

Judge Robert D. Potter

Chief United States District Court Judge — the first Catholic to hold that office in North Carolina in the past century. He served until Dec. 31, 2000.

Among his celebrated cases were the 1989 sentencing of PTL evangelist Jim Bakker and his controversial 1999 ruling that stopped race-based school assignments in Charlotte-Mecklenburg Schools.

Potter was active in public life and served as a board member of Mercy Hospital and Christendom College in Virginia. He was a Knight of the Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulchre of Jerusalem.

He received many honors and awards. In 1982 Pope John Paul II conferred upon him the Benedictine Medal for distinguished Christian service. He received the Pro Deo et Patria Medal from Christendom College in 1990 and was awarded an honorary doctor of laws degree from Sacred Heart College in Belmont.

Bishops criticize NIH funding rules for embryonic stem cell research research issued by the National Institutes of Health.

In a joint statement issued July 10, Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte and Bishop Michael F. Burbidge of Raleigh said they joined Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia in deploring the "unethical guidelines" adopted by NIH.

"Embryonic stem cell research requires the destruction of a human embryo, a human life," said the bishops' statement. "These guidelines permit the death of human life in order to pursue unpromising research in the hope of curing genetic defects and other serious infirmities."

In a statement issued July 7, Cardinal Rigali said the final guidelines are "even broader" than the draft guidelines issued by NIH and he asked Americans to contact their members of Congress, "urging them not to codify or further expand this unethical policy."

The cardinal also criticized NIH for ignoring "the comments of tens of thousands of Americans opposing the destruction of innocent human life for stem cell research."

"Even comments filed by the Catholic bishops' conference and others against specific abuses in the draft guidelines were not addressed," he added. "Existing federal law against funding research in which human embryos are harmed or destroyed is not given due respect here."

In a telephone briefing with the media July 6, the day before the final guidelines took effect, NIH acting director Dr. Raynard Kington said 30,000 of the approximately 49,000 comments received by NIH during a monthlong period of public comment opposed any federal funding of such research.

But those responses were "deemed not responsive to the question put forth," Kington said. "We did not ask them whether" to fund such research, "but how it should be funded."

Richard Doerflinger, associate director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat of Pro-Life Activities, said it was "disingenuous (for Kington) to say that comments criticizing the guidelines overall were to be ignored."

The 30,000 individuals or organizations that made comments in opposition to federal funding of embryonic stem cell research were saying, "You're not responding to what the American people want. Start over," Doerflinger added.

Guidelines glance

NIH's final guidelines are not significantly different from the draft guidelines published April 23 and open for public comment until May 26.

The draft guidelines allowed the use of federal funds for embryonic stem cell research only on embryos created for reproductive purposes at in vitro fertilization clinics and no longer needed for that purpose.

They set standards for voluntary informed consent by those donating the embryos, and said no NIH funds would be given for research that did not meet the standards.

The final guidelines, however, set up an "alternative pathway" for approval of funding of research involving embryos donated before the new guidelines took effect or involving stem cell lines developed in foreign countries.

A working group made up of about 10 scientists and ethicists will look at each such application on a case-by-case basis, Kington said, to determine whether it meets "the core principles of voluntary informed consent."

Like the draft, the final guidelines specifically ban funding for "research using human embryonic stem cells derived from other sources, including somatic cell nuclear transfer, parthenogenesis and/or IVF embryos created for research purposes."

Also prohibited is funding of research in which stem cells "are introduced into nonhuman primate blastocysts" or research "involving the breeding of animals where the introduction of human embryonic stem cells or human-induced pluripotent stem cells may contribute to the germ line."

The final guidelines also call for the establishment of "a new registry listing human embryonic stem cells eligible for NIH-funded research."

Contacting Congress

Cardinal Rigali said the debate over embryonic stem cell research "now shifts to Congress, where some members have said even this policy does not go far enough in treating some human beings as objects to be created, manipulated and destroyed for others' use."

"I hope Americans concerned about this issue will write to their elected representatives, urging them not to codify or further expand this unethical policy," he added.

The N.C. bishops' statement also called for Catholics in North Carolina to contact their elected representatives to "urge them to support only legislation that will fund adult stem cell research."

"Adult stem cell research... has shown tremendous promise in the race to cure genetic defects and serious infirmities," said the bishops. "This research, which respects both science and ethics, should be the place where we target our federal tax dollars."

The bishops said it was "imperative that Catholics make their legislators aware that we take our obligation seriously to participate in the development of public policy... and will continue to press for policies that are scientifically promising and ethical."

Charity is more than donations, love is more than an emotion

The pope's vision of a new economic future

In a way it is unfair to criticize the presentation and reception of an encyclical that seemingly states the obvious to a world always looking for a new angle and instant solution.

"Pope calls for ethics in economy" headlines stir the same excitement as "NASA supports law of gravity."

In "Caritas in Veritate" ("Charity in Truth"), Pope Benedict XVI incorporates and builds upon the teaching and philosophy developed over 2,000 years. As such, it cannot be placed on the same plane as a political platform or a new plan for the world economy.

It is a global, philosophical view of a world, and it risks being undervalued by the confusion of media messengers attempting to understand it as a political document.

A New York Times reporter wrote: "In many ways, the document is a somewhat puzzling cross between an anti-globalization tract and a government white paper, another indication that the Vatican does not comfortably fit into traditional political categories of right and left."

Indeed, it does not fit, nor is it trying to. This is not the First World talking to the Third World by pitying the poor or the Third World talking to the First World by chastising the well-to-do. It is written by a pastor with a universal view.

He sees "the prospect of a world in need of profound cultural renewal, a world that needs to rediscover fundamental values on which to build a better future."

Pope Benedict says much more than "be less greedy and give money to the poor." Charity is not donations. Love is not an emotion.

Charity is the principal driving force behind the authentic development of every person and of all humanity, says the encyclical. Love is an extraordinary force that leads people to opt for courageous and generous engagement in the field of justice and peace.

Charity is at the heart of the church's social doctrine.

Charity needs to be understood in the light of truth, Pope Benedict said: "This is a matter of no small account today in a social and cultural context which

Consider This

STEPHEN KENT
CNS COLUMNIST

relativizes truth, often paying little heed to it and showing increasing reluctance to acknowledge its existence."

He makes a rather different appeal to self-interest in saying charity is not only moral, it is profitable. Development aid for poor countries must be considered a valid means for creating wealth for all, he said.

When the pope speaks of development, he is not speaking of a new shopping mall or attracting industry to a city.

Development "depends on recognition that the human race is a single family working together in true communion, not simply a group of individuals who live side by side," he said.

His remarks about greater international control of economic affairs will be a hard sell in the United States, but at the same time valuable in helping people realize that a pope is not the chaplain of the chamber of commerce.

The world audience has changed since the last encyclicals on economic matters. Now when the pope speaks of economic reform to people more affected by the current global crisis he should find a more receptive audience.

The encyclical is not a dry document meant for theologians and scholars. As with all encyclicals, it is meant for "all people of good will." Pope Benedict, a writer of grace and clarity, provides a valuable resource to help understand, to see and to judge current events through the light of faith.

"Caritas in Veritate" will reward the reflective reader by providing a solid understanding of how the difficulties of the present time become, as Pope Benedict says, "an opportunity for discernment in which to shape a new vision for the future."

It's only money

As Christians, our hope is in Christ, not materialistic things

It's only money.

In tough economic times, it is important to remember that.

A few weeks ago we had a terrible spate of murders and suicides in our area, all of them thought to be related to the recent economic meltdown.

In one terrible case a man killed his wife and three children and then took his own life. He was apparently $460,000 in debt, half of it on credit cards. He had been a good Catholic, worker and father. He just gave up.

Across the Potomac River from me, the acting chief financial officer of Freddie Mac, the huge government-backed mortgage company, took his own life at age 41. He had worked for Freddie Mac for 16 years, his entire professional career.

He had watched the company melt down. He had become the acting CFO only a few months before. Under huge stress, he tried to resign. His boss was concerned and told him to take a few days off and think it over.

He went home and reportedly hung himself in the basement.

Just to the north of me in Baltimore, a lawyer from Long Island, who was visiting his daughter, a sophomore at Loyola College, killed his wife and two daughters and then himself at a suburban hotel. The housekeeping staff made the terrible discovery.

Evidently the lawyer had run some kind of investment fund. It had gone bankrupt. One friend of his had invested $500,000. The friend needed the money immediately.

In despair and shame the lawyer annihilated himself and his family.

These men despaired. Why?

In God's great mercy, I'm sure they are forgiven. God knew their clouded thinking. God knew the dark curtain of despair that had come over them.

But these poor men were wrong.

We have to remember that money is only money. It is not the measure of our worth. It is not our true security. It is not our ultimate salvation.

For men especially, so much of our identity is tied up in our ability to provide for our families. Our self-worth comes from our work. Failure as a provider and a worker seems like failure as a father, husband and person.

But it isn't. We need the resignation of Job: "The Lord gives and the Lord takes away, blessed be the name of the Lord."

We need the acceptance of the father of the prodigal son in Luke's Gospel. So, the money was gone, but the boy is alive. Kill the fatted calf and let's rejoice.

Money is important in consumer culture. It gives us security. It gives us dignity. And work gives us joy because we feel productive.

But when it all collapses, it is not the end.

If these men had confided in their wives and children, I'm sure each would have said, "It's OK, Dad, we can start over. So long as we have each other, we will survive and thrive."

If only they had called their pastors.

In the last few months, I have dealt with three different families facing financial ruin and foreclosure. What did I try to get across to them?

Do not despair.

You are more than your bank account.

You are more than your house.

You are more than your credit rating.

As Christians, our hope is not in the things of this world. Our hope is in Christ. That is more than a theological proposition. It is the bedrock on which we build our lives.

See the lilies of the field. See the birds of the air. Are you not worth more than these?!

Work and security are important. But money is only money.

FEMALES AGES 18-34 tend to rely on their faith more than males in that age group.

Strong faith is one of the most important elements to help one persevere through an economic crisis.

Faith in God/higher power/divine being gives me more control of my life and my destiny.

Free yourself from needless guilt

Joy cannot be attained until we remove heresies from life, church

The fullness of joy the Lord wants you to have cannot be attained until you free yourself from the many heresies that have crept into the church from the earliest days. Seeing them for what they are can help you to be free of needless guilt and fear.

For centuries, the fear of eternal damnation, even for petty offenses, was taught in the name of religion. George Carlin, the late comedian, abandoned his faith because he saw the absurdity of believing in a God who would send you to hell for all eternity for eating meat on Friday.

Many Catholics left the church for the same reason. Winning them back will take a massive re-education process.

The church was poisoned by heresies over the centuries. The better you understand these errors, the better you will be able to cope with the problem of needless guilt.

For instance, the Manicheans explained the existence of evil by teaching that there are two gods: the good god, who created the spirit world; and a bad god, who created the material world. They saw the material world, including the body, as evil, and the soul as good.

As a result, many came to the conclusion that we have a better chance of saving our souls if we run away from the world to keep it from corrupting us. Thus the early desert fathers were considered the holiest of Catholics.

The truth is that the holiest Catholic is the one who is most loving and kind.

St. Irenaeus (c. 130-200), bishop of Lyon, France, was the first great Catholic theologian. He encouraged people to be more loving to one another in order to purify the world.

St. Augustine (c. 354-430), bishop of Hippo, was actually a Manichean in his youth. Later he became a Catholic and then a bishop. He taught that there is only one God, and everything he created, both soul and body, is good.

St. Benedict (c. 480-550) started out as a hermit, moving away from the world, but when a community gradually built up around him, he started a monastery. Group living became a means of promoting social order.

Pope St. Gregory the Great (c. 540-604) became an ardent promoter of Benedictine monasticism. He urged people to live together in joy and holiness.

Centuries later, the Manichean plague reappeared in the form of Albigensianism. This heretical sect, named from the city of Albi where it began, spread throughout Europe from the 11th century to the 14th century.

Its followers were also referred to as the "Cathari." For them, enjoying food was a sin, so too was the enjoyment of sex, even in marriage.

St. Dominic (c. 1170-1221) reacted to these errors, and founded an order of friars to preach against them. St. Thomas Aquinas (c. 1225-1274) carried on after him with the aim of winning back lapsed Catholics.

Cornelius Jansen (c. 1585-1638) preached a theology of pessimism, which eventually infected America like a plague. Pope Innocent X (1574-1655) condemned the errors of Jansen, whose severity in matters of sexuality and ecclesiastical discipline led to so much emotional pain.

Cardinal John Newman (c. 1801-1890) also preached against this heresy. He encouraged Christians to trust in God's love as a way of freeing themselves from needless fear and guilt.

In John 15:11, Jesus said, "I have told you this so that ... your joy may be complete." You would be wise to take the Lord at his word.

Moderation in all things

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK

It was the worst train accident in the history of Washington's subway system!

A train traveling at top speed crashed into a standing train, leaving a lot of dead and seriously injured people.

"I'll bet the conductor was text messaging," several people remarked to me. "You see it everywhere; people start up their cars and immediately dial up someone. These are nothing but selfish people."

Even though text messaging was not the cause, jumping to the conclusion that it was reveals a growing backlash against people text messaging and speaking on cell phones while driving.

Without a doubt, the latest technological advances in communication are creating addictions. Most of the addicted would argue it is important to stay in contact with others, especially family members.

They contend a family that communicates with each other frequently stays together. Others would argue it makes business transactions easier.

The problem as I see it is not selfish, inconsiderate people. Rather, it is not knowing how to prudently cope with the new age of modern technology. It is failing to include one crucial element: moderation.

Samuel Butler, a British writer, once said, "Half the vices which the world condemns most loudly have seeds of good in them and require moderate use rather than total abstinence."

The word "moderate" means to regulate and apply rules. In the case of new communication technologies, there is no need to do away with cell phones. Rather, what is needed are new rules. What are these rules?

An old Maltese proverb tells us: "Better one word less than one too many." In other words, owning a cell phone doesn't imply you have to talk on it incessantly.

Henry Kissinger once said, "Moderation is a virtue only in those who are thought to have an alternative." In other words, is there a better alternative to constant phone communication that just might allow us to smell the flowers and better enjoy contemplation?

A Tibetan proverb cautions us: "Even the nibbling rabbit can gorge itself to death." In other words, how easy it is to multiply phone calls and overload the senses to our detriment.

A Tamil proverb warns: "If in excess, even nectar is poison."

It goes without saying that we have entered a new age requiring new rules to avoid immoderation that leads to self-destruction.

How to include the church in plans you already have Simple steps now can benefit many in the long term

Most of us own life insurance policies and invest in retirement plans in an effort to protect our families' financial security. We all want to provide future support for our loved ones as well as provide income during retirement.

Perhaps you also have thought about how your plans can allow you to support your parish, or a Catholic school or agency, the Diocese of Charlotte or the diocesan foundation.

Giving through life insurance

Making a gift through life insurance is relatively simple and easy. Here are two examples of how this can work.

1) You can continue to provide for family members and other beneficiaries and, at the same time, designate a Catholic organization to receive part or all of the policy proceeds.

2) You can gift a life insurance policy you no longer need to the church. An example of this would be a policy originally purchased for a child's education.

When you make a charitable gift to the church through life insurance, possible tax savings may also be an added benefit of your gift.

Giving through retirement plans

Retirement plans — including IRAs, Keough plans, SEPs and 401(k) plans — also may be used to make charitable gifts. If you are over age 59 and a half and can make unpenalized withdrawals from your IRA or other qualified retirement plan, you may choose to give that money to a Catholic organization.

While the withdrawal will be subject to tax, the gift qualifies for a charitable income tax deduction for those who itemize deductions. The result is that the usual tax on withdrawal is avoided.

You can also make charitable gifts through retirement plans when you no longer need the funds.

For example, consider naming a Catholic organization as the second or third beneficiary after providing for your spouse, children or other loved ones. This ensures that your surviving loved ones are taken care of first and charitable distributions will be made only after the primary beneficiary no longer needs the funds.

Legacy Notes

Take the next step

It is easy to name your parish, a Catholic school or agency, the Diocese of Charlotte or the diocesan foundation through your life insurance or retirement plans.

It could be as simple as contacting your insurance representative or the administrator of your retirement account and completing a change of beneficiary form.

Just remember that everyone's needs are different so it is important to consult your professional advisor to review your plan.

BRIGHT HOPE AMID DESPAIR

A painting of a Catholic priest with children is seen on a wall next to railroad tracks in Villa 31, a slum in Buenos Aires, Argentina, July 5. A team of Catholic priests works in this slum to protect, educate and uplift some of Argentina's poorest citizens.

In Buenos Aires' slums, priests fight daily to defend life

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina (CNS) — Father Gustavo Carrara lives in one of Buenos Aires' most destitute neighborhoods. For the last three years, he and his team of "curas villeros," or slum priests, have fought a daily battle to protect, educate and uplift some of Argentina's poorest citizens.

Father Carrara and his team reside where few nongovernmental organizations or government officials dare to visit. His church, La Capilla Santa Maria Madre del Pueblo, is in Bajo Flores, one of Buenos Aires' most infamous slums.

Here, said Father Carrara, "faith goes hand in hand with social promotion. Being a pastor here obliges a defense of life."

In Buenos Aires, Argentina's capital and largest city, poor neighborhoods called "villas" house some of Argentina's most impoverished citizens. Set on public property, villas often lack sewer systems, running water or gas with which to cook.

In some cases, entire neighborhoods are built precariously, using substandard materials and techniques.

Decorated with colorful pieces of broken glass below barred windows, the small Santa Maria chapel is a sanctuary amid squalor. Inside the pastoral residence, pictures of saints share wall space with posters of Argentine soccer legends.

Father Carrara said what his team of priests tries to provide is opportunity. The priests gather old computers for a computer lab, hold carpentry classes for young adults, offer job training and provide day care for young children.

"We try to create a healthy, happy place where the children can come and do what children do: play," Father Carrara said.

"Sometimes the schools are more cafeteria than school, because parents don't have work," he said. "It's not that they don't want to work, it's not that they don't fight to improve, but they don't have opportunity."

Father Carrara attributed this lack of employment opportunity to a strong divide between people's values inside and outside the villas.

"Here, life is organized around faith and the fight for dignity. Sometimes urban life is organized around money and power. In a lot of cases, these two perspectives collide," he said.

"The people of the villas integrate the faith into their lives. Here, faith and life go hand in hand; God is intertwined with life. If you go to (the) market and you bring an image of the Virgin, it's natural. If you bring the Virgin to the urban malls, everyone wonders why you're there," he said.

Father Carrara also has worked to protect his people from the effects of drug addiction. A real challenge in the villas is a highly addictive form of cocaine.

"We visit the schools in the area with a well-known therapist, with a social worker, and we present a systematic program about drug prevention for school-age children, from first grade to seventh grade," he said.

The church's active and vocal role in drug prevention has had consequences. A recent escalation in drug trafficking and consumption has led to threats against Catholic priests who live and work in the villas. Police are still investigating an April 20 incident in which a member of Father Carrara's team received a death threat after denouncing rampant drug use.

While Father Carrara said he worries about his colleague, he understands why the drug dealers feel the need to threaten the church.

"The drug dealers feel as though the church undermines them with its voice and its work. The voice of the church has strength," he said.

Effort to block U.S. funds to Planned Parenthood fails in House

WASHINGTON (CNS) — An effort to withhold U.S. family planning funds from Planned Parenthood of America failed in the House of Representatives July 24 by a vote of 183 in favor and 247 opposed.

Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., had proposed the amendment to the Labor, Health and Human Services and Education appropriations bill for fiscal year 2010. The bill passed later that day by a vote of 264-153.

"The largest abortion provider in America should not also be the largest recipient of federal funding under Title X, as I believe a majority of the American people would attest," Pence said in remarks on the House floor July 24.

"The time has come to deny all federal funding to Planned Parenthood of America," he said.

Title X of the Public Health Services Act provides federal grants to programs that provide comprehensive family planning and related preventive health care services.

In a statement after the vote on his amendment, Pence said he would "continue to fight for the right to life and for the day when abortions are not funded by the federal government," adding that "taxpayers and the just cause for the unborn deserve no less."

Also speaking in favor of the Pence amendment on the House floor was Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., a Catholic who co-chairs the Congressional Pro Life Caucus.

"Millions of children live today because public funds weren't available to effectuate their death," Smith said.

"Yet Planned Parenthood aggressively seeks to compel taxpayers to fund for abortion. ... It's time to understand the irreversible harm Planned Parenthood is doing to the children of America — born and unborn," he said.

Vatican taking cautious, not alarmist, approach to swine flu

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Though tens of thousands of people from all over the world crowd together to attend papal Masses, weekly general audiences and Angelus addresses, the Vatican is not taking any extreme measures in the face of the swine flu pandemic, said the director of the Vatican health service.

Dr. Giovanni Rocchi, a professor specializing in infectious diseases, said the Vatican has avoided an alarmist approach to dealing with the H1N1 virus, which causes swine flu, based on the "serious, careful and balanced observation of data coming from the World Health Organization."

He made his comments in an interview published July 24 in the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano.

The Vatican's Department of Health and Hygiene will continue to offer its usual cycle of flu vaccines to all Vatican employees and family members as it does every year, he said. But it will not be taking any particular steps in prevention unless someone "coming from a country of risk shows warning signs," he said.

This approach does not mean the Vatican is "taking the pandemic lightly," he said.

If recommendations from the World Health Organization warrant it or Italy enacts particular precautions, the Vatican would, in good conscience, temporarily suspend large public gatherings, he added.

Rocchi predicted that swine flu "will surely reach our doorstep in the autumn."

As soon as a specific vaccine to prevent the virus is available, the Vatican health department will be offering it, he said.

The World Health Organization said fatalities from the H1N1 virus have doubled in the past three weeks, from about 330 at the start of July to more than 700 new cases, adding that further deaths are expected in the future.

Pope speaks of gift of priesthood, gift of grandparents

LES COMBES, Italy (CNS) — Praying the Angelus with thousands of people gathered in an Alpine meadow, Pope Benedict XVI spoke about the gift of the priesthood and the gift of grandparents.

The midday prayer July 26 was the last public appointment the pope was scheduled to hold in the Italian Alps, where he has been vacationing since July 13. He was scheduled to leave the evening of July 29 and transfer to the papal summer villa at Castel Gandolfo, south of Rome.

In his Angelus address, the pope commented on the day's Gospel reading about the multiplication of the loaves and fish, saying priests can see themselves in the disciples who wonder what they can do to feed such a huge crowd.

When they ask Jesus how five loaves and two fish could possibly make a difference, they basically are asking, "Who am I? With my limits, how can I help Jesus in his mission?" the pope said.

"The Lord gives the response; precisely by placing the little that they are in his holy and venerable hands, priests become instruments of salvation for many, for all," Pope Benedict said.

The pope also noted that July 26 is the feast of Sts. Joachim and Anne, "the parents of the mother of God and, therefore, the grandparents of Jesus."

The feast, he said, "invites us to pray for grandparents, who are the depositories and often witnesses of the basic values of life within the family. The educational role of grandparents is always very important," especially in situations where one or both parents are frequently absent.

Atlanta's vicar general named an auxiliary bishop for archdiocese

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI has named Msgr. Luis R. Zarama, vicar general of the Archdiocese of Atlanta, to be an auxiliary bishop of Atlanta.

The appointment was announced in Washington July 27 by Archbishop Pietro Sambi, apostolic nuncio to the United States.

Bishop-designate Zarama, 50, who was born in Colombia, was ordained a priest in Atlanta in 1993 and has been vicar general since 2006.

Parish ministry reaches out to the unemployed

ministry's leaders.

A committee was formed in December 2008.

"He (Father O'Rourke) invited people who were in transition or looking for jobs and people who wanted to help," said Conwell.

The goal of SGIT is to support job seekers in their search for rewarding employment.

The ministry, which is open to all job seekers, utilizes the vast resources within the parish community by connecting those who are looking for employment with those who have particular skills and assets that can be applied to the job search process.

Craig Wheeler, for example, a member of the leadership team and a parishioner at St. Gabriel Church, works in banking and has been able to lend his skills to those who are seeking help with resumes and networking.

"This ministry was a good fit for me," said Wheeler, who said he has always been very passionate about helping people find compelling work."

Occasionally speakers are brought in from the greater Charlotte community, but for the most part the group is taking advantage of the resources within the parish.

At the most recent meeting July 16, parishioner Keith Eades, founder and CEO of a sales training company in Charlotte and a knowledgeable authority on building world-class sales organizations, gave a talk entitled "How to Sell and Market Yourself the Solution Selling Way."

In his presentation, Eades discussed various techniques for selling oneself to prospective employers. He also handed out free copies of his book and provided participants with formulas and templates to develop individualized selling points based on their own situations and experiences.

"Not only am I thankful for the important ministry that St. Gabriel in Transition is providing but I am also very impressed with the administration, content and services that are being offered," said Eades.

Parishioner Morris St. Angelo is one of the original participants. He began attending meetings in January when the ministry was formed.

"Realizing how embedded the mission of faith and service is that allows this group to function was really powerful to me," said St. Angelo.

St. Angelo, who has recently found employment, was grateful to the ministry for helping him through a difficult time.

His advice to those who are seeking employment: "Don't be afraid to try to learn the techniques needed to find a job."

"I hadn't looked for a job in over 25 years," he said. "I had hired a ton of people," but being on the other end of a job interview was uncharted territory.

At first, he thought, "I'm the only person on earth who is going through this."

But after coming to the first SGIT meeting, he was relieved to find "a room full of people who looked just like me."

At that point, St. Angelo came to the realization that he wasn't alone.

"To me the advantage of one of these groups is recognizing you are not alone and that there are people who want to help you," said Conwell.

And what better place to find that support system than within one's own parish community.

"This is home to me," said Kathy Kosminski, a St. Gabriel Church parishioner and SGIT participant.

"Coming here for a job search reminds me that God is involved in all of this," she said.

Selling yourself

According to Keith Eades, when it comes to selling yourself in today's difficult job market two key principles apply: "No Pain No Change" and "Diagnose Before you Prescribe."

His advice: find out the problems that are relevant to key individuals in the companies you want to work for and then diagnose the problems with good situational questions before you offer yourself as the solution.

Here are Eades' four key components for selling yourself:

- 1.) Target — Do your research and know who the targets are in the company.
- 2.) Identify critical business or personal issues — What are the critical business and personal issues within the company that your capabilities address?
- 3.) Define your differentiated capabilities — What capabilities do you have that set you apart from other job seekers? Be sure to use actual examples and measured results from your previous work experiences.
- 4.) Quantify your value — What value, if any, do your differentiated capabilities bring to the situation? Use your value to stimulate and create interest or as proof of how you can be the solution to their problems.

'A powerful technology'

Latest stem cell advance said to prove again no need to kill embryos

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The work of two teams of Chinese scientists who created live mice from induced pluripotent stem cells is "another demonstration that researchers don't need to destroy embryos" to achieve stem cell advances, according to a pro-life official at the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

The research done by separate teams in Shanghai and Beijing and published July 23 in the scientific journals Nature and Cell Stem Cell showed that the so-called iPS cells have "the full range of uses that embryonic stem cells are proposed for," said Richard Doerflinger, associate director of the USCCB Secretariat of Pro-Life Activities.

"The immediate finding is that induced pluripotent stem cells, created without harming any embryos, really are as versatile as embryonic stem cells," he said.

But Doerflinger also warned in a July 27 interview with Catholic News Service that this latest breakthrough in stem cell research shows that iPS cells are "so powerful" that researchers "might be able to put them in a human embryo and change the genetic makeup of that child and all the future generations" related to the child.

"It's an ominous thing, that they could be remaking people's genetic traits," he added. "It's a powerful technology and it could be misused."

The two Chinese teams had varying degrees of success in creating genetic duplicates of mice by reprogramming skin cells from adult mice into iPS cells and then implanting the embryos created into a surrogate mother.

The first team, led by Qi Zhou of the Institute of Zoology in Beijing and Fanyi Zeng of Shanghai Jiao Tong University, reported 27 live births, starting with a mouse named Xiao Xiao or "Tiny."

"The immediate finding is that induced pluripotent stem cells ... really are as versatile as embryonic stem cells."

— Richard Doerflinger

All 12 of the genetic duplicates that were mated produced offspring without abnormalities; the team reported hundreds of second-generation and more than 100 third-generation mice.

The second team, headed by Shaorong Gao of the National Institute of Biological Sciences in Beijing, produced only two live births using the same technique, with one of those dying in infancy.

The team is currently trying to mate the surviving mouse.

In the United States, the National Institutes of Health recently issued final guidelines for federal funding of embryonic stem-cell research, requiring that such research use only embryos created for reproductive purposes at in vitro fertilization clinics and no longer needed for that purpose.

The draft guidelines set standards for voluntary informed consent by those donating the embryos, and said no NIH funds would be given for research that did not meet the standards.

The final guidelines, however, set up an "alternative pathway" for the approval of funding of research involving embryos donated before the new guidelines took effect or involving stem-cell lines developed in foreign countries.

A working group made up of about 10 scientists and ethicists is to look at each such application on a case-by-case basis to determine whether it meets the core principles of voluntary informed consent.

Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia, chairman of the USCCB Committee on Pro-Life Activities, strongly criticized the final guidelines and said the debate over embryonic stem-cell research "now shifts to Congress, where some members have said even this policy does not go far enough in treating some human beings as objects to be created, manipulated and destroyed for others' use."

Some had predicted that President Barack Obama's decision to reverse the limits on funding of embryonic stem cell research established under President George W. Bush would lead to the rapid expansion of such research, particularly at the university level.

But the results of a survey by The Chronicle of Higher Education, published July 21, found that only 6 percent of major research universities — those with $100 million or more in federal grants — planned to increase research on human embryonic stem cells "by a large amount."

The survey also found that most of the universities said they had increased their contributions to the indirect costs of scientific research on campus by 50 percent or more over the past five years.

A federal policy established in 1991 limits the indirect costs that a university may collect on each federal research grant for expenses like photocopying, accounting and electricity.

New Orleans Catholic Charities visits OEO

OEO are part of Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte.

Since October 2007, Balser has been director of four Catholic Charities' community centers in the New Orleans area: one center each in St. Bernard and St. Tammany parishes (counties) and two in Washington Parish.

What she wanted to learn were ways to provide long-term help, rather than just quick fixes.

"One of our biggest challenges is getting our clients to stay with us without giving them money," Balser said.

So why would she come to western North Carolina to find ways to solve problems in southern Louisiana?

In 2007, Claudie Burchfield, OEO's director, and Netta McFadden, OEO's Far West Families First coordinator, went to Cleveland to receive the $25,000 Annie E. Casey Foundation's Family Strengthening Award. The award honors people and programs working to improve the prospects of children and families living in tough neighborhoods.

A group from Catholic Charities offices nationwide then visited the OEO, but Balser was unable to go with them.

The following year, Burchfield spoke on parish social ministry at the Catholic Charities annual gathering in New Orleans. Balser still wanted to look for fresh approaches to the situation in New Orleans.

"I contacted Jane Stenson of Catholic Charities USA and asked what would be the best place for a site visit," she said. "Jane said OEO, definitely."

Washington Parish, a rural area in Louisiana, faces challenges similar to those in Cherokee, Clay, Graham and Swain, the four counties OEO serves. Many residents of those counties don't have advanced education and there are few industries to provide jobs.

Willing and able

During Balser's time at OEO, Burchfield and McFadden introduced her to faith teams showed her how they work with other agencies and taught her about ABLE, OEO's financial literacy program.

"I just love the term ABLE for the financial literacy program," Balser said. "We're just getting started with financial literacy."

ABLE (Assets Building Longterm Equity) is one of OEO's key programs. When OEO began 10 years ago, it received grants from the Duke Endowment for ABLE. At that time, the assets were monetary: if a person living in the four counties could save $1,000, ABLE would match it with $2,000.

The person could use that money for education, to start or expand a business or toward buying a home. If he withdrew the savings before

"We decided to to concentrate on helping people be financially literate."

— Claudie Burchfield, OEO director

reaching the $1,000 level, he got back what he had saved but without any matching funds.

The program required that participants attend OEO's financial literacy classes to learn such skills as budgeting, saving money and making a business plan.

"When the grant funding ended (five years ago)," Burchfield explained, "we said, 'What is the most important part of this program? Do we want to seek additional funds? If not, what do we want to see saved.' We decided to concentrate on helping people be financially literate."

So, OEO created a financial literacy computer lab. The Bishop Begley Center is in a house adjacent to St. William Church; parishioners enclosed the porch for the lab. OEO used grants and private contributions to purchase desks, chairs and laptop computers.

Carol McAfee, who assists Burchfield, is available 20 hours a week to help people learn to use the computers to become financially literate. She shows people how to research better mortgage rates, check their credit ratings, make budgets, look at how they spend their money, clear up bad debts and so forth.

"Many in poverty look only to satisfying immediate needs," McAfee said. "If they can actually see where their money goes — do the math on the computer — it makes it real."

Personal approach

For people who, perhaps for generations, have never seen any way to get beyond poverty, the current economic situation has only compounded the problem.

"We had a high unemployment rate before, but now it's worse," McAfee said.

She estimates the rate in the four counties at 11-12 percent.

"After NAFTA, factories closed and jobs went to other countries," she said, referring to the 1994 North American Free Trade Agreement.

OEO has found that many people who have little or no experience dealing with financial institutions and creditors are afraid to contact these entities because they don't know what to say.

McAfee and Burchfield help them use the computer to prepare a script of the questions they want to ask. They print it out so they can read it when talking on the phone to various institutions.

"Even the government is talking about the cycle of poverty," McAfee said. "I think (the key to) breaking that cycle is through education."

OEO partners with other community organizations in financial literacy fairs and offers classes on financial literacy. Local residents also visit OEO, and Burchfield offers individual help "on common-sense things such as how to keep accurate records."

Presently, someone from one of Balser's offices goes to various locations to meet with groups of people, but the more personal approach means people can get help when it's most convenient for them.

"I just love how Claudie sits down with people one-on-one and goes over things with them," Balser said.

Helping families

McFadden introduced Balser to Far West Families First faith teams, an ecumenical approach to serving families in need.

One such team consists of a Catholic, a Baptist and a Methodist, who are now working with their fourth family. Balser also met representatives of the Department of Social Services (DSS), which refers people to Far West Families First.

DSS (Department of Social Services) refers families that meet state poverty guidelines and have indicated that they want to improve their lives through better education, housing or employment.

No money is offered. Instead, faith teams help families with such needs as finding reliable transportation, locating resources such as agencies that could help them with specific needs, and offering prayers and encouragement.

Balser also learned about the Far West Families First Kinship Program, which works with people, including grandparents and other family members, who are raising children not biologically their own.

"I hope I brought some things to them, too," Balser said.

Vacations, pilgrimages draw people closer to God

Tom and Heather Martin and their even children are parishioners of St. Mark Church in Huntersville.

Heather Martin said she viewed the trip as an opportunity for her family to grow closer to the Lord.

"We went to Mass just about everywhere we went," said Martin "We wanted to be there and pray and just soak it in."

While in Rome, Martin's son Patrick made his first Communion at St. Peter's Basilica with Father Matthew Kauth, priest from the Diocese of Charlotte, celebrating the Mass.

Father Kauth, who has been studying in Rome, baptized Patrick at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte seven years ago.

At the recommendation of Father Kauth, the Mass to celebrate Patrick's first Communion took place on the tomb of St. Pius X, who is known for lowering the age requirement for the reception of Communion.

Patrick's older siblings, Zachery, Daniel and Luke, assisted as altar servers during the Mass and their mother sang.

"The next day, we had arranged a papal audience through the diocese," said Martin.

After the audience, the Martins watched as Pope Benedict made his way through the crowd in his popemobile.

Tom Martin handed their 11-month-old daughter, Sarah, to one of the pope's attendants just before he passed by.

"The attendant held up Sarah and the pope put his hands on each side of her face and kissed her on the top of her head," said Heather Martin.

"I think every Catholic should try and go to Italy," she said of seeing the center of the Catholic Church in Rome. "It makes you so proud to be a part of such a beautiful and holy church."

But Catholics don't have to cross the Atlantic to deepen their faith.

Tom and Heather Martin took one of their first family pilgrimages to the chapel of Our Lady of La Leche in St. Augustine, Fla., three years after they were married.

"We asked our Blessed Mother to please bless us with children," recalled Martin who at the time of the trip had been unable to get pregnant.

The idea of using vacation as a time to grow in faith is something that the Martins have tried to instill in their children by taking family pilgrimages to nearby locations such as the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville.

"It is good to get away," said Martin, "but it is so much more important to grow closer to God."

Portraits of biblical women, saints provide faith lessons for today

REVIEWED BY ALLAN F. WRIGHT
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

T.J. Wray combines biblical scholarship with practicality as she opens the door to shed light on 12 women of prominence in the Old Testament in her book, "Good Girls, Bad Girls."

She mentions in the introduction the scarcity of information that has been available to laypeople and scholars alike concerning how women lived in the Old Testament era.

However, she says that during recent decades, "extrabiblical sources, both written and archaeological, have helped us begin to understand more about the lives of women during the first millennium."

She continues, "Although the portrait of women's lives during biblical antiquity remains an incomplete canvas, there are some aspects of their daily lives that we can sketch with reasonable clarity."

It is with these insights that she lays out the biblical text and draws out what she considers essential to the stories in the Bible where women are mentioned. Specifically, "What is the author trying to teach me about God, myself and others."

Wray helps complete the canvas and what is revealed are real women who faced trials, temptations and triumphs and struggled just as we do with their relationship with God and what God's will is in their lives.

Wray does a very good job of putting flesh on these women who are often named, not in relation to men as wives or daughters, but as strong women who can stand on their own two feet.

In commenting on the story of Rebekah found in Genesis, she brings the decision and dilemma of Rebekah close to us by stating, "In the Bible — and usually in life — following God's will is, more often than not, difficult and challenging."

Each chapter is clear, concise, focused and ends with sensible questions for reflection that draw us close to these women and ultimately close to God, which is a major strength of this book.

Gina Loehr, in her book, "Real Women, Real Saints," offers brief spiritual portraits of 102 Catholic women who have been declared venerable, blessed or saints.

Loehr's ability to tell the story of each woman of faith in a concise manner while presenting the diversity of temperaments, occupations, challenges, education and backgrounds of these Catholic women is admirable.

From the illiterate doctor of the church, St. Catherine of Siena, to the scholarly St. Edith Stein, what brings them together and unites all these women is their belief and fidelity to God.

"Real Women, Real Saints" reveals the quality of faith and love of these women who often lived their Catholic faith in the midst of opposition and ridicule.

Loehr states in her introduction, "Every story in this book tells of a relationship between the Savior of the universe and a woman who loved him enough to live in harmony with his will."

The short vignettes offer insight into the life of faith and expose some lesser known saints although the book fails to provide the reader with any reflection or meditation for their own faith lives.

While the stories whet the appetite, the reader is left feeling that there was more to be written that could have provided some direction for spiritual enrichment and thus have made a good book more valuable.

Wright is the author of "Jesus in the House: Gospel Reflections on Christ's Presence in the Home" and "Silent Witnesses in the Gospels: Bible Bystanders and Their Stories."

Jesus is truly present in the Eucharist

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The miraculous gift of the Eucharist is for many people a hard thing to believe.

Taken at face value it is a round, tasteless wafer. Our Catholic theology says it is the body, blood, soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ.

So how does one go from seeing a wafer to experiencing Jesus?

For me, three instances stand out as helping my belief in the Eucharist grow.

The first was when I was in my 20s. I happened to sit next to the same young woman a few weeks in a row, and I noticed that while she prayed after Communion, she quietly wept.

One time I asked her if she was all right.

She said, "Yes, I just feel Jesus cleansing me of my sins."

I was in awe of her experience and deeply wanted to have such a profound connection with the Eucharist.

The second instance was through a book by Mother Teresa in which she explained that her sisters always start the day with Mass because they could not do the work they were called to without receiving Jesus in the Eucharist.

This spiritual exercise was vital to their work.

Upon reading this I was humbled. Here was a group of women who could not begin the day without Jesus in the Eucharist, and at that time in my life if I missed Mass my only thought was guilt.

A sense of missing the Eucharist never crossed my mind.

Last, a young woman who had graduated from our youth ministry program wrote me a letter while she was on a discernment year for her religious vocation.

She signed the letter: "I'll see you in the Eucharist."

Again I was floored. I had never considered the unifying power of the sacrament in this way; we are all one in Jesus.

Difficulty understanding the miracle of the Eucharist is not new. In this Sunday's Gospel, Jesus confronts people who have a hard time believing he is the bread of life.

I heard once that to surrender is to refuse yourself the luxury of asking any questions. I think this is what Jesus means when he tells the crowd to stop murmuring and believe.

Questions:

Have you had difficulty believing that the body and blood is Jesus?

Who or what has helped your belief in the Eucharist to grow?

Have you ever had a profound experience after going to Communion?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"I am the bread of life" (John 6:48)

Catholic voice actor leads an animated life

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Jim Cummings didn't exactly study his chosen career field during his 12 years of Catholic schooling, but he certainly honed his craft.

The thrice-E Emmy-nominated voice actor was a relentless mimic when going to Immaculate Conception and St. Columba grade schools and Ursuline High School, all in Youngstown, Ohio.

"I'd be doing dolphin sounds in the background," Cummings recalled during July 22 telephone interview from Los Angeles with Catholic News Service.

Cummings then proceeded to do some dolphin clicks and chatter straight out of the old "Flipper" TV series.

"Sister Mary Agnes would say, 'We don't allow dolphin sounds in the classroom, Mr. Cummings,'" he said.

Cummings, a member of St. Jude Church in Los Angeles, got reprimanded over the course of his scholastic career for his mimicry. But he doesn't hold it against his teachers or principals. The feeling is apparently mutual.

"I have a scholarship at my old school in my dad's name, so they don't seem to mind me anymore," Cummings said.

It wasn't all trips to the principal's office for Cummings. He also parlayed his talents into championships for Ursuline during state and regional speech and oratory contests.

Cummings has been plying his trade for 20 years in Hollywood. He has been involved in more than 300 different animation projects, performing multiple voices on many of the shows, according to the Internet Movie Database.

He's up for a Daytime Emmy for outstanding performer in an animated program for his work on the series "My Friends Tigger & Pooh" — although he's up against bigger names such as Amy Poehler and Vanessa Williams.

You probably wouldn't know him if you saw him. Because he has been a voice actor, his face has rarely been on screen.

"I'm a stealth celebrity," he joked.

Cummings created the voice of title character Darkwing Duck, a popular Disney cartoon series of the 1990s.

He also has moved into more allowed territory, taking on the voice of Taz, the Tasmanian Devil originally voiced by cartoonism's original man of a thousand voices, Mel Blanc, and also the voices of Tigger and Winnie the Pooh, the latter's voice originally done by actor Sterling Holloway.

It's a challenge to stay true to the voice created by another actor a generation or two earlier, Cummings admitted. One of his biggest challenges was to record practically every conceivable child's name for a talking Winnie the Pooh toy.

"Esquire magazine gave it a prize for 'most interesting name': My Interactive Pooh," Cummings told CNS.

One of Cummings' upcoming projects will hit the silver screen later this year. It's a new Disney movie called "The Princess and the Frog," in which Cummings plays a frog with a Cajun accent named Ray.

The project — which also features the voice talents of Oprah Winfrey, John Goodman and Terrence Howard — will be Disney's first cartoon movie to feature African-American lead characters.

"It's a steady gig," Cummings noted, and if he has any regret, it's for being too sick to audition 20 years ago when a new cartoon series called "The Simpsons" was auditioning actors who could do multiple voices.

"Other than that one, I'm a happy camper. I don't look back in frustration and anger," he said. "I hope for the best, expect the worst, and take what comes."

Cummings' TV debut came much earlier than his resume would suggest.

"I was in sixth grade and I remember that Mother Rosemary — who was going to be my speech teacher (in high school) and sort of one of the great shining lights of our scholastic career — she had written and directed a play that they had put on television," he said.

"It was called 'The Catholic School Story.' It was in black and white and I didn't know what to do with myself, I was so happy," he said.

Another Ursuline grad also performed in the TV special and went on to bigger and better things: Ed O'Neill, who, even after it's been off the air for a dozen years, is probably still best known for playing put-upon dad Al Bundy in the TV sitcom "Married With Children."

"I keep meaning whenever I run into him to say I suspect we made our TV debut together. He was a senior in high school," Cummings said. "Ed played Father O'Neill and I played the cute little kid."

Former CBS News anchor Walter Cronkite poses with a pipe in this undated photograph. Cronkite, whose authoritative delivery of the news during turbulent times made him "the most trusted man in America," died at his New York home July 17. He was 92.

Cronkite recalled as trusted newsman who made public 'feel the news'

BY JESSIE ABRAMS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — TV news anchor and journalism icon Walter Cronkite, who died July 17 at age 92, made the public "feel the news," said the founding director of the Pauline Center for Media Studies in Culver City, Calif.

"My first memory of Walter Cronkite was seeing him bow his head, visibly moved, when he announced the death of President John F. Kennedy," said Sister Rose Pacatte, a member of the Daughters of St. Paul, who has experience in various media such as television and radio producing.

"The timbre of his voice and his kind countenance made him welcome in every living room in America then and for years after. ... If Edward R. Murrow could be called the brains of the news, then Cronkite was its heart. He made us feel the news; it was personal; the news mattered," she said.

Best known for his news coverage on the "CBS Evening News," Cronkite was known to many as "the most trusted man in America."

He died in his New York home, and his chief of staff, Marlene Adler, told The Associated Press the cause of his death was cerebrovascular disease.

A private funeral was held July 23 at St. Bartholomew's Episcopal Church in New York. A larger memorial was expected to take place at Lincoln Center within a month.

Cronkite served as anchorman for the "CBS Evening News" from 1962 to 1981, covering many memorable events including the resignation of President Richard M. Nixon, man's first steps on the moon, the Vietnam War, and the assassination of Kennedy, America's first Catholic president.

Many say they remember him for his sensitive handling of these events.

He received numerous awards and honors throughout his life. In 1980 he was recognized for excellence in broadcasting with the Gabriel Award for personal achievement from what is now the Catholic Academy of Communication Arts Professionals, a national association of Catholic broadcasters and allied communicators.

He received an honorary degree from the University of Notre Dame in Indiana in 1982 as part of the dedication of a new chemistry research facility. He also received Peabody awards in 1962 and 1981 and multiple Emmy awards over the years.

In 1977 the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights gave the newsman its Earl Butz Bigotry in Media Award for what it said was his biased and inaccurate coverage of a congressional debate over funding for Medicaid abortions.

The league's associate executive director at the time, Michael Schwartz, accused Cronkite of implying the country's Catholic bishops had violated the provisions of church-state separation by objecting to the funding, according to a news story in the CNS archives.

Cronkite also missed the point of the debate, Schwartz said, which was whether Catholics opposed to abortion would be required to help fund abortions for Medicare patients.

Through his work and his career, Cronkite earned admiration from many fellow journalists, media professionals and viewers alike.

The president of the National Catholic Association of Communicators at the University of Dayton in Ohio, Sister Angela Ann Zukowski, said she analyzed other journalists' work by using Cronkite's report as a ruler.

"I really believe that Walter Cronkite is one of the stellar icons of quality journalism in the United States. He was an authentic journalist; he was someone who I think personally did his homework to present the truth, looking at it from many different perspectives," Sister Zukowski said.

"The way he conducted himself as a journalist called for deep professional respect and admiration," added the nun, who is a member of the Mission Helpers of the Sacred Heart.

According to AP, Cronkite was to be buried in Kansas City, Mo., next to his wife, who died in 2005. He is survived by his three children.

Benedictine Father Raymond Geyer: 1922 – 2009

Monk served more than 60 years in all apostolates of Belmont Abbey

BELMONT — Benedictine Father Raymond Geyer, a monk and priest of Belmont Abbey for more than 60 years, died peacefully July 26.

A Mass of Christian burial was held July 29 at the Abbey basilica, followed by interment in the Abbey cemetery.

Father Geyer was born Sept. 22, 1922, in Lancaster, N.Y. He attended St. Mary's elementary school and high school in Lancaster, then enrolled in Belmont Abbey Junior College where he earned his associate's degree in 1942.

He subsequently completed his bachelor's degree in sociology at St. Benedict's College in Atchison, Kan., and earned his master's in education from Canisius College in 1949.

Father Geyer entered the novitiate for Belmont Abbey at St. Vincent Archabbey in Latrobe, Pa., and made his first profession of vows July 2, 1943.

He was solemnly professed on July 11, 1946, and ordained a priest at St. Joseph's Cathedral in Buffalo, N.Y., July 4, 1949.

Father Geyer served in all the apostolates of Belmont Abbey.

He taught in the prep school from 1945 to 1947, was organist and choirmaster in the monastery from 1945 to 1949 and served as chaplain of St. Leo's School in Belmont from 1949 to 1950.

He later served as director of admission to Belmont Abbey College from 1970 to 1977.

In addition, Father Geyer was assigned to Sacred Heart Priory in Savannah, Ga., where he taught at Benedictine Military School from 1950 to 1959.

He was assigned to St. Benedict's Priory in Richmond, Va., from 1959 to 1970, and again from 1977 to 1983, where he also taught at Benedictine High School.

Father Geyer served as principal at the high school from 1959 to 1962, and as prior of the monastic community there from 1977 to 1983.

His final pastoral assignment was as pastor of St. Michael the Archangel Church in Gastonia from 1983 to 1989.

After his return to Belmont Abbey, Father Geyer remained active in community life as director of Oblate for 20 years, and he was in charge of the abbey cemetery.

Benedictine Father Raymond Geyer

Father Geyer is survived by his brother, Benedictine Father Kenneth Geyer; by the monks of Belmont Abbey and by a sister-in-law in New York.

He was preceded in death by his brother, Robert, and his sister, Sister Marie Canice Geyer.

In lieu of flowers, donations may be made to Belmont Abbey College or St. Michael the Archangel Church.

Considering 'the alternative'

If you really believe in Christ's resurrection, death is behind you

I have a friend who typically conveys news of someone's death by remarking that the deceased person "has joined the majority." Another friend likes to say "he rolled a seven" when reporting that someone we both knew has died.

Deaths of celebrities like Michael Jackson, Ed McMahon and Farrah Fawcett within days of each other can have the effect of forcing people to face up to the inevitability of their own deaths.

I spoke to a woman recently who was well on the road to recovery after a serious illness, and she said, "I'm doing just fine now, considering the alternative."

"But did you ever really consider the alternative?" I asked.

She smiled and said, "I guess I should."

So should we all.

"What eye has not seen, and ear has not heard, and what has not entered the human heart, what God has prepared for those who love him, this God has revealed to us through the Spirit" (1 Cor 2:9-10).

That's God speaking to each one of us. But we refuse to listen in faith. We refuse to permit ourselves positively and hopefully to "consider the alternative."

In an interesting new book "Life, Death, and Christian Hope," Daneen Georgy Warner reflects on the meaning of hope in the context of death.

She points out that because they fail to see their own death in the light of Christ's death and resurrection, many Christians "place their faith and hope in medicine" and thus "harbor a false sense of security concerning their mortality."

If you really believe in the resurrection of Christ, death is behind you.

"Death's not what you're moving toward," as liturgy pioneer Father Clarence Rivers said years ago, "but what you're coming from!"

The challenge for us, as Warner explains, is to face up to our cultural bias against accepting the fact that death is an inevitable part of life by "shifting our hope in human powers to hope in God."

Looking Around

JESUIT FATHER
WILLIAM J.
BYRON
CNS COLUMNIST

Have the courage now to think out loud once in awhile about what it will be like when you "join the majority." That's another way of saying "consider the alternative."

A hymn that is part of night prayer in the Liturgy of the Hours (the Divine Office or Roman Breviary as it is sometimes called) says it nicely, "We praise you, Father, for your gifts/ Of dusk and nightfall over earth/ Foreshadowing the mystery/ Of death that leads to endless day."

You are going to experience "endless day" once you "join the majority." You are going to be eternally awake and eternally aware.

The English word "enthusiasm" comes from two Greek words — "en theos" — meaning "in God." That will be your experience. So you might start thinking now of what eternal enthusiasm will be like for you.

And think of the generations who have gone on before. You will meet them all. You will know the saints to whom you prayed, the historical figures you admired and millions of others whom you never knew existed, and you will be reunited with those you loved the most when they shared space and life with you on this earth.

They will all be part of your eternal awareness. As will the mysteries of faith and the "mysteries" of things like calculus and chemistry that you never managed to translate from textbook print to mental assimilation.

So go ahead now and let yourself say, "I can hardly wait!"

Strong words from a gentle pope

Recent encyclical packed with information on spirituality, theology, economics, politics, ecology and more

It's powerful, it's wise, it's challenging, it's ancient and yet modern: It's Pope Benedict XVI's new encyclical letter "Charity in Truth" ("Caritas in Veritate").

Building on over 100 years of Catholic social teaching with a special concentration on Pope Paul VI's encyclical "The Development of Peoples" ("Populorum Progressio"), Pope Benedict takes his predecessor's groundbreaking teaching on international development — with its emphasis on economic justice for all as the basis for peace — and applies it to the economic crisis currently facing the whole world.

Among the contemporary issues the pope focuses on are globalization, microfinancing, intellectual property rights, embryonic research, technology and the environment. And among the old critical issues he concentrates on are poverty, hunger, abortion and violence.

To both new and old areas of concern, the Holy Father applies the always relevant, ancient teaching of the church: that "love is God's greatest gift to humanity, it is his promise and our hope."

Love (or charity) guided by truth teaches us to care for the needs of our human family, especially the vulnerable and poor.

In the truth of God's loving plan, human beings must always come before everything else, including profit. Profit is useful if it is a means toward a good end.

However, "once profit becomes the exclusive goal, if it is produced by improper means and without the common good as its ultimate end, it risks destroying wealth and creating poverty," wrote the pope.

And that is primarily what caused our current economic crisis. Wealth was destroyed, and most of all, poverty was created as a result of a lust for profit that put the accumulation of money and other assets above the good of all.

As a result of this greed, well over 100 million additional people are now hungry. According to a recent U.N. report, for the first time in history more than 1 billion fellow human beings are now starving or undernourished!

Making a Difference

TONY
MAGLIANO
CNS COLUMNIST

This unjust distribution of wealth is totally unacceptable to the Holy Father — and should be totally unacceptable to us as well.

Like Pope Paul, Pope Benedict calls for the need to create "a model of market economy capable of including within its range all peoples and not just the better off."

He also continues Pope John Paul II's teaching of promoting a culture of life that recognizes and respects the interconnectedness of all human life from conception to natural death, including all of creation.

The Holy Father urges us to look at our planet as a living being. And he warns that if we continue destroying our environment, we will end up destroying our own life source.

The pope is calling us to better understand and act on the whole of Catholic social teaching. It is not enough to only work for the protection of the unborn or to promote nonviolence and peace, or to strive to end poverty and hunger, or to respect the integrity of creation.

Faithful Catholics are called to do all of the above to the best of our ability!

This encyclical letter is packed with information on spirituality, theology, economics, politics, ecology and more. It is impossible to cover it adequately in one sitting or one column.

Hopefully it will be the ongoing subject of college courses, clergy in-service days, numerous homilies, social justice committee gatherings, corporate board meetings, congressional debates and family conversations.

To do justice to this outstanding encyclical we need to study, pray with and consider how best to act on the teachings of "Charity in Truth."

Story helps connect human family

I wish to extend my humble appreciation and goodwill to the huge contribution made by Clare Liptak to the communities in Tanzania ("Parishioner collects sewing machines for poor in Africa," July 17).

The collection and supply of various items to families and communities in other parts of the world goes a long way to refocus our minds on the usefulness of faith, the value of brotherhood and the positive values of every corner of God's creation — especially Africa.

This is also evidence that members of the Catholic Church possess the gifts and courage to deliver consolation at various levels and scale, simultaneously creating mutual benefits.

The issues highlighted in the story extend our horizons to the connections and networks that link the human family across the world. A simple model of interaction underscores this effort while enhancing our understanding of real-time experiences far away from familiar sights and sounds.

When 'happily ever after' doesn't happen

I am sadly rereading a commentary in a July 2007 issue of America magazine titled "A Great Mystery." It is about a misunderstood procedure in the Catholic Church: the annulment process.

I refer to it when people come to me with related questions.

The commentary cites the very public marriage case involving Joseph P. Kennedy, son of the late Robert Kennedy, and his first wife, Sheila Rauch Kennedy. Parents of two children, they were granted an annulment of their 12-year marriage in 1993.

Sheila, writes America, "mounted a campaign to reverse the annulment, publishing a book ("Shattered Faith") strongly criticizing the annulment process, claiming that Kennedy had used his family's influence to obtain the decree."

"The Vatican apparently reversed its decision in 2005, but Rauch was not notified until May of this year, after the document had been translated from Latin." Then America commented, "For so many Catholics the process (of annulments) remains a great mystery."

This is true, unfortunately, but not because the church is keeping the annulment process secret. Not at all.

I have worked with separated and divorced Catholics since the early 1970s, and so many terrific priests worked with us to clarify the church's position on annulments. Today most dioceses have a marriage tribunal, staffed with psychologists, therapists and often volunteer advocates who assist divorced Catholics seeking remarriage in the church.

"We are here to help," not place blame, is all I've ever heard from these workers.

The real area where the search for truth is crucial in the Catholic marriage situation rests in the four words "whoever God joins together." That phrase used to be interpreted legalistically, not realistically.

For decades now, the definition of Christian marriage hasn't been the old cut-and-dry equation that consent, plus consummation, equals Christian marriage. Scientific progress has been made in understanding the psychology and emotional makeup of people. It can determine if and when a person is capable of entering into a Christian marriage.

One has to have a spiritual base, a faith commitment to the Lord for a marriage to take place. God cannot join two people in matrimony if either of them does not believe in God or his Son.

Once the church began looking at Christian marriage with this new vision that focused on the living, growing relationship of two people and the legal contract, a "broken marriage" could be re-examined, and the church no longer shunted these aside as "hopeless" situations.

With compassion and wisdom the church now asks: Were these two people capable of making vows requiring

The Bottom Line

ANTOINETTE BOSCO
CNS COLUMNIST

maturity, or at least the potential for maturing? Was this ever a Christian marriage in the first place?

A "no" response to any of these questions indicated that a Christian marriage never truly existed, freeing the Catholics involved to move past their pain and start afresh.

My longtime friend Father John Catoir, former director of the Christophers and head of a diocesan marriage tribunal, has long expressed a pastoral concern for "the dilemma" of divorced Catholics.

"We are dealing with mystery," he once wrote, explaining that "the sacrament is not something that comes into existence by virtue of a legal presumption."

I agree with him, and with the America commentary that said: "The annulment process is necessarily a private one, dealing in the intimate details of a couple's life together, so it is difficult to assess how these decisions are arrived at in particular cases."

"Nonetheless, it seems clear that the church needs to do a better job explaining how annulments are obtained. For too many Catholics, the process remains a great mystery."

The anatomy of racism

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK

"He is doing a number of right things, but I still wonder about a black leading this country."

When I heard this from a fairly educated person, I thought to myself, "Racism still persists despite the enormous strides made to overcome it and despite how much schooling a person may have had."

Racism takes many forms. It involves envisioning all people who speak with a strong Southern accent as lynching-mob members of the Ku Klux Klan.

It is seeing Muslims as terrorists, or hearing Koreans, Vietnamese or Japanese speak their language and still considering them enemies of the United States.

It is encountering a black youth walking down the street and feeling the need to take precaution, or watching Jewish boys wearing black fedoras and wondering whether the Jews are behind our economic woes.

It is being irked when hearing Latinos/as speak Spanish even though they can speak English.

Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall once remarked, "The United States has been called the melting pot of the world. But it seems to me that the colored man either missed getting into the pot or he got melted down."

A form of racism seldom addressed is the melting pot mentality that holds that everyone else must "melt" into "my" culture.

What is behind such attitudes and feelings?

U.S. civil rights activist Bayard Rustin once wrote: "The resort to stereotype is the first refuge and chief strategy of the bigot."

To be a bigot is to be intolerant. In Latin the word "tolerant" means to lift up. On the other hand, intolerance means to put down.

Ironically, the basis of racism is a sense of inferiority in a person brought up in an atmosphere intolerant of other cultures. Or perhaps this person has never tried or desired to eradicate his or her ignorance regarding other races.

Racists tend to be little people living in a narrow world. They resort to belittling others as a means of being above them and preserving their provincialism.

Racism has been and will always be among us. The next time we detect it, it would be wise to dissect it in order to learn its anatomy.

Studying the makeup of a disease is the best way to stop it.

Proclaiming the Word

If lectors read Scripture verses with love, maybe their hearers would love them too

"If you have something to say, say it clearly." That is what Sister Gabriel, my eighth-grade teacher, told us when we were learning public speaking.

Enunciate clearly. Speak slowly. Speak up. Project your voice to the back of the room. Make sense out of what you are reading. Go over it ahead of time.

All of sister's admonitions apply to lectors who read the Scripture at Mass.

After the Second Vatican Council the church created two ministries for lay people: those of lectors and acolytes.

There actually is a ritual to institute and commission lectors to read Scriptures at liturgies. It is important work.

For most of Christianity's history, average people could not read or write. The printing of books in volume came some 500 years ago. Before then books were expensive and rare. Many people came to know the "good news" of Jesus Christ only when they heard it read aloud in church. This is still true today in many lives.

That is why people should take the ministry of lector seriously.

When St. Paul wrote to his spiritual son Timothy, he reminded him that all Scripture is useful for "teaching." He said to Timothy, "So proclaim the Word."

Paul said proclaim it! Don't mumble it!

A good lector can make Scripture come alive. He or she can help people to hear familiar passages with new ears.

Too many lectors read Scripture as if they are bored or have never seen the passages before. Or they read so timidly that they cannot be heard.

If Sister Gabriel were to sit on every lector's shoulder, she would remind each of a few commonsense things.

— First, speak up!

Speak directly into the microphone. Don't get so close that you pop your p's. But don't stand back so far that the mike can't pick up your voice. It does no good to read if no one can hear.

If you don't know how to work the microphone, learn. Remember, this is not a conversation; it is a proclamation. Speaking more softly does not make you more sincere.

— Second, speak slowly.

When you are speaking, your voice reverberates in large space. If you think you are talking too slowly, it is probably about right for the person in the pew.

— Third, read the passage ahead of time.

Know the context of the passage, what it is trying to say, so you can know what voice to adopt.

Parish Diary

FATHER PETER DALY
CNS COLUMNIST

Unfortunately, it is common to hear Scripture proclaimed as if the lector had never seen it before.

— Fourth, enunciate clearly.

Pronounce unfamiliar words with confidence. If you don't know how to say certain words probably no one else in the church knows either. So look up unfamiliar words ahead of time.

— Fifth, don't dramatize, but don't read in a monotone either.

Scripture is alive! It is a two-edged sword that pierces to the heart. It should not be read as if it were the Black & Decker parts catalogue.

Finally, pray what you read. These are the words of life.

When Pope Paul VI instituted the ministry of lectors, he said the reader should "make every effort ... to acquire the increasingly warm and living love and knowledge of the Scripture that will make him a more perfect disciple."

Therefore he is to "meditate assiduously on the sacred Scripture."

If lectors could read Scripture verses as if they love them, then maybe their hearers would love them too.

HICKORY — A new pastoral plan for Hispanic ministry was promulgated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis during a celebration at the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory Aug. 8.

The plan, which will become the guide for Hispanic ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte from 2009-2012, is the fourth plan of its kind in the dioceses' history. It was derived from previous plans as well as a national plan established by the U.S. bishops.

RELIGIOUS REPAIR

Gloria Visel works on a damaged statue of Our Lady of Fatima at her workshop in Winnebago, Ill., June 26. The artist's reputation for repairing damaged religious statues dates back 20 years when her pastor asked if she could fix a broken Marian statue.

Repairing religious statues can be opportunity to pray, says artist

ROCKFORD, Ill. (CNS) — Her first job was a decapitation.

The statue of Mary, mother of God, had fallen hard enough to crack off her head, Gloria Visel said as she recalled just how she got started many years ago in her work of repairing religious statues.

Parishioners at old St. Mary Church in Rockford had put the statue back together the best they could, using ribbons to try to hide the scar. But it just didn't look right.

Visel, of Winnebago, had studied art and painting before she began raising her family. With most of her children in school at that point, she volunteered her artistic services. Augustinian Father Edward Kersten, pastor, accepted her offer immediately.

His confidence in her abilities gave her the needed boost to attempt the repairs. That first statue turned out well, and Visel continued volunteering to restore the many other statues in the church. She said some of the church candles were emitting styrene, a substance that was coating the statues and making them dull and gray.

The Infant of Prague was her second patient. He and most of the others at St. Mary Church just needed a good cleaning and a few paint touch-ups. Word of her work on the statues began to spread.

"People started bringing me little statues," she said, "and then some began bringing outdoor statues, which need outdoor paints and finishes."

Visel appreciated that "people brought things that meant a lot to them." She discovered she "could kind of pray, in a way, with my paintbrush. It was hard work (at times), but different from housework. It was meditative."

The needs of each statue have ranged from a complete overhaul to touch-ups, she said, and some of the repair efforts have been "trial and error." Her tools include toothbrushes, Q-tips and dental instruments for hard-to-reach places.

"Some statues are really old and very fragile, and others come to me in (sturdy) condition," she noted.

Some statues were made of plaster; others were concrete, stone or marble. Most of her work has been with religious statues for parishes and individuals, along with an occasional bust or outdoor rooster statue.

She noted that the images of Mary have changed through the decades, with the older statues filled with many delicate details. At the request of one customer, Visel contacted an antique dealer about a statue, which was traced back to Germany and was likely part of a Stations of the Cross scene.

Visel now charges a "small amount" for her work, and considers many of her hours of work as "part of my time and talent," she said.

"I like images," she said. "They help me focus (my prayer), and statues can trigger a lot of thoughts and meditation."

Her next big project is at St. Anthony of Padua Church. She and a parish staff member will be working on the backdrop at the parish's shrine. Although Visel sees her endeavors as a "solitary work," she thinks having a co-worker for the project will be fun.

As it has over these past 20-some years, her labor of love for the saints and for people continues to evolve.

Sotomayor sworn in; becomes first Latina, sixth Catholic on court

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Sworn in Aug. 8 to serve on the U.S. Supreme Court, Justice Sonia Sotomayor becomes the first Hispanic member of the high court.

In a ceremony at the court building, Chief Justice John Roberts administered the oath of office while the newest justice's mother, Celina, held the Bible on which her daughter placed her hand.

Sotomayor will be formally invested in the court Sept. 8, the afternoon before the court convenes to hear a campaign finance case in an unusual session being held prior to the beginning of the court term Oct. 3.

Sotomayor, 55, was confirmed by the Senate Aug. 6 by a 68-31 vote. She is the sixth Catholic on the nine-member court, the most ever at one time.

A New York native and daughter of Puerto Ricans who struggled to be sure their two children were well-educated, Sotomayor is President Barack Obama's first Supreme Court nominee. She will take the place of Justice David Souter, who retired at the end of the term in June.

During several days of formal debate on her nomination, a chorus of Senate Democrats and a handful of Republicans recited her inspiring story of being raised in a housing project in the Bronx borough of New York and going on to win scholarships and honors at a rigorous Catholic high school and Ivy League universities.

Senators who voted against Sotomayor's confirmation — all Republicans — took to the floor to complain that they thought she was a "judicial activist," based largely upon comments she has made in speeches, rather than upon anything they could point to in her legal writings.

The other Catholics on the court are Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony Kennedy, Clarence Thomas and Samuel Alito.

FROM THE VATICAN

Traditional family vital for modern society, Vatican official says

Marriage promotes responsibility, says cardinal

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A Vatican official sharply criticized a sentence by Italy's highest court that said there was no substantial legal difference between a family founded on marriage and a family resulting from a cohabiting couple.

The sentence by the Court of Cassation cited an "evolution" in thinking about the forms that a family takes in modern society.

The ruling, which concerned a case of theft between an ex-cohabiting couple, was described as "a serious attack on the family" by Giuseppe Dalla Torre, a Catholic legal expert interviewed by Vatican Radio Aug. 8.

Cardinal Ennio Antonelli, president of the Pontifical Council for the Family, told Vatican Radio that the traditional family was needed more than ever today — for family members and for society as a whole.

"I view with concern this progressive slide toward a further privatization of the family, as if the family were irrelevant for society," Cardinal Antonelli said.

"Recent sociological research in various countries has highlighted a series of benefits that the so-called traditional family brings to society, and the numerous damages which the supposed new forms of family — like the single-parent family and cohabitation — bring to society," he said.

The cardinal added that because marriage is a public commitment, not only before the church but also before society, it promotes a more serious sense of responsibility among those involved.

Vatican official: Iraq's Christian community at risk of disappearing

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A leading Vatican official called for greater protection of Iraq's beleaguered Christian minority, saying the disappearance of Christianity from the country would be an enormous religious and cultural loss for everyone.

Archbishop Fernando Filoni, who served as the Vatican's nuncio to Iraq from 2001 to 2006, said it was important that Iraqi Christians stem the widespread emigration of their community. That can only happen if they are given a sound basis for hope in the future, he said.

"The authorities must do everything they can so that Christians are a respected and integral part of the life of the country, even if they are a minority," Archbishop Filoni said in an interview Aug. 11 with the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano.

The Iraqi government meets regularly with church leaders and in theory is committed to protecting Christians, but "this also has to be translated into concrete facts," he said.

The archbishop pointed to the recent restitution of three church-run schools as an important step in the right direction. The schools, two in Baghdad and one in Kirkuk, will be run by Chaldean Catholic nuns, who managed them before they were nationalized under Saddam Hussein.

"This seems to be an important signal that offers hope and indicates appreciation for the contribution Christians can give to the future of the Iraqi nation," he said.

"Even today, many Muslims remain grateful for the education they received in the Christian schools," he said.

Archbishop Filoni said that despite continuing hardships Christians in Iraq should seize on these opportunities and make the most of them.

If Iraqi Christians continue to emigrate, it won't take long before they'll lose their language, culture and identity — and it will be lost forever, he said.

The archbishop was realistic about the challenging day-to-day situation in Iraq today. He pointed to repeated bombings and other attacks, water and electrical shortages, high unemployment and a struggling educational system.

Under these circumstances, it's normal for Christian parents to wonder what kind of life Iraq will offer their children, he said. At the same time, he added, Christians also need to ask themselves whether they want their religious community to survive in Iraq.

Taiwanese Catholic Church rushes relief aid to typhoon victims

KAOHSIUNG, Taiwan (CNS) — Catholic officials in Taiwan have rushed relief aid to typhoon victims in the south of the island, including Catholics in a village badly hit by a similar storm four years ago.

The Taiwan Catholic Mission Foundation and Caritas Taiwan distributed relief aid and collected donations from local Catholics to aid victims. Bishop Peter Liu Cheng-chung of Kaohsiung set up a relief command center in Pingtung County, where at least four townships were affected.

"We never know what God's plan is and why Taiwan has to suffer miserably. We can only pray for Christ's mercy," he said in his appeal for aid Aug. 11.

"This is the moment for the church to show the spirit of the Gospel," not only by assisting victims, but also by "showing we are the instrument of God by bringing them the love of Christ," the bishop said.

Typhoon Morakot, the most powerful storm to hit Taiwan in the past 50 years, slammed into the island's eastern and southern regions Aug. 8.

"Discernment day ... makes them think about the priesthood more seriously."

Young men discern possible vocations to priesthood

The daylong event allowed the young men to interact and ask questions of the clergy and seminarians to discern what God is asking of their lives and to explore their possible callings to the priesthood.

In addition to attending Mass celebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis, the young men spent the day in prayer, eucharistic adoration and talks with the priests and seminarians.

The day also included sports, games and a panel discussion with a question-and-answer session about life in the priesthood and seminary.

Billy said he has always had a calling toward the priesthood.

"I want to help people and help them get closer to God," he said.

"Discernment day allows young Catholic men to realize that the call to the priesthood is a real possibility for them," said Father Christopher Gober, pastor of St. Lucien Church in Spruce Pine and St. Bernadette Mission in Linville and vocations director for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"The day gives them a context to see other men are thinking about it as well," he said.

"They realize they aren't the only ones thinking about a calling to the priesthood," said Father Benjamin Roberts, parochial vicar of St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro.

Father Roberts, who was ordained in June, has attended every discernment day since 2005 and was on hand to talk to the participants about life as a newly ordained priest. "It's been wonderful ... more amazing than I thought it would be," he said.

Discernment day, said Father Gober, allows young men to see "that the priesthood is a joyful life."

"I've been thinking about the priesthood for a year," said 19-year-old Josh Herman, a parishioner of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.

"I wanted to come and get a better understanding of what I may be getting myself into," he said with a smile.

"The joy," said Father Roberts, "is seeing young men come to discernment day and then enter the seminary a few years later."

Wendell Sawyer was one of those young men. The 20-year-old attended last year's discernment day and is now attending St. Charles Borromeo Seminary in Pennsylvania.

"All the signs pointed to the priesthood," he said. "Discernment day jolts people out of their comfortable surroundings and makes them think about the priesthood more seriously."

Bishop Jugis said he believed there were some future priests in the recent group.

"I was happy to spend the day with these young people who are exploring the idea of a call to the priesthood," said the bishop.

"Every day I pray a rosary specifically for our seminarians, and for all the young people of our diocese who are exploring the idea of priesthood or religious life," he said.

Belmont Abbey College rejects EEOC discrimination claims

Catholic college stands by church teaching

BELMONT — Belmont Abbey College has rejected a U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission determination that it discriminated against women and retaliated against faculty members who filed an employment discrimination charge.

In a statement released Aug. 10, college officials refuted the claim that the college discriminated based on gender in its decision to remove contraceptive benefits from its faculty health coverage plan in accordance with Catholic teaching.

"Belmont Abbey College rejects the notion that by following the moral teachings of the Catholic Church we are discriminating against anyone," said the statement. "We are simply and honestly exercising the freedom of religion that is protected by the Constitution."

After a faculty member discovered that contraception, abortion and voluntary sterilization were covered by the college's health care policy, the drugs and procedures were removed from the plan in December 2007. Though North Carolina requires this coverage, it offers an exemption for religious institutions.

"The teaching of the Catholic Church on this moral issue is clear. The responsibility of the college as a Catholic college sponsored by the monks of Belmont Abbey to follow church teaching is equally clear," wrote college president Dr. William Thierfelder in a 2008 letter to faculty defending the decision.

"There was no other course of action possible if we were to operate in fidelity to our mission and to our identity as a Catholic college," he wrote.

"The Newman Guide to Choosing a Catholic College," published by the Catholic higher education organization the Cardinal Newman Society, has listed Belmont Abbey College as an example of a faithful Catholic college.

The case was thought closed when in March 2009 the college received a "Dismissal and Notice of Rights" determination letter from the EEOC, saying the commission was closing its file on the discrimination charge. According to the college, the file was closed because the commission was unable to conclude that the college's decision to change the employee health plan violated the statutes.

"We were surprised to learn that the EEOC has now reversed itself," the college's recent statement said.

By denying prescription contraception drugs, the college "is discriminating based on gender because only females take oral prescription contraceptives," wrote Reuben Daniels Jr., the EEOC Charlotte District Office director, in the Aug. 5 determination.

"By denying coverage, men are not affected, only women," wrote Daniels.

The EEOC also determined the college retaliated against eight faculty members who filed charges with the EEOC by identifying them by name in a letter to faculty and staff.

"We have not — and will not — 'retaliate' against the faculty members who complained to the EEOC," said the college statement.

The EEOC asked both the faculty and the college to work with it to reach a resolution. If the college declines to discuss the settlement or an acceptable settlement is not reached, the director would inform the two sides and advise them of the court enforcement alternatives available.

"We are disappointed that this matter has taken this very unusual twist, but we remain committed to ensuring that all of the college's policies and practices follow the teachings of the Catholic Church, which includes valuing all life and treating individuals with dignity and respect, and providing equal opportunities for all," said the college's statement.

The statement said the college was confident its actions would be found in compliance with all federal and state laws and with the U.S. Constitution.

"Accordingly, the college will be asking the EEOC to reconsider each of the current determinations it has made in connection with the charges filed against the college," it said.

To lead, to grow, to love

Pastor looks forward to serving, guiding parish in Hendersonville

BY KATHLEEN HEALY
CORRESPONDENT

HENDERSONVILLE — “Many things happen in a spiritual conversion” says Capuchin Franciscan Father Nick Mormando.

Father Mormando arrived from New York to assume the role of pastor of Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville Feb. 25, 2009. The date coincided with Ash Wednesday, a fitting beginning for the priest who assumes the pastorate with a reflective spirit and measured thoughtfulness regarding his new position.

During his first several months,

Father Mormando met his parishioners, considered the programs in place at the church and at Immaculata School, and listened to what was wanted and needed for both.

The listening session led to the discovery that many within the parish were filled with an eagerness to grow and extend the faith and outreach of the church.

“There is a willingness to make the (church) community grow,” said Father Mormando. “They come forth to share themselves with one another, to offer themselves.”

“Too often people don’t realize the talent they bring. There are many who think they only have a little, but like the boy with the loaves and fishes, look what happens when a little is turned over to the Lord.”

During ecumenical interactions with other church leaders in Hendersonville, Father Mormando has felt warmly welcomed to his new home in the community.

“There is always room to grow in mutual understanding and knowledge of others’ faith,” he said.

“I’ve been asked by so many how I was doing here. They want to know how I am adjusting to the difference between the large city and a small town, but I’ve been so welcomed that I haven’t had a difficult adjustment.”

What is meant to be

Father Mormando’s faith journey began in Catholic elementary school, and while attending a public high school he continued to regularly attend Mass — a defining decision in his commitment to his Catholic faith.

After high school he resumed his education at St. Francis College in Brooklyn, N.Y. Seeking to join the Capuchin Franciscans, he furthered his studies with two years at St. Joseph’s Seminary in the Archdiocese of New York, where he professed perpetual vows in 1987. But he was not ordained as a priest until 13 years later.

“When I left seminary after two years I thought to myself, I’ve made a mistake,” recalled Father Mormando, “but one of my spiritual mentors advised me to ‘put it on the back burner and if it comes back, then you will know it was meant to be.’”

“I was slow in coming. I gave God a struggle,” Father Mormando said with a smile.

During the intervening years after profession of vows and ordination, he spent most of the time in parish work, but also was involved in vocations and even cooked at the novitiate.

“I came from an Italian Catholic family and I like to eat, so I learned to cook,” he said.

Toward the future

Arriving at Immaculate Conception Church, Father Mormando had his own ideas for the parish, but decided he would wait and listen to the people to hear what they wanted and had to offer.

“God is letting me know through them. My vision may not be God’s; you have to be willing to let go of your own to find the strength and grace to implement what God wants,” he said.

“Many are spiritually hungry and I am here to feed them,” said Father Mormando. “People are sensing something good is about to happen. Here in the church is a core group of intercessors. Their prayers are bringing blessings down on this place and they are not even aware they are doing it.”

Seeing great openness to what God is doing among the parishioners, Father Mormando has noted the great work being done within the existing parish groups, including two that are particularly active — the youth group and the Hispanic community.

Additional parish programs being considered include the establishment of a Cursillo group, a new Bible study and eucharistic adoration.

“I need to know they want to deepen their faith and are willing to go the next step,” said Father Mormando.

Particularly, he feels the institution of eucharistic adoration must be considered when the community is ready for the fullness of the experience.

“Adoration is part of a big spiritual awakening in the hearts of people and within the parish as a whole,” he said.

“There are already great things in place here,” said Father Mormando. “For the future there is much hope as we work toward growth and, through the presence of God, open up to a willingness to offer our works and faith throughout the community.”

Group hopes to affect immigration reform, assist community

BY KATHLEEN HEALY SCHMIEDER
CORRESPONDENT

HENDERSONVILLE — In cooperation with the U.S. bishops, a small but dedicated group at Immaculate Conception in Hendersonville has begun working for immigration reform.

Working from a position based on Scripture and Catholic social teaching, the parish Justice for Immigrants Team is hoping to foster change and uncover avenues that will restructure current immigration policies in order to ease situations faced by communities throughout the country.

Justice for Immigrants is a campaign of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops with the goals of educating the public and Catholic community about migration and immigrants; creating political will for positive immigration reform; enacting legislative and administrative reforms based on the bishops' principles; and organizing Catholic networks to help qualified immigrants obtain the benefits of reform.

The parish Justice for Immigrants team, which meets monthly, is uniting with other religious and community groups to create a coalition to help usher in change and reform.

About 25 people from the team and other area groups gathered at the historic courthouse in downtown Hendersonville July 31 for a 45-minute vigil in support of changes to current laws to allow opportunities for permanent residency for the millions of undocumented people currently residing in the United States.

"There was no negative response, but some positive response from people who were there" said Capuchin Franciscan Father John Salvias, parochial vicar of Immaculate Conception Church.

Father Salvias works extensively with the Hispanic community at Immaculate Conception Church.

A second vigil is planned for Aug. 28, and vigils are expected to continue on the last Friday of every month.

The Justice for Immigrants Team hopes to continue networking with other local efforts to affect the changes they seek. Mini-conferences held throughout the state work to bring the ecumenical efforts together, and team members will attend one such conference in Asheville Sept. 3.

"The effort is fragmented," said Grace Poli, a team member, about the variety of challenges the effort faces. "We have had major problems with getting people to change from using the terms 'legal' and 'illegal' to 'documented' and 'undocumented.'"

"The most important thing we can do is to write letters," said Catherine Lynch, team coordinator, who distributes sample letters to send to the congressional representatives.

To help put a face on the immigration reform issue, on Sept. 19-20 Immaculate Conception Church will be among the area churches to hold a "Welcome the Immigrant" weekend. Immigrants have been invited to share their personal stories.

The U.S. bishops have stated they do not support anyone defying the law, but instead they seek to amend laws currently in place.

As such, the team plans to continue fighting for policy reformation, encouraging others to show hospitality and to welcome immigrants in their communities, and bringing a faith perspective to an issue with no easy answers.

Father Salvias said he has faced criticism for addressing immigration in his homilies.

"For me this is not about politics. This is about the Gospel," he said.

HISPANIC MINISTRY

Bishop promulgates new Hispanic ministry pastoral plan enriches our local church," said Bishop Jugis in a letter included at the front of the new pastoral plan.

"I am happy to present this pastoral plan for Hispanic ministry, which will help guide our growth in Christ as a diocesan family for the next three years," the bishop said.

According to the plan's introduction, the diocese looked to the 1987 "National Pastoral Plan for Hispanic Ministry" as a model.

The first pastoral plan for Hispanic ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte was approved in 1992 after adapting the national plan to fit the needs of Catholics in Western North Carolina. A second plan was promulgated in 1998 and a third in 2002.

According to Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkott, director of diocesan Hispanic ministry, there is a need every few years to re-evaluate the goals of Hispanic ministry in the diocese. With this new plan, there were two primary concerns that were taken into consideration.

The first is an accommodation for changing circumstances within the Hispanic community, according to Sister Inkott, and the second is a call for refocusing based on societal changes she refers to as the "signs of the times."

One thing Sister Inkott wants people to realize is that "the principles (of the plan) apply to all immigrant communities."

"Our whole country, our whole word is experiencing a mixing of cultures coming together," said Sister Inkott. "The church is going to be multicultural also."

"This plan is for the whole diocese," she said. "The goal is to bring all people to the table as one family of God in the Diocese of Charlotte."

Inspiration for the plan came from Pope John Paul II's call for new evangelization as detailed in the document "Encuentro & Mission, A renewed Pastoral Framework for Hispanic Ministry."

The plan has four specific dimensions: formation, missionary option, pastoral de conjunto or "communion in mission," and liturgy and prayer.

According to Sister Inkott, each dimension has goals and offers actions and suggestions for carrying them out.

She said her hope is "that more people will know what the plan is, understand it and be willing and able to put it into practice."

"In order for the pastoral plan to work, everyone has got to work with it," she said.

To date the diocese has 60 parishes and missions working with Hispanic communities. Each of its 10 vicariates has a Hispanic ministry coordinator. In addition there is a diocesan coordinator for Hispanic youth ministry.

Authors explore place of animals in Christianity

Books discuss if God's plan for salvation includes creatures

BY TRISTA TURLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Two new books by Christian authors Father Jack Wintz and Leila Harris explore the place of animals in Christianity.

In his book "Will I See My Dog in Heaven?" Father Wintz, a Franciscan friar, explores whether or not God's plan for salvation includes creatures other than humans.

Harris' "All of the Animals in the Bible" is a topical index of all animals that appear in Scripture.

The question in the title of his book "sounds like a naive kid's question," Father Wintz said in an interview with Catholic News Service June 13, "but I think it fits in this broader context (of the question of salvation for all creation.)"

Father Wintz said his motivation to write the book stemmed largely from his experience as a Franciscan.

"I have a great fascination for St. Francis of Assisi, especially his great love and respect for animals as well as for trees, rivers, wild flowers and creation as a whole," he stated.

Throughout the book's 10 chapters, Father Wintz utilizes evidence from Scripture, the works of St. Francis of Assisi and Judeo-Christian tradition to make the case that God intends to save all of creation, including beloved pets.

The evidence includes some familiar stories such as that of Noah, as well as less familiar works like St. Francis' "Cantic of Brother Sun," a song of praise in which St. Francis refers to all of creation as brothers and sisters of man.

While Father Wintz believes that there is strong evidence to indicate that all of creation is included in God's plan for salvation, he acknowledges that Christians are divided on the issue.

"It's true that we know little detail about (heaven) or how animals and other creatures will be included in the picture," he stated.

While "Will I See My Dog in Heaven?" includes a substantial amount of theological analysis, Father Wintz said the book also includes several stories and is "for a wide, popular audience."

"A lot of (the theology) is very simple," said the priest, who was in Washington for a book signing at the Franciscan monastery.

Father Wintz is a longtime writer and editor for St. Anthony Messenger magazine, based in Cincinnati.

Harris' book provides the original Greek or Hebrew term and the English translation for each animal, followed by a synopsis and analysis of their natural and symbolic roles in the Bible. A knowledge quiz also is included to keep readers entertained.

Harris told CNS in a June 11 telephone interview that the comfort she found in God's symbolic use of animals in Scripture inspired her to write the book.

A self-described animal lover, she believes her work on the book reinforced her love for animals.

Harris said that there is a wealth of scriptural evidence to demonstrate that God, too, cares about animals.

"(God) created animals before he created humans," she said, adding that "man's first job was to name and take care of animals."

Like Father Wintz, Harris said she believes there will be animals in heaven.

"(There are) animals in the Book of Revelations -- the beasts around the throne of God," she noted.

However, Harris also stated that, because Jesus died exclusively for the souls of men, she cannot be sure that specific, individual animals from our lives on earth will be present in the afterlife.

Harris believes her book will appeal largely to Christians who enjoy studying the Bible. She also hopes that the book can help introduce other animal lovers to Christ.

"(I want) to bring Christians closer to the Lord," she said.

"All of the Animals in the Bible" is the first in a series of books by Harris, who holds a degree in religious studies from Regent University.

Her second book, "All of the Trees in the Bible," is scheduled for release later in June.

Decisions, trust should be placed in God's hands

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

God's faithfulness and trustworthiness seems to be a theme throughout this week's readings.

Joshua challenges the tribes of Israel to decide whom they will follow: strange gods or the Lord, the God of their fathers.

After Joshua makes his own firm declaration, "As for me and my household, we will serve the Lord," the people respond likewise, recalling that it was the Lord who brought them out of slavery, performed miracles and protected them on their entire journey.

The passage from John comes after Jesus' bread of life discourse. Jesus asks his disciples, "Do you also want to leave?"

Simon Peter answers, "Master, to whom shall we go? You have the words of eternal life."

Moments of challenge and decision. We all have them, though not often as dramatic as these. They become turning points in our lives.

We resist a fatal temptation. We choose a path for our lives with such determination that it forms us in ways we hadn't expected. We remain faithful to our principles and our commitments and in so doing form a solid foundation not only for our own lives, but for the lives of our spouses and children.

At a wedding near Houston recently, my wife and daughter and I gathered with old friends from our prayer community in Fort Worth. Though we haven't met formally in years, these friendships of 20-30 years and more endure.

We still love and pray for one another, and we still love and pray for each other's children as though they were our own.

As we visited over coffee or a meal, we recounted stories of God's miraculous interventions in our lives and the lives of our children. We rejoiced together over the goodness of God, of his faithfulness in answering our prayers and in continuing his work of redemption in us and our children.

Decades ago, we had each answered for ourselves, sometimes in the very words of Joshua, the eternal question of how we would live our lives, and despite our frailties and failings, the joy that came from attempting to live out that affirmation was palpable.

If we had it to do over again, all of us would say once more, "As for me and my household, we will serve the Lord."

Questions:

Have you considered placing major life decisions in God's hands? How have you experienced God's redemptive grace in your own life?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"It was the Lord, our God, who brought us and our fathers up out of the land of Egypt, out of a state of slavery. ... Therefore we also will serve the Lord, for he is our God" (Joshua 24:17-18).

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The music-loving Pope Benedict XVI will be featured on a new CD singing and reciting Marian hymns and prayers.

"Alma Mater," Latin for "nourishing mother," will be released worldwide Nov. 30 by Geffen Records.

Using material recorded by Vatican Radio, the album will feature Pope Benedict singing the "Regina Coeli" hymn to Mary as well as prayers and snippets of talks in Latin, Italian, Portuguese, French and German, Geffen announced July 31.

Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, Vatican spokesman and director of Vatican Radio, said the radio authorized use of about 10 minutes of the pope's voice for the project, which was developed by Geffen and by the multimedia production company of the Pauline Fathers.

Geffen said proceeds from the sale of the CD would be used to provide music education to underprivileged children around the world.

The CD will include the Litany of Loreto and other popular Marian prayers along with eight original classical compositions commissioned for the project.

The pieces featuring the pope will be accompanied by the choir of the Philharmonic Academy of Rome singing in St. Peter's Basilica. The new classical pieces will be recorded by the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, Geffen said.

In 1994, Vatican Radio authorized the publication of a CD featuring Pope John Paul II reciting the rosary in Latin; sold with a commentary in a variety of languages, the CD was an instant hit.

Pope Benedict has not commented on the CD project, but he spoke about music as a universal language after a concert Aug. 2 in the courtyard of the papal villa at Castel Gandolfo.

The pope apologized to Italians in the audience for speaking in German, but said he did so because the orchestra and many of the guests were German.

"Unfortunately, after the events of the tower of Babel, languages separate us, creating barriers," the pope said.

But, he said, peoples of all tongues can understand the language of music "because it touches our hearts. For us, this is not only a guarantee that the goodness and beauty of God's creation has not been destroyed, but it also reminds us that we are called to and capable of working together for what is good and beautiful."

Benedictine sisters' love of music results in CD recording

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — A pair of Benedictine sisters in Minnesota, both in their 70s, aren't afraid of trying new things: They learned how to record a CD — and are using a blog to promote it.

The CD is "Sisters in Sync," performed by Sister Ellen Cotone, who played both the piano and the accordion on the recording, and Sister Margaret Mandernach, who played the electric bass and the harmonica.

Both live in retirement at the Benedictines' St. Scholastica retirement home in St. Cloud, Minn., six miles away from their monastery in St. Joseph, Minn.

Sister Cotone and Sister Mandernach played at social gatherings organized at either the monastery or retirement home, and people started asking, "Where can we get a tape of your music?"

"When we decided to make a tape, it was, of course, a CD," Sister Mandernach said. "Tapes are obsolete."

Sister Mandernach went to a recording studio that had recorded the Benedictine monastery's schola, or choir, some time earlier.

The studio owner said he would do the recording project at no charge.

Sister Cotone and Sister Mandernach, neither of whom had stepped into a recording studio before, recorded the CD's 30 songs in just two days, with each session lasting about two hours.

They used a third day to do overdubs with Sister Cotone on the accordion and Sister Mandernach on the harmonica, "just for variety's sake," Sister Mandernach said.

"We had never done recording before, so the overdubs were very interesting," she said. After the CD was recorded, "our monastery blog wrote about it," she added.

The CD, which features tunes in a variety of styles — including polka, calypso, sacred songs and popular standards ("by popular we mean the 1930s and '40s," Sister Mandernach said) — zips by fairly quickly, as the 30 selections take but 52 minutes or so to play.

"We chose songs that were spirited and uplifting and kind of peppy — easy to listen to," according to Sister Mandernach. "We wanted to bring joy and peace to people by doing this, as well as taking care of our own passion for music."

The CD, while available at the monastery's gift shop, was never meant to be a fundraiser for the Benedictines. The sisters accept only donations for the CD, since so much effort on the CD was donated to them.

Even so, the sisters have had to order a second batch of "Sisters in Sync" to keep up with demand, especially after the nuns were profiled in the St. Cloud Daily Times newspaper.

Sister Mandernach and Sister Cotone have been making music together for seven years, after they both joined the retirement community.

"We clicked," Sister Mandernach said.

They play outside the monastery or retirement home infrequently, but they do take part in a monthly jam session in St. Cloud.

"We just say the name of the tune, and what key we're going to play it in, and everybody joins along," Sister Mandernach added.

They also have performed occasionally with an outfit known as the Central Minnesota Musicians Unorganized Organization.

"We get together once in a while, just for fun, when there's an occasion to play at," Sister Mandernach said.

She said she once asked Sister Cotone, "Wouldn't it be great to play more with the Central Minnesota Musicians Unorganized?"

"Well, that's the way it goes," was Sister Cotone's reply. "We're in a convent. We have other responsibilities."

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

For the month of August, here is a look at the 140-year history of St. James the Greater Church in Concord

ARCHIVES PHOTO

St. James the Greater Church in Concord as it appeared in 1927.

On Jan. 1, 1869, Bishop (and future cardinal) James Gibbons acquired land on Gold Hill Road in Cabarrus County. The hill-top property became the first location of St. James the Greater Church and the second Catholic cemetery established in western North Carolina.

The fruition of a church in Concord began with the conversion of Joseph Barnhardt and his family, who entered into the Catholic Church in 1842.

Barnhardt zealously shared the Catholic faith with his neighbors. Over time, a community of Catholics formed in the area.

Barnhardt died in 1860, and nine years later his son-in-law, George Goodman, deeded the land for the original church and cemetery. This original cemetery remains the oldest active Catholic cemetery in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Father J.J. O'Connell served the mission for many years before the construction of an actual church building. In his book "Catholicity in the Carolinas and Georgia," Father O'Connell wrote of both the town of Concord and the Barnhardts. In the following passage, he recounted one of his more miraculous episodes and highlighted the dangers of being Catholic in Cabarrus County during the 1800s.

"During one of my visits [to Concord] in 1854, after my retirement at night to the priest's apartment, which was a genteel shed-room, Mr. B[arnhardt] approached and directed me to make the fastening secure on the inside. He manifested equal industry in barring the entrance from the outside.

"On enquiring the cause of this unusual precaution, he assured me that my life was in danger, and that he expected a mob would attack the house some night and kill me; that I was deemed by the neighborhood an envoy or emissary of the pope, and had come for the sole purpose of upsetting the government; that it was resolved that I should not escape with my life.

"He also assured me that a certain man known to him lay in ambush in the woods, and kept snapping his hitherto unerring rifle at me until I was out of sight, and that it hung fire every time, a circumstance which never before occurred" (pg. 491).

Father O'Connell also told of the eventual acceptance and growth of the Catholic faith in and around Concord due to the witness of the Barnhardt family.

"It was through this family that Catholicity made its way into Cabarrus County. ... Within the space of 25 years nearly all the settlement have embraced the faith" (pg. 489).

These historical accounts of the St. James community reflected the typical struggles and peril facing North Carolina Catholics during the 19th century, as well as the strength, determination and character of those who came before us in the faith.

— Aug. 1, 1869: Bishop James Gibbons dedicated St. James the Greater Church.

— 1876: St. James became the first mission of Belmont Abbey when Benedictine Father Herman Wolfe was assigned to serve the community.

— Aug. 26, 1925: A letter from Benedictine Father Herman Grones spoke of the mission at Concord as "consoling" due to the fact that 25-30 parishioners received Communion at Mass. At this time, this number was remarkable because Mass took place once every third Sunday of the month.

Father Grones stated "there should have been a priest stationed here the past 10 years, [and] Concord should have Mass more than once a month."

— November 1928: The Sisters of Mercy begun visits to St. James Church for catechetical instruction.

— 1936: Belmont Abbey relinquished St. James Church and it became a mission of Our Lady of the Annunciation Church in Albemarle.

— 1945: Father Thomas Curran became the first resident pastor of the church.

— 1947: St. James Church was designated a parish.

— February 1954: The original church building on Gold Hill Road burned down.

— July 31, 1954: St. James Church recorded 221 parishioners.

— May 22, 1955: Raleigh Bishop Vincent S. Waters dedicated the second St. James Church at its new location on Union Street in Concord.

— Fall 1964: St. James Church installed air conditioning. Concerning this event, Msgr. Richard Allen, pastor, wrote: "We are beginning to 'lose' some of our parishioners on Sunday morning during the summer to St. Peter's in Charlotte."

— Aug. 2, 1967: St. James Church took over custodial care of the St. Joseph Mission in Kannapolis.

— July 31, 1971: St. James Church grew to 500 parishioners.

— Aug. 29, 1974: Redemptorist Father George Kelly became the first Redemptorist to serve as pastor. The Redemptorists have continuously staffed the parish to the present.

— July 31, 1994: Bishop William G. Curlin dedicated the parish center.

— Dec. 5, 2004: Bishop Peter J. Jugis dedicated the latest St. James Church constructed on Manor Avenue in Concord.

— July 1, 2007: St. Joseph Mission ceased to be a mission of St. James Church as it was designated a parish.

Diocesan CFO earns top honor among peers

Journal's 2009 CFO of the Year Award.

The award recognizes financial management skills, strategic thinking and a demonstrated commitment to fiscal integrity and accountability.

Weldon was nominated for the category of large nonprofit organization.

As CFO for the Diocese of Charlotte, Weldon oversees all of the financial aspects of the diocese including the 92 churches, 18 schools, three foundations, social service offices, news publishing, real estate development and affordable housing — totaling a combined 2008 budget of $130 million.

"Serving as CFO for the Catholic Diocese of Charlotte is both rewarding and challenging," said Weldon during an interview with Charlotte Business Journal.

"The position allows me to serve my church through my chosen profession, for which I am very grateful," he said.

Weldon has been with the diocese for the past 16 years. During his tenure he has strived to increase the transparency of financial reporting within the 46-county diocese.

"The Diocese of Charlotte is committed to maintaining the highest standards of fiscal integrity and accountability," Weldon said.

"My goal is to support the work of the many dedicated clergy and other professionals by strengthening the financial base of the organization," he said. "This is accomplished by building the trust and confidence of our constituents through proper stewardship of our fiscal resources and complete financial accountability."

In 2006, Weldon was appointed chairperson of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Accounting Practices Committee, a position for which he was nominated by his peers. He is currently serving a three-year term.

"I am very honored to have been nominated for this award. I am also very thankful to Bishop Peter J. Jugis and Msgr. Mauricio West (diocesan vicar general and chancellor) for the opportunity to serve as diocesan CFO, and to my colleagues in the finance office for their dedication and support," said Weldon.

Recent findings make scientific case for shroud on the mystery behind the shroud.

Why is it important for Catholics to be aware of the science behind this mysterious cloth?

"Because contained within the shroud is the compelling story of Jesus' passion, death and resurrection," Iannone said. "It tells a story in the science."

According to tradition, the 14-foot-by-4-foot linen cloth is the burial shroud of Jesus.

The shroud has a full-length photonegative image of a man, front and back, bearing signs of wounds that correspond to the Gospel accounts of the torture Jesus endured in his passion and death.

The church has never officially ruled on the shroud's authenticity, saying judgments about its age and origin belonged to scientific investigation. Scientists have debated its authenticity for decades, and studies have led to conflicting results.

Crafting a case

Iannone began studying the shroud in 1978.

In 1998 he was invited by Cardinal Giovanni Saldarini, then papal custodian of the shroud, to attend a 3-day shroud scientific and historical congress in Turin, Italy.

During the conference he had the opportunity to observe the shroud firsthand for several hours, an experience Iannone called "a defining moment" in his life.

In his presentation in Charlotte, Iannone offered detailed scientific evidence to support his case for the shroud's authenticity.

Forensics and faith

He began with the physical element of the cloth itself, which is consistent in size and composition with ancient Jewish burial customs.

He talked about the image on the shroud and how it was most likely created.

It is clearly not a painting, according to Iannone, as there are no signs of paint in the fabric. The images are scorch-like, yet not created by heat.

Iannone said that some physicists have indicated the image was likely formed from light — that is, light radiating from the body.

Iannone also talked about the consistency between the words of the New Testament regarding the passion and the wounds depicted on the shroud — wounds that are consistent with the weapons used by ancient Roman soldiers in crucifixion.

John Iannone presents a case for the authenticity of the Shroud of Turin during a talk at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte July 29.

He mentioned the blood on the shroud, which has been tested and determined to be human male of the type AB — the rarest blood type with the highest percentage being found in northern Palestine.

He described the study of pollen grains and imprints on the shroud, as being representative of plants that are indigenous to the Holy Land.

Discrediting doubt

Even with such compelling evidence there is still uncertainty surrounding the authenticity of the shroud, much of which stems from the results of a 1988 carbon-14 dating test.

"The 1988 headlines made my stomach churn," said Iannone, recalling the day that the results came out debunking the authenticity of the shroud.

Results of the test dated the composition of the cloth to the medieval period.

Recent studies, however, have refuted the results of the carbon-14 test on the basis that the sample cut from the shroud in 1988 was taken from an area of the cloth that was re-woven during the Middle Ages.

The sample was taken from a patch that was sewn into the shroud to repair a hole caused by a fire in 1532.

Today's take

Pope Benedict XVI confirmed his intention to visit the Shroud of Turin when it goes on public display in Turin's cathedral April 10-May 23, 2010.

The last time the Shroud of Turin was displayed to the public was in 2000 for the jubilee year.

for very special spiritual occasions — typically once every 25 years — and its removal for study or display to the public must be approved by the pope.

So why is the shroud going on display now?

"I think it's because all of the new studies have demonstrated that the carbon-14 tests of 1988 were not accurate," Iannone said. "We've got to restore the credibility that was destroyed" back then.

"If you accept the fact that it is authentic, then it tells a story," he said.

"It is a compelling re-examination of Jesus' passion, death and resurrection."

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

An example for us all

St. John Vianney and the Year for Priests

The patron saint of my parish is St. John Vianney.

This year the whole Catholic world is becoming familiar with him because Pope Benedict XVI has proclaimed a Year for Priests under the patronage of St. John Vianney.

Jean-Marie Vianney is the patron saint of parish priests.

He was the pastor of the little town of Ars, France (near Lyon), in the turbulent era following the French Revolution. He is known as the Cure of Ars since as a pastor he had the "cure" or "care" of souls.

He died 150 years ago. Aug. 4, 1859, is his "dies natalis," the day of his birth into everlasting life.

Before I came to my parish, I didn't know much about St. John Vianney. And what I did know did not seem very appealing. He seemed like one of those plastic saints, a little unreal, even a little ditz.

I never liked the stories about him eating rotten potatoes or spending 18 hours a day in the confessional. I just didn't believe it or think it sounded healthy, spiritually or physically.

Pope Benedict has noted that sometimes the biographers of the saint were given to "pious excess."

I never heard St. John Vianney even mentioned in my seminary years in Rome, even though we were supposed to be training to be like him, parish priests.

It was not until I came to this parish named for him that I began to learn about his life. People gave me books about him and collections of his sermons.

His sermons struck me as severe, mostly admonishing the sinner and condemning sin. John Vianney did not approve of dancing or playing cards.

But gradually, I have come to admire St. John Vianney.

Ironically, the man who is now the model and measure of parish priests almost did not get ordained himself. He was, to be blunt, not the brightest bulb in the chandelier.

Parish Diary

FATHER PETER DALY
CNS COLUMNIST

He was sent to Ars, a town of only 230 souls. Few of them went to church. The bishop is reported to have said that at least John Vianney could do no damage in Ars.

He stayed in that little parish for 42 years, the rest of his life. There he fell in love with the people of his parish. Eventually they fell in love with him.

They could see that he cared about them. He also cared about being a priest. He had reverence for what he was and what he did.

His greatest love was celebrating the liturgy. "All good workstakentogther," he wrote, "do not equal the sacrifice of the Mass."

He loved hearing confessions, because he loved the people who came to him. He cared about their souls and their happiness. He wanted them to be free of the burden of sin.

Near the end of his life, John Vianney's reputation as a confessor was so great that people came from all over France just to confess their sins to him. He was famous as a holy man. The French government awarded him its highest honor, the Legion of Honor.

His most eloquent sermon was his life. Pope Benedict has said of him,

"St. John Vianney taught his parishioners primarily by the witness of his life."

In that sense he is a very real and modern saint. Today we put more faith in lived example than in words of holiness.

St. John Vianney was a saint who "walked the walk" more than "talked the talk."

In that regard, he is an example for us all.

St. John Vianney, pictured in a stained-glass window, is widely known to Catholics as the Cure d'Ars who won over the hearts of his villagers in France by visiting with them, teaching them about God and reconciling people to the Lord in the confessional. His feast day is Aug. 1.

The principal force behind human development

A short summary of 'Caritas in Veritate'

When I read that Pope Benedict XVI presented President Barack Obama with a personal copy of his latest encyclical, "Caritas in Veritate," I said to myself, "Good luck, Mr. President, you've got some heavy reading ahead."

Then I wondered whether a one-page summary would help. This is what I offer here.

"Charity in truth" means truth-filled love. This is the "principal driving force" behind human development, says the pope.

Love is the force that leads people "to opt for courageous and generous engagement in the field of justice and peace."

Truth, according to this encyclical, is conformity with "God's plan." In God's plan, humans find truth. Charity "is at the heart of the church's social doctrine."

Charity in truth "is the principle around which the church's social doctrine turns."

The church's social doctrine has a lot to say about justice and the common good; these are the criteria that govern moral action in an increasingly globalized society. Justice "is inseparable from charity."

On this point Pope Benedict reaffirms Pope Paul VI's conviction that "justice is love's absolute minimum."

The common good, says Benedict, is "a good that is linked to living in society." It is the good of all of us.

He writes: "The church does not have technical solutions to offer" and does not want "to interfere in any way with the politics of states," but does have a mission to proclaim the truth, an important dimension of which is its social doctrine.

It would be a major mistake "to entrust the entire process of development to technology." All of us are "called" by God to work for human development.

"The truth of development consists in its completeness: If it does not involve the whole man and every man, it is not true development."

"The church had good reason to be concerned about the capacity of a purely technological society to set realistic goals" in the context of today's worldwide economic crisis.

Our world "needs to rediscover fundamental values on which to build a better future." Worthy of rediscovery

Looking Around

JESUIT FATHER WILLIAM J. BYRON

are the fundamental values of justice and truth-filled love.

In economic matters, "once profit becomes the exclusive goal, if it is produced by improper means and without the common good as its ultimate end, it risks destroying wealth and creating poverty."

Workers' rights are in need of protection. Food insecurity needs to be addressed. The goal of "access to steady employment for everyone" is a major priority.

"One of the most striking aspects of development in the present day is the important question of respect for life. ... Openness to life is at the center of true development. ... Violence puts the brakes on authentic development."

"The economy needs ethics in order to function correctly — not any ethics whatsoever but an ethics which is people-centered. ... Efforts are needed — and it is essential to say this — not only to create 'ethical' sectors or segments of the economy or the world of finance, but to ensure that the whole economy — the whole of finance — is ethical, not merely by virtue of an external label but by its respect for requirements intrinsic to its very nature. The church's social teaching is quite clear on the subject."

"Caritas in Veritate" is the latest in a long line of papal social encyclicals dating back to Pope Leo XIII's "Rerum Novarum" in 1891. They tend to be lengthy and dense, which is another way of saying difficult to read.

But they are worth reading because they convey the principles, which, if implemented, go a long way toward preparing the way for the coming of the promised kingdom of justice, love and peace.

"Now, was that at all helpful, Mr. President?"

One mystical body

Sacrifice of the Mass is act of love more intimate than any human union

In the liturgy of the church, only one person prays; namely, Jesus Christ.

At every Mass, he and the members of his mystical body are able to enter the inner chamber of divine love. United to him, we become the adopted children of the Father.

Understood properly, the sacrifice of the Mass is an act of love more intimate than human intercourse. Gaining access to God the Father in this way is only possible through the mediation of Jesus Christ.

St. Augustine articulated the mystery of our longing for God when he wrote: "Our hearts are restless until they rest in you, O Lord."

Nostalgia for paradise resides in the heart of every human being, saints and sinners alike.

As we try to reach out to our maker, we usually experience frustration and disappointment. We do not feel God's embrace, and this is upsetting.

But our longing for God is an essential part of the human condition.

Did you ever stop to think that this yearning is a gift? God wants you to feel empty, and he gives you his Son to help you find your way home.

Jesus announces himself as the privileged channel of communication for everyone who is searching for union with the Father: "No one comes to the Father except through me" (Jn 14:6).

He also said, "Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened, and I will give you rest" (Mt 11:28).

The church teaches us that the sacrifice of the Mass is an event involving intimate union with God. The doctrine of the Trinity tells us God is a furnace of love made up of three persons — Father, Son and Holy Spirit — eternally loving one another.

To enter the love that passes between the three requires a supernatural passport. You become one with the second person, Jesus Christ, and become covered with his holiness.

The relationship between Jesus and his Father is unique and personal. As the second person of the Trinity, Jesus is always offering himself to the Father. The marvel of it is that he allows us to participate in this supernatural act of love: "I am the vine, you are the branches" (Jn 15:5).

United to his self-offering, we are no longer isolated human beings. With him we have become one mystical body. This is why Jesus taught us to address God as

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST

"our Father," not "my Father."

The Mass is more than a church ritual; it is an act of love in the fullest sense. Our faith enables us to rise above our petty fears of inadequacy and unworthiness.

No one is worthy. We have been chosen in spite of our unworthiness. We are no longer poor, helpless creatures. Miraculously we have become lovers of our Father in heaven.

As we enter this profound mystery, we are humbly grateful. We no longer see the sacrifice of the Mass as an irksome obligation. Our feelings of unworthiness dissolve.

The charisma of the priest, or the lack of it, becomes irrelevant. All that matters is that we are one with Jesus in an act of love.

Jesus alone has access to the sacred presence of the Father. In him, with him and through him we enjoy the mystery of divine love.

Even if you feel nothing, be assured that you are a privileged guest in God's home. Learn to live by faith, not feelings. Rejoice and be glad.

God awaits people willing to bring Christ into the world, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy (CNS) — Respecting human freedom, God waits for Christians, especially priests, to say "yes" to his desire to bring Christ to the world, Pope Benedict XVI said.

During his weekly general audience Aug. 12, the pope continued his new series of talks about the Year for Priests and connected the topic to the feast of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary Aug. 15. Some 4,000 people gathered in the courtyard of the papal summer residence in Castel Gandolfo and in the square outside the villa to participate in the audience.

Pope Benedict said there is a special connection between priests and Mary that comes from the mystery of the Incarnation.

Pope Benedict also said that before dying Jesus saw his mother and his "beloved disciple" at the foot of the cross.

Mary's special relationship with priests is based on the fact that they are similar to Jesus in giving their lives for the salvation of others and because, like Mary, "they are committed to the mission of proclaiming, witnessing to and giving Christ to the world," Pope Benedict said. Entrusting his mother to his disciples, Jesus gave all of them — but especially priests — the person who was most precious to him, the pope said.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

I offer a warm welcome to the English-speaking visitors present at today's audience, including the Sisters of St. Anne, the altar servers from Malta and the pilgrims from Australia and the United States of America.

As the feast of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin draws near in this year of the priest, my catechesis today is centered on Mary the mother of priests. She looks upon them with special affection as her sons.

Indeed, their mission is similar to hers; priests are called to bring forth Christ's saving love into the world.

On the cross, Jesus invites all believers, especially his closest disciples, to love and venerate Mary as their mother. Let us pray that all priests will make a special place for the Blessed Virgin in their lives, and seek her assistance daily as they bear witness to the Gospel of Jesus.

Upon you and your families I invoke God's blessings of joy and peace.

Looking to a higher law

Focus should be to convince society to recognize laws in heart, not on books

The International Theological Commission, a prestigious Vatican group, released a document earlier this month on the natural law and ethical values common to all people.

The commission members are appointed by the pope and serve in an advisory role to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

"In Search of a Universal Ethics: A New Look at Natural Law" received slight attention in this country, perhaps due to the fact the Vatican has so far published it only in French and Italian.

Cindy Wooden of the Catholic News Service Rome bureau wrote an extensive article reporting that the commission said ethical concerns are increasingly important in a global world, with terrorism, the environment and biotechnology being international concerns with international repercussions.

Traditional church teaching is that the natural law is impressed on the consciences of all by God and can be discovered by the use of human reason.

Both emphasis on personal freedom and perceiving ethics to be cultural or religiously specific has worked against the belief that the natural law is natural and accessible to all, the commission said.

The document touched on one point that resonates particularly at this time in the United States.

The commission said that relying on legislated laws, rather than the natural law, "opens the way to the arbitrariness of power, the dictatorship of the numerical majority and to ideological manipulation to the detriment of the common good."

That which the majority can vote in it can vote out.

Consider this: What are we seeking in terms of abortion in this country?

If the goal is to have abortions not happen, then is civil law the best tactic?

If the Supreme Court should totally overturn Roe v. Wade and similar decisions, states once again would be able to legislate the legality of abortion. Some states would ban it, others would not. Legislation would be challenged in the courts interminably.

Chances are slim that Congress will ban abortion, even if so permitted by the courts.

But instead, what if Congress passed a formal statement strongly approving the right to life as a policy of the United States and stating equally strong disapproval of abortion, euthanasia and other attacks on life?

It would be a strongly worded statement, one that would not deal with illegality or penalty.

The commission said the case for universal moral values has been weakened by the view that the natural law is do's and don'ts rather than principles for the protection of human dignity and promotion of the common good.

Natural law is not a Catholic thing, although the church has been among its strongest proponents through the centuries.

Given a statement of national policy, then should we not direct our efforts to advocacy and defense of the natural law and all that it means?

The goal would be to make it so obvious that violations of the right to life wouldn't be attempted.

The ultimate goal is not to pass a law. We already have a law — the natural law. The dignity and protection it provides is far above that which can be affected by legislation.

The focus should be to model proper behavior and convince society at the higher level of principle to recognize laws in the heart, not on the books.

CHARLOTTE — African-American Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte gathered recently for a four-day celebration of culture and Catholicism.

The Revival of the Spirit, sponsored by the diocesan African American Affairs Ministry, took place at four parishes throughout the diocese Aug. 13-16 and featured a dynamic speaker who challenged participants to reinvigorate their faith.

Revivals, similar to parish missions, have become customary within the African-HUNTERSVILLE — In 1997, 250 families gathered to celebrate the first Mass of St. Mark Church at a bowling alley in Huntersville. Twelve years later the church has grown to 4,050 families.

From the beginning it was clear that a large church would be needed to accommodate the growing number of Catholics in north Mecklenburg County.

On Aug. 23, Bishop Peter J. Jugis celebrated the long-awaited dedication of the new church building — a 26,000-square-foot church with seating

REMEMBERING A LEADER

Cardinal Roger M. Mahony and U.S. Sen. Ted Kennedy address a Capitol Hill press conference on immigration in Washington March 6, 2007. Kennedy, who died at his Cape Cod, Mass., home late Aug. 25, was a major figure in the Democratic Party and took the helm of one of America's most famed Catholic political families after two older brothers were assassinated. He was 77.

Ted Kennedy, longtime senator, patriarch of famous family, dies at 77

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, who died late Aug. 25 at the age of 77, stood firmly on the side of the Catholic Church on a wide range of issues from immigration reform to the minimum wage during his 47 years as a U.S. senator from Massachusetts.

But the youngest son of one of the nation's most famous Catholic families ran into criticism from leaders of the U.S. Catholic Church for his stand on abortion. He opposed the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act, supported Roe v. Wade and was a chief sponsor of legislation to limit protests outside abortion clinics and to permit the use of federal funds for research projects using fetal tissue.

Kennedy had served in the U.S. Senate since he was first elected in 1962 to fill his brother John's unexpired term after he became president.

As the second-most senior member of the U.S. Senate, Kennedy joined with Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., in a bipartisan effort for immigration reform, which the Catholic Church backed but which was ultimately unsuccessful.

In earlier years, he championed a national health insurance plan that church leaders supported, except for its inclusion of abortion as a covered health service.

Kennedy also served as a co-sponsor and/or co-author of the Americans with Disabilities Act, the Family and Medical Leave Act, the State Children's Health Insurance Program, and legislation raising the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 per hour.

In the 111th Congress he was chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee and ranking member of several committees and subcommittees.

He was a vocal opponent of both the Vietnam War and the war in Iraq and a strong supporter of the civil rights movement, increased federal funding of public schools and early education programs such as Head Start, universal health coverage, the rights of workers to organize and to earn a living wage, and immigration reform that would lead toward citizenship.

On most of those issues Kennedy's stance was on the same side as Catholic leaders, but on abortion they diverged sharply. He did not begin his Senate career as an abortion supporter, however, according to a 1971 letter that surfaced many years later.

"While the deep concern of a woman bearing an unwanted child merits consideration and sympathy, it is my personal feeling that the legalization of abortion on demand is not in accordance with the value which our civilization places on human life," Kennedy wrote a year and a half before Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court decision that lifted most state restrictions on abortion.

In recent years, however, Kennedy earned a nearly 100 percent negative rating from the National Right to Life Committee and a 100 percent positive rating from NARAL Pro-Choice America for his abortion-related votes in the Senate.

USCCB launches missal translation Web site

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A new Web site launched Aug. 21 by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops was produced to educate Catholics about the forthcoming English translation of the new Roman Missal, the book of prayers used for Mass.

The site, www.usccb.org/romanmissal, has background material on the process of development of liturgical texts, sample texts from the missal, a glossary of terms and answers to frequently asked questions.

Content will be added regularly over the next several months, according to an Aug. 21 news release from the USCCB.

The bishops' Committee on Divine Worship hopes the site will be a central resource for those preparing to implement the new text, the release said.

In the years since the Second Vatican Council, "we have learned a lot about the use of the vernacular in the liturgy and the new texts reflect this new understanding," said the committee's chairman, Bishop Arthur J. Serratelli of Paterson, N.J., in a video that welcomes visitors to the site.

"The new texts are understandable, dignified and accurate," he said. "They not only strive to make the meaning of the text accessible for the listener, but they also strive to unearth the biblical and theological richness of the Latin text."

After more than five years of consultation, study and reflection, the U.S. bishops are expected to conclude their review and approval of the final portion of the translated texts at the end of this year. Final approval, or "recognitio," of the text from the Vatican Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments will be the last step before the publication of the texts for use in the liturgy.

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican, bishops urge respect, help for migrants

There is human right to be helped, rescued, says archbishop

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Prompted by a sea tragedy involving the apparent deaths of dozens of Eritreans trying to reach Italy in a rubber raft, the Vatican and the Italian bishops urged authorities to guarantee rescue, medical help and respect to migrants in trouble.

On Aug. 20, Italian maritime border police rescued five Eritreans off the Sicilian island of Lampedusa. The survivors recounted that more than 70 others had died of hunger and thirst during a three-week voyage from Libya, and said that no passing vessels had stopped to save them, although some fishermen had given them some food.

Archbishop Antonio Maria Veglio, president of the Pontifical Council for Migrants and Travelers, said in an interview with Vatican Radio Aug. 23 that such tragedies call for a "strong and farsighted policy of international cooperation."

He said that while governments have the legitimate right to regulate immigration, "there is nevertheless the human right to be rescued and given emergency help."

He said this right is even more necessary in extreme situations, "such as being adrift in the middle of the sea."

Archbishop Veglio referred to the recent encyclical by Pope Benedict XVI, "Charity in Truth," which says that "every migrant is a human person" who "possesses inalienable fundamental rights."

Vatican economist emphasizes Christians' business ethics

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The current global economic crisis shows that capitalism without ethical grounding doesn't work, and Christians should keep this in mind whether they are business people, policymakers or simply consumers, a top Vatican economist said.

Thomas Han Hong-soon of the Vatican Prefecture for Economic Affairs said that "the root of this crisis is a moral deficit" and that when it comes to business, Christians have not always followed the principles of charity and justice found in the Gospel.

"Let's start by honestly recognizing that the spirit of capitalism doesn't agree with that of the Gospel. The heart of Christianity is love for others. The nucleus of capitalism, rather, is competition, which is the opposite of love," Han told the Vatican newspaper L'Osservatore Romano Aug. 22.

A radical overhaul of the capitalistic system is not very realistic, he said, considering that alternatives, such as communism, have not worked out historically. But better rules for governing the free market are needed, he said.

"It's clear that as Christians we can't only pursue the notion of the highest profit at the lowest possible cost," he said.

"What is sometimes lacking is the awareness of a 'social responsibility' of their business. No business is an island," he said.

Those who don't remember that are destined to fail," he said, recalling Pope Benedict XVI's recent encyclical, "Caritas in Veritate" ("Charity in Truth"), that called for justice and equality in the world economy. This is true not only for single businesses, but for a whole system that involves shareholders, banks, workers and consumers, he said.

South Korea's first Catholic president was model Christian

SEOUL, South Korea (CNS) — Former South Korean President Kim Dae-jung will be remembered as a model Christian, Cardinal Nicholas Cheong Jin-suk of Seoul said during his funeral Mass at Myongdong Cathedral.

The Asian church news agency UCA News reported that Cardinal Cheong praised the first Korean Nobel laureate, who won the peace prize in 2000 for his efforts to reach out to communist North Korea.

"He was a political leader who defined an epoch in Korean history and was an elder for all Koreans," Cardinal Cheong said, describing Kim as a champion of human rights, democratization and peace on the Korean peninsula.

Cardinal Cheong urged Koreans to follow Kim's example and heal divisions in society.

Kim — South Korea's first Catholic president, whose baptismal name was Thomas More — died Aug. 18 at the age of 85.

Following Kim's death, Pope Benedict XVI sent a condolence message to President Lee Myung-bak through the Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone.

"Pope Benedict XVI commends the late president's soul to the mercy and love of almighty God and, upon all the Korean people who mourn his passing, he cordially invokes the divine blessing of peace and strength," Cardinal Bertone wrote.

The three priests are residents of Pennybyrn at Maryfield, a full-service retirement community founded 61 years ago by the religious sisters of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God.

For Father Kimbrough, living at Pennybyrn has significance dating back to his youth. He visited High Point in 1947 when he was an Episcopal college student.

It was a predominately Protestant area back then and the sisters had just founded Maryfield.

He was curious when he first saw the sisters in their habits.

"Little did I know what would happen in the future," he said.

"When I came here I thought, 'I'm giving it all up now,'" joked Father Kimbrough about his retirement.

But that certainly wasn't the case. Even in retirement, each of the priests continues to serve an instrumental role within the Catholic community, both at Maryfield and at nearby parishes.

For Father Waters and Father Kimbrough, who live in the assisted living phase of the community, their service includes hearing confessions and celebrating daily Mass at the Maryfield chapel.

"Sometimes they call me out to offer Mass in Spanish at different parishes," said Father Waters, who was one of the first priests in the diocese to minister to Hispanic Catholics.

In terms of retirement, Father Solari is hoping that the fourth time will be a charm. He originally retired in 2000, but has been subsequently pulled out of retirement to serve at parishes in Statesville, Greensboro and Gastonia.

"We had need at the time," he said, "I was happy to be able to do it."

In March 2008, Father Solari moved to Maryfield where he serves as part-time chaplain.

In that role, he celebrates Mass every Wednesday morning, along with a vigil Mass on Saturday evening and a Sunday morning Mass. He performs quarterly anointings of the sick and is on call to respond to emergencies.

Being in a retirement community provides an "opportunity to see a lot of dear people who are hampered by Mother Nature's problems," said Father Solari.

"It's nice to personally interact with them," he said.

His take on retirement: "It doesn't mean you sit around and do nothing. You can be as active as you choose. There is more freedom to enjoy things that you didn't have time for when you were full-time."

He enjoys playing bridge with other residents once a week and painting in an art studio in his apartment.

He also helps out at nearby parishes.

One of the things Father Solari doesn't miss about being a pastor is the paperwork.

"There was always a great deal of administrative pressure," he said. "All of that is no longer on my shoulders."

Without the pressure of pastoral duties, Father Solari has been able to grow deeper in his faith.

"I can celebrate the sacraments with greater joy," said Father Solari.

And as far as being "a priest forever," he said, "That is what we committed to at ordination — that we would continue to serve the Lord."

THE PRIESTS' RETIREMENT & BENEFITS COLLECTION IS A WAY TO SHOW YOUR GRATITUDE FOR THE FAITHFUL SERVICE OF THE 25 RETIRED DIOCESAN PRIESTS

Your contribution also helps provide for the future retirement of 80 diocesan priests who are currently involved in active ministry, as well as 26 priests representing eight different religious orders serving in The Diocese of Charlotte.

Each parish is assessed 3.5 percent of its annual offertory collection to raise the funds needed to support priests' retirement and benefits. In most parishes the assessment amounts to slightly less than two times the regular Sunday offertory.

Of the collection, $618,850 is allocated to the retired diocesan priests' health plan and $827,150 will be directed to pension contributions for the diocesan and religious priests' retirement plan.

Seasons, seniors and spirituality

Days of reflection offer opportunities to deepen faith

BY KATHLEEN HEALY SCHMIEDER
CORRESPONDENT

BREVARD — One's spiritual life changes and continues just like the seasons, said a speaker at an annual Fall Day of Reflection for Seniors.

Catholic Social Services Elder Ministry recently sponsored two Fall Days of Reflection for Seniors at Sacred Heart Church in Brevard Aug. 20 and St. William Church in Murphy Aug. 27.

At both events, speakers shared how the participants could use their places in life as opportunities to deepen their faith.

More days are scheduled in the coming months.

In Brevard, Father Edward Sheridan, pastor of St. Eugene Church in Asheville, spoke on the "Seasons of Our Life."

The spiritual life, he said, parallels the seasons of the year.

"We go through stages, like nature. It is a continuous cycle," said Father Sheridan. "We should not think all seasons are the same. Your relationship with God changes year by year and we need to be open to the changes in our spiritual growth."

After serving 46 years as a diocesan priest in various parishes throughout the state, Father Sheridan retired two years ago. But when the request came for him to return to the active role of parish priest, Father Sheridan accepted the opportunity.

He said he now finds himself at the beginning of another new season in his own life. As with all prior seasons, he said, this one will unfold in as yet unimaginable ways, and with faith he has responded to the call and looks forward to what lies ahead.

"When there is a need and if the community asks — or in my case, when the church asks — we should, if at all possible, respond positively," said Father Sheridan.

"Today presented an opportunity for a serious get-together about what our faith means to us as we go through life," said Patrick Bohan, a parishioner of Sacred Heart Church.

Bohan also appreciated seeing Father Sheridan, who had served at that parish years prior.

"It was nice to have him here again. It's good to have people from neighboring parishes here," said Bohan. "It reminds us of the old hymn, 'All One Body We.'"

Elder Ministry provides leadership and guidance to parishes and their older adults within the Diocese of Charlotte, to enhance their well-being and to promote the development of programs to benefit them.

Annual events such as the Fall Day of Reflection for Seniors and the Spring

Fling provide opportunities for elders to gather from throughout the diocese.

"We are hoping to offer one-day reflections in each of the vicariates in the diocese," said Sandra Breakfield, diocesan Elder Ministry director. "The program allows seniors to come together, share their faith and grow in fellowship."

Revival celebrates, rejuvenates faith of African-American Catholics

American Catholic tradition as an opportunity for spiritual renewal and a time to build up the church community.

"The Revival of the Spirit is a once-a-year event that is intended to revive the spirit in all souls who come and receive the goodness of the Lord," said Sandy Murdock, diocesan ministry director.

The theme of this year's Revival of the Spirit was "Trouble Don't Last Always."

The message from guest revivalist Redemptorist Father Maurice Nutt was simple: "No matter what hardships or dilemmas you are going through, God will see you through."

As Catholics, revivals "draw us to have more commitment to church service, evangelization and to understand the graces that come from the sacraments," said Father Nutt.

"I'm trying to help people deepen their personal relationship with Jesus Christ," he said.

The four-day event consisted of nightly revival sessions on Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings at St. Mary Church in Greensboro, St. Benedict the Moor Church in Winston-Salem and Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte, followed by a concluding Mass Sunday morning at St. Helen Mission in Spencer Mountain.

"It was, indeed, a joyous occasion to bring together so many people from different cultural, sociological, geographical and economical backgrounds — from infants to seniors, males and females," Murdock said.

"The Good News was being delivered by a Bible-fed, spirit-led preacher and the spirit could be felt moving throughout every service," she said.

Revival services included Scripture readings and Gospel music.

During his sermon at Our Lady of Consolation Church Aug. 15, Father Nutt addressed the issue of dealing with hardships.

"You can handle it," he told the audience. "No matter what comes your way, God would never give it to you unless he knows you can handle it."

"He gives you a test in order for you to have a testimony," said Father Nutt, whose dynamic preaching included standing on pews and running down the center aisle of the church.

"We are not called to be lukewarm," he said in an interview. "We are called to be on fire with the Gospel as we try to serve God and serve the church."

Catholics celebrate long-awaited completion of church

for 1,500 people.

It has been a long journey from those days at the bowling alley — one that taught parishioners that a church foundation has little to do with mortar and concrete.

For years they were a roving parish. Masses were celebrated at a nearby Methodist church and then on the campus of Davidson College.

In 2000 they established a permanent home with the completion of the parish family center, a multipurpose building that would serve as the church for the next nine years. It was later named the Msgr. Joseph A. Kerin Family Center in honor of the parish's founding pastor.

Back in those days "Msgr. Kerin used to carry around the entire altar in a green Tupperware container," said Tony LaRocca, an original parishioner. "That's when I learned that we are the church, not the building."

"Just seeing the building gives you chills," said Barb Kearschner, another one of the original "holy rollers" from the bowling alley days. "It far exceeds my expectations."

"Finally having a place to worship, that is just for worship, will affect us greatly," said Msgr. Richard Bellow, pastor.

Msgr. Bellow said he is excited about the new church and sees this as an opportunity for parishioners to focus on growth in other areas.

"My hope is that it will give the people a greater sense of ownership of their faith, a willingness to come here and be strengthened in their faith and share that faith with others," he said. "Now we can start building up the spiritual community and being part of the spiritual growth of this area of Huntersville, Davidson and Cornelius."

Bishop Jugis also touched on the topic of the spiritual church in his homily during the dedication Mass.

"This dedication ceremony also reminds us that we have a mission to bring Christ to the world," said the bishop. "We have a mission which takes us far beyond the confines of this physical building."

Bishop Jugis celebrated the Mass along with concelebrants Benedictine Abbot Placid Solari of Belmont Abbey; Msgr. Kerin; Msgr. Bellow; Father Brandon Jones, parochial vicar; Father Patrick Hoare, pastor of St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte; and other clergy of the diocese.

Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin was in attendance and Father Christopher Roux, rector of St. Patrick Cathedral, served as master of ceremonies.

Deacons of St. Mark Church, Louis Pais, Robert Murphy and Ronald Sherwood, assisted.

The building itself is traditional in form and designed in the shape of a cross. The exterior includes a piazza with fountain, a bell tower and a covered walkway linking the family center to the church.

The piazza is paved with close to 1,000 engraved bricks, which were purchased by parishioners as part of a building fundraiser.

A future building phase may include stained glass in the church windows and equipping the sanctuary with audio-visual equipment, for which the building has been pre-wired.

One of the most noteworthy features is the altar, which came from St. Anthony on Hudson Seminary in Rensselaer, N.Y., where Msgr. Bellow studied as a seminarian.

When he learned that the building which housed the seminary was going to be torn down, Msgr. Bellow asked if it would be possible to acquire some of the sanctuary furnishings.

A pulpit, celebrant chairs, a crucifix and candle holders all came from the seminary.

A small piece of slate was cut from the sanctuary floor at the seminary and will be sealed in the marble of the floor under the altar in the new church serving as a reminder of its origins.

Bishop Jugis anointed the new altar with chrism oil to signify its dedication to the celebration of the sacrifice of Christ.

In his homily, the bishop reminded the congregation that the mission of the parish is evangelization.

"Evangelization begins with the Eucharist, the source and the summit of the Christian life," Bishop Jugis said.

"From this place, we want Christ's message to go out to the whole world, so that all may become children of God and enter the kingdom of heaven."

The bishop closed his homily with a challenge for the congregation: "Please make me the promise that in the future, at every Mass on every Sunday, there will be overflowing crowds to fill this church."

Masterful history explores key time in development of religious life

REVIEWED BY RACHELLE LINNER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Silvia Evangelisti, a lecturer in history at the University of East Anglia in Norwich, England, is a specialist in women's religious life of the early modern period, and in this masterful study she identifies and explains the impact of secular and ecclesiastical history on female monastic communities.

Her concise analysis of these broad issues is coupled with precise details that afford a glimpse into the richness of convent life.

"Nuns: A History of Convent Life" is a tapestry that succeeds in combining serious scholarship with a writing style that is accessible to the lay reader.

"Enclosure" was the most important defining factor of convent life in the period Evangelisti explores, 1450-1700, and appropriately it is the cohesive theme of this study.

Cloister was an early feature of monastic communities and especially stressed for women, who were "radically exhorted never to leave their convent and to practice full, unbroken enclosure."

These practices "relied on a long-standing Christian tradition that associated female chastity with the protection of a closed environment, whether this was a domestic one or a monastic one."

Enclosure "assumed a new relevance" at the Council of Trent in 1563, Evangelisti writes. Legislation extended enclosure "to all female religious, including tertiaries, who often lived uncloistered and performed care work in the service of the civic community, assisting the poor and the dying."

Evangelisti offers fascinating evidence of how some communities resisted the Tridentine reforms and details how enclosure altered both the physical space of convents and also the nuns' relationship with society.

"Enclosure challenged the economic status of convents, representing a real practical problem for nuns' lives. The loss of direct contact with society led to a dramatic fall in all activities, economic as well as religious."

If enclosure is the central theme of this book, the paradox of religious life is its subtext.

"Silence was required by monastic regulation as it fostered contemplation and full dedication to God. It was therefore the natural condition for religious women whose main task was to pray and interact with God on behalf of all human beings."

"Precisely in these silent and cloistered environments, however, nuns found the means to write."

They also developed and performed elaborate theatrical and musical productions, another means to "create palpable and impalpable links with the outside world. For the nuns these celebrations were a way of enhancing their symbolic presence in society."

The period that Evangelisti writes about also saw the emergence of the founding nun.

"There are numerous examples of very determined nuns leaving their convents and moving to other cities, and even other countries, in order to found new communities."

Nuns were "closely intertwined with the main political and religious developments of their time" and "convents were amongst the first institutions to be transplanted to the colonies."

The book's concluding chapter focuses on the active apostolate.

Although the church promoted the contemplative life, "from the late Middle Ages onward women practiced a range of different forms of religious life, including the more flexible option of joining a community but taking simple vows only."

This "socially oriented form of commitment" fostered "an active spirituality in direct contact with the world, rather than pure contemplation. They served God by praying as well as performing charitable service for the benefit of the most vulnerable members of society."

The identity of these communities was challenged by the Tridentine emphasis on enclosure, and Evangelisti narrates the histories of Angela de Merici (1470-1540), who founded the Ursulines, and Mary Ward (1585-1645), whose English Ladies failed to attain approval for an Ignatian mode of life that would allow women "to participate in active spiritual renewal and fight for the Catholic faith."

Evangelisti writes with authority and insight into the 250-year struggle to negotiate the complex tension between enclosure and worldly involvement, silence and speech, class and wealth, contemplation and action.

"Nuns" is a fascinating history of a period that gave us the style of religious life we know today, a history that models how women can learn to live with paradox and change as they give form to their desire to worship and serve.

Christ calls us to put faith into action

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I heard a story once about an obviously homeless man sitting on the steps of a church on a Sunday morning. He was wrapped in a dirty blanket, wore a hat and scarf and was hunched in a corner shielding himself from the cold.

As parishioners came up the steps they looked at him and hurried into the church. Inside there was some murmuring about the situation on the steps, but no one took any action.

As the service was about to begin the back doors of the church opened, and the man who had been sitting on the steps now slowly made his way down the center aisle. He sat in the first pew and readied himself for the service. The murmuring grew but still no one did a thing.

When it was time for the homily the priest said there was a visiting missionary who was going to give the message. At that point the man from the steps rose from his place in the first row and took his place at the ambo.

He began to preach on James 2:1-5:

"My brothers and sisters, show no partiality as you adhere to the faith in our glorious Lord Jesus Christ. For if a man with gold rings and fine clothes comes into your assembly, and a poor person in shabby clothes also comes in, and you pay attention to the one wearing the fine clothes and say, 'Sit here, please,' while you say to the poor one, 'Stand there,' or 'Sit at my feet,' have you not made distinctions among yourselves and become judges with evil designs?"

This Sunday's readings challenge us to look past ourselves and to put on the mind of Christ who is bigger than all obstacles. It is one thing to have a strong faith, but it is another thing altogether to put that faith into action. Jesus did not just say powerful words, he did powerful things.

We are called to walk in his footsteps.

Questions:

How have you seen people being the hands and feet of Christ in the world? What are some of the things that hold people back from putting their faith into action?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Did not God choose those who are poor in the world to be rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom?" (James 2:5)

Maryknoll radio program wins sixth Gracie award

By honoring radio segment, organization shines light on important issues

MARYKNOLL, N.Y. (CNS) — The Maryknoll Fathers and Brothers' weekly radio program, "Voices of Our World," recently won the 2009 national Gracie Award in the category for outstanding public affairs program.

A segment on domestic violence, "Till Fear Do Us Part," received the program's sixth Gracie Award in eight years.

The Gracies are the highest recognition presented by the American Women in Radio and Television, a national nonprofit organization whose mission is to advance the impact of women in the media.

"Till Fear Do Us Part" features two women from New York state, Joanne Rodda and Elizabeth Grant, both victims of domestic violence who reached out for help.

According to "Voices" producer Kathy Golden, Rodda and Grant's courage and determination ultimately led them to form their own empowerment group, Women Achieving More, to inspire women in similar circumstances.

Golden accepted the award along with other 2009 national winners at the Gracies Gala June 3 at the New York Marriot Marquis Hotel, with both Rodda and Grant in attendance. Golden said the award was important because it recognized the work of the radio program itself but also the efforts of the Maryknoll Fathers and Brothers to speak up for the underrepresented.

"By honoring the segment we ran on domestic violence, AWRT is shining a light on that issue as well," Golden said.

According to the Maryknoll Fathers and Brothers, nearly 5.3 million incidents of domestic violence occur each year in the United States, resulting in 2 million reported injuries and at least 1,300 deaths annually.

St. Paul updated as graphic novel: Hit or miss?

Artwork, writing, theme hamper effort

REVIEWED BY SHARON BOEHLEFELD AND CHRIS BOEHLEFELD JR.
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Sure, Steve Ross retells and updates the horrors faced by the early Christians in his graphic novel "Blinded," but it's hard to see the light that Paul of Tarsus saw that day on the road to Damascus.

In a style that seems to imitate Frank Miller's "Sin City," the novel is drawn completely in black and white.

But the art, while in some ways reminiscent of the underground comics of the 1960s and '70s, emphasizes blood and guts and exaggerates anatomy in ways that, if a movie, would probably earn it at least an A-III classification (for adults) from the U.S. bishops' film office.

For the most part, the graphics are run-of-the-mill — technically proficient, but not groundbreaking.

Because of the genre, it would seem Ross is aiming at a largely male audience, but it's hard to tell whether he sees his book in the hands of younger or older readers of graphic novels.

There is frequent sexual innuendo, and one blatant incident that wouldn't make it to a "general audience" movie. And there's the recurring theme of circumcision.

Paul does write in his letters that the gentiles who want to follow Christ aren't bound by the same laws as their Jewish brethren, so the example is salient, but a little over the top in advancing the story line.

As for the dialogue, it seems a little contrived. It has neither the poetry of good biblical translations, nor the currency of daily conversation.

There are a few lighter moments, but no real, laugh-out-loud comic relief.

Granted, the times were hard for Paul and the "flesh eaters" who ate the body and drank the blood of Christ. But the "K.O.H.," kingdom of heaven — at least as Ross describes it — doesn't seem reason enough to martyr oneself for the truth.

Yes, there are moments — prison time, shipwreck, mass martyrdoms — that come across as action-movie high points.

And perhaps the most compelling scene finds Paul, alone in prison, cutting the back of his own wrist so he can get blood to write letters to the faithful.

But, in the end, the message of hope and love feels faint, even trivial.

The original might actually make a better summer read than the graphic novel.

"Blinded" could make for an interesting couple of hours, but you could give it a pass and never miss it.

Sharon Boehlefeld, a staff member at The Observer, the newspaper of the Diocese of Rockford, Ill., is a DC comics reader from back in the day. Chris Boehlefeld Jr. is a fan of today's graphic novels from DC, Marvel and Vertigo publishers.

Learning the power of making a stand

The students of today will be the leaders of tomorrow

One of the lessons taught in every social studies or government class in high schools across the United States is the importance of civic responsibility.

The voice of the people is essential to ensure those elected to public office understand the views of those whom they represent.

Teens who want to actively engage in the democratic process and let their voices be heard often take the lessons learned in the classroom and immediately apply them to the real world.

That's just what dozens of teenagers are doing in eastern Kentucky. The teens belong to the Pike County Youth Leadership Council.

They're on a mission — they want the towns in their community to ban smoking at restaurants — and they're demanding that their voices be heard.

Depending on where you live, that may not seem like a big deal. In the Northeast and other parts of the country, smoking sections in restaurants have been outlawed for years.

In Kentucky, however, things are a bit different. Kentucky has more tobacco farms than any other state. These kids aren't just standing up for better health; they're standing up against the industry that likely provides jobs to their families and many people they know.

The leadership council's message is simple: A smoking ban will improve the health of the community and protect children who don't have a say in where they eat.

Taking such a stand is courageous, but you might be surprised to learn it has also been successful.

So far the teens have visited three communities in their area. One enacted a smoking ban soon after the teens appeared before the town council.

And in follow-up, the teen organization's president shared with the town's leaders new information indicating that since that town initiated its smoking ban many of its restaurants have shown increases in business.

Coming of Age

ERICK ROMMELL
CNS COLUMNIST

The second community hasn't taken any action yet. And the teens just met with the third community earlier in August.

When the teens visited this community, they didn't just bring statistics. They also offered petitions with the signatures of thousands of registered voters who also support a smoking ban.

The town's leaders were impressed by the teens' presentation, but government being government, no decision is forthcoming. The council wants to investigate the issue further and hear from businesses that will be affected by any changes.

Whether these teens are ultimately successful with all of their quests is irrelevant to the bigger picture. They've learned that people with a common cause can be heard, a lesson that's often lost in our world of Facebook and Twitter, where many people talk as individuals and not as a group.

Years from now, the current members of the Pike County Youth Leadership Council will graduate and move on to different activities. But they won't forget. They've given their voice and initiated change. It may not be too long before some of those teens are on the town councils they once appeared before.

Maybe their sights will be set even higher.

Wouldn't it be something if these students who are learning about government today became those who lead government tomorrow?

If that happens, we'll be in very good hands indeed.

Nobody's perfect

Remembering Sen. Ted Kennedy

Walter Sheridan, who died in 1995, was one of my closest friends.

For many years he worked at the side of Robert F. Kennedy as an investigator on the Senate labor rackets committee and as a special assistant to the attorney general as head of what some called the "Get Hoffa" squad in the Justice Department.

After Bob Kennedy's death, Walter became a special assistant to Sen. Edward M. Kennedy.

News of Ted Kennedy's death brought me back in memory to a conversation I had with him in the mid-1970s in a corridor of the Russell Senate Office Building.

The senator and I had met previously on a number of occasions, and as we approached each other in the hallway, he stopped and asked: "Don't I know you? Aren't you a friend of Walter Sheridan's?"

After I responded, the senator smiled, spread the forefinger and middle finger on his right hand in slingshot fashion, and said, "Whenever I look at Walter, and I see him every day, I can't help but think of Bobby. And whenever Walter looks in here," his two fingers pointing directly into his eyes, "he's trying to find Bobby, but he's just not here."

Sen. Kennedy disappointed his staff assistant on occasion by not voting the way Walter advised on some issues where the two saw the integrity principle that was at stake from different perspectives.

But they respected one another and worked well together.

Ted Kennedy will be remembered as a legislative strategist without peer and a truly great United States senator.

But he never claimed to be perfect in his public or private life. Both his critics and admirers will have lots to talk about for years to come.

Upon hearing the news of the senator's death, a priest I know asked whether or not he would be buried in the church.

Of course he will, I said; he was a Catholic in good standing.

True, he was divorced and remarried. But there was an annulment and he had the benefit of the sacraments.

Some will ask whether he was able to obtain the annulment because he was a Kennedy. This excerpt from Adam Clymer's 1999 biography may or may not help clarify things:

"Ted was able to take Communion (at his mother's funeral) because the

Looking Around

JESUIT FATHER WILLIAM J. BYRON
CNS COLUMNIST

Catholic Church had granted him an annulment a couple of months before. He and his office never discussed it, but Joan (his first wife) said years later she had not opposed it, and that the ground Ted had cited was that his marriage vow to be faithful had not been honestly made."

In the eyes of the church there is no marriage if the persons entering into it are not free to marry (such as, already bound to another in marriage), do not enter freely into the marriage (there must be no coercion), do not intend to be faithful to the other, do not intend the marriage to be permanent, and do not have the physical or psychological capacity to make the marriage work.

The annulment process looks at all of these elements, and if there is proof of fraud or misrepresentation on any count, there is, the church declares, no marriage.

I was told by a mutual friend, but have no other proof, that upon learning of his terminal cancer, Ted Kennedy had a meeting with Joan, his first wife, for purposes of apology and personal forgiveness.

I have no way of verifying that, nor am I inclined to want to check it out.

Judgment is God's work, not mine.

Ted was too ill to attend his sister Eunice's funeral a few weeks ago. I suspect they are together now with their other siblings, surrounding a mother who died at age 104 and who will be remembered as one who said:

"The most important element in human life is faith. If God were to take away all his blessings, health, physical fitness, wealth, intelligence and leave me with but one gift, I would ask for faith, for with faith in him and his goodness, mercy and love for me, and belief in everlasting life, I believe I could suffer the loss of my other gifts and be happy."

As Ted remarked in eulogizing his mother at her funeral, "She was ambitious not only for our success, but for our souls."

Catholics must take on health care reform

We are in the midst of a volatile situation surrounding health care reform in the United States. There are numerous accusations, misstatements, half-truths and distortions of facts.

Often these statements come from people who are uninformed or threatened by any type of reform discussion.

It is important for our Catholic leadership to speak loud and clear at this time, both on the national and local levels (including pastors in our parishes).

Today 46 million of God's children are left out with no health insurance coverage, and 14,000 more are losing their coverage every day. Our leadership must help us find a common ground to discuss and solve this moral issue.

And this is a moral issue, not simply a political one.

Letter to the Editor

As people of faith we must not stand by and simply let the vociferous control the process. Sensible reform is possible if enough of us demand it.

The constant gardener

TLC is the best ingredient for growth, change

While editing a recent issue of The Catholic News & Herald, I came across a quote by Capuchin Franciscan Father Nick Mormando, pastor of Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville, in regard to his goals for his parish.

"My vision may not be God's. You have to be willing to let go of your own to find the strength and grace to implement what God wants."

I read those words as I was discerning my own vision — not for this newspaper, but for my future.

Hoping to clear my head, I decided to take a walk through the neighborhood outside the diocesan Pastoral Center. It was a blisteringly hot day, so I moved along at a leisurely pace, more consumed with the thoughts rattling about in my head than where my feet were taking me.

As I turned a corner, I happened upon a man toiling in a small yard outside a modest house. He wore a wide, floppy hat and was humming a delightful tune while using a hose to water the most peculiar of lawns.

The grass was lush in some areas but speckled with weeds in others. Vines snaked their way through the blades. Patches of dirt pockmarked the interior, and the oddest assortment of flowers and shrubs in all colors, shapes and sizes lined the perimeter.

As I strolled by, the man called my name. I turned to see God beaming at me from underneath the hat.

He drew a cloth from his work shirt and wiped his sweaty brow. "My, it's hot as Hades out here," he huffed.

"I wouldn't know," I replied with a smile.

His laugh was hearty. "And let's keep it that way!" He then reached into a nearby cooler, withdrew two soft drink cans and offered me one. "Fresca?"

I eagerly accepted and took a gulp. Soon we were sitting idly in the shade on God's front porch, watching the sun bake. A man walked by with his dog. God waved, but the man barely afforded him an upward glance.

God shrugged. "Ah, well. Maybe tomorrow."

We sat a while longer, and God keenly noticed how my eyes kept drifting to his yard.

"It's something, isn't it?" asked God, admiring his work.

"That's one way to put it," I hedged. "It's ... well, it's not what I expected."

"How so?"

"It's your yard, God," I answered. "I expected it to be ... well, perfect."

He simply smiled. "It's perfect to me."

So I began to point out all the imperfections. When I started listing the various methods and chemicals he could use to "fix" and "better" the yard, God finally held up his hands.

"I think the issue is that you and I have a difference of opinion about what a yard should look like," he said.

"But, don't you want it to look like all the other yards?"

"Goodness no. You can't be too hands-on when it comes to such things. Sometimes you just have to let the grass grow as it's meant to grow. That's what makes it unique. Where would the fun be if it all grew the same way? It's the variety that makes it interesting. It's the trouble spots that make it challenging, and its overcoming them that makes the growth all the more worthwhile in the end. Only then can it truly blossom."

"But, sometimes you do have to help it along," I insisted. "Otherwise, the weeds will take over."

"Of course you help it along," God agreed. "You provide food and nutrients as needed. You tend and protect as needed. But forcing the weeds, for example, to be something they're not, or not ready to become?" He shook his head. "No, heavy hands only crush the beauty. I prefer a different, more delicate approach. It's the one constant that has never failed me."

"What is it?" I asked.

Murray's Musings

KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

"Love," he stated. "A true gardener loves his creations, and to help them grow good and strong all you really need to use is some tender loving care."

"Love," I said dryly.

"It's the most powerful thing in the world," God affirmed. "And too often, the least used."

As I rolled that around in my brain, God took an easy sip of his Fresca.

"It's not really my lawn that's troubling you, is it?" he asked.

"No," I admitted. "An opportunity has presented itself and I'm considering pursuing it, but it will take me away from my job at the diocese."

God smiled and beckoned to his neighbor's yard. "Grass always seems greener on the other side of the fence."

"But what should I do?" I asked. "What if the grass isn't greener over there?"

He took another sip of his drink. "Sometimes it is. Sometimes it's not. All you can do is have faith, do your best to spread the love and help it grow. And in turn, you grow."

"And blossom?" I asked.

He grinned and patted me on the head.

"But if I go, will it be what you want me to do?" I asked.

He inclined his head toward his most peculiar of yards. "My son, have you not heard a thing I've said?"

I smiled. "Yes, God. I think I have. And, thank you."

"For the Fresca?" he asked. "Anytime."

As I reached the sidewalk, God was back in his yard, a watering can in his hand, a delightful tune emanating from his lips. I looked up and down the street, at the path I had taken and the way I had yet to go.

And with a clear mind and God's voice in my ears, I picked a direction, turned and started to walk.

Pope says global leaders must take care of environment, remember poor

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI urged world leaders Aug. 26 to address global environmental issues "with generous courage" and reminded them that the world's resources are to be shared by all, including poorer countries.

Here is an excerpt of the pope's audience remarks in English.

The church considers that matters concerning the environment and its protection are intimately linked with integral human development.

In my recent encyclical, "Caritas in Veritate," I referred to such questions recalling the pressing moral need for renewed solidarity not only between countries but also between individuals, since the natural environment is given by God to everyone, and so our use of it entails a personal responsibility towards humanity as a whole, particularly towards the poor and towards future generations.

How important it is then, that the international community and individual governments send the right signals to their citizens and succeed in countering harmful ways of treating the environment!

The economic and social costs of using up shared resources must be recognized with transparency and borne by those who incur them, and not by other peoples or future generations. The protection of the environment, and the safeguarding of resources and of the climate, oblige all leaders to act jointly, respecting the law and promoting solidarity with the weakest regions of the world.

Together we can build an integral human development beneficial for all peoples, present and future, a development inspired by the values of charity in truth.

For this to happen it is essential that the current model of global development be transformed through a greater, and shared, acceptance of responsibility for creation: this is demanded not only by environmental factors, but also by the scandal of hunger and human misery.

With these sentiments I wish to encourage all the participants in the United Nations summit to enter into their discussions constructively and with generous courage.

Indeed, we are all called to exercise responsible stewardship of creation, to use resources in such a way that every individual and community can live with dignity, and to develop that covenant between human beings and the environment, which should mirror the creative love of God!"

Make room for trust

A 40-year-old diabetic named Paul lost his job and went into a funk. He had serious health issues, and without a job he was running out of cash. He tried prayer but felt God was not listening.

By accident, he came across a quote from Pope John Paul II: "Christianity is about salvation that comes from a loving God." That thought touched him deeply.

The idea that we are all being prepared for eternal life according to God's plan made him ponder the deeper mystery of life. He felt called to trust God more but didn't know how to go about it. He needed a path out of the fear and self-pity that were tearing him apart.

He accepted in blind faith that the Lord's love was guiding his life. He didn't understand it, but he began to see that the beautiful saving plan of God sometimes leads us down paths we would not have chosen for ourselves.

Faith enables us to see the miracle of God's love present at every stage of life, and joy is the simplest response to God's love and beauty. For this reason Paul took to heart these words of St. Paul, the saint he was named after but hardly ever thought about: "Rejoice always. ... In all circumstances give thanks" to the Lord.

Paul decided to trust God more. He began to focus on the beauty of creation all around him, and he suspended fear about the future. It wasn't easy, but trusting that God would help him find his way made a big difference in his emotional life. He persevered in his good intentions and developed a good frame of mind, which in turn helped him to find a new job. It paid less, but he was happy.

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST

Attaining spiritual joy may seem impossible, but "what is impossible for human beings is possible for God." Here was a man who thought he was at the end of his rope. But when his attitude changed his life improved immensely.

An amazing grace was given to him, a grace to trust God more and his fears less. Then all he had to do was expect the best. It is what we call a leap of faith.

Trust the past to God's mercy and the future to his divine providence.

Bishop welcomes renewal for entire diocese

*Invitation outlines blessings of 5th
Eucharistic Congress*

CHARLOTTE — As the date of the Diocese of Charlotte's 5th Eucharistic Congress approaches, Bishop Peter J. Jugis extends an invitation to all area Catholics to attend.

In a letter to Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte, the bishop called on parishioners to pray for the success of the congress.

He described the congress, which is to be held Sept. 25-26 at the Charlotte Convention Center, as an opportunity to experience spiritual renewal, enhance appreciation of the gift of the Eucharist and refresh zeal for the new evangelization.

SALISBURY — A school with a long history has started a new chapter.

Students, teachers, parents and friends gathered for the celebration of Mass and the blessing and dedication of the new Sacred Heart School Sept. 1.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis was the principal celebrant with Father John Putnam, pastor of Sacred Heart Church; and Father James Ebright, priest in residence; concelebrating.

For a school with origins dating back to 1882, the dedication of the new school building represents a commitment to continuing Catholic education.

CATHOLIC CYCLES 20,000 MILES TO FIGHT CANCER

Michael Fahey, a parishioner of St. Elizabeth Ann Seton Church in Hamlin, N.Y., has biked all over the world since 1996, raising money for the American Cancer Society along the way. The 67-year-old has racked up some 20,000 miles.

Bicyclist donates to breast cancer, remembers wife

HOLLEY, N.Y. (CNS) — To residents of China, Russia and a score of smaller countries, it didn't appear that Michael Fahey was riding a bicycle built for two.

Yet it's really the only way he ever travels. The other rider is his wife, Ruth, and her seat is in his soul.

Fahey first took to the road in earnest during Ruth's long bout with breast cancer. Some days he'd bike for prayer and reflection; other times he'd head off to buy Ruth's medications.

After Ruth died in September 1995 at age 48, Fahey's mother-in-law asked what he was going to do next.

"I said, 'I cycled 2,000 miles this summer, so I think I'll bike across the United States,'" Fahey recalled.

He made good on that idea the following year, beginning his cross-country trek in Newport, Ore., and ending it 35 days later at the Chesapeake Bay — traveling an average of nearly 100 miles per day.

That sparked a series of megatours that have taken Fahey all over the world: Ireland and England in 1999; Western Europe in 2002; Eastern Europe in 2004; Eastern Europe and China in 2005; more areas of China in 2006 and again in 2007; nine countries in Africa covering 7,000 miles in 2008; and Australia this past April.

In all, these globe-trotting treks have seen the 67-year-old Catholic rack up some 20,000 miles. He also has raised approximately $10,000 for the American Cancer Society in memory of his wife.

Fahey, a former banker who is now a real estate broker, said all funds he collects go to the cancer society because he finances his own travel expenses.

His home is dotted with mementos as well as photograph albums containing images of everything from the Eiffel Tower to a sign at the entrance of Lost Springs, Wyo. — population four.

Fahey plans his own routes as well as lodging that has included motels, hostels, the homes of kindhearted strangers and campgrounds where he unwraps his tent and sleeping bag that make up much of the 70-pound load he carries.

Fahey observed that people of all ages and nationalities, particularly the Chinese, have extended kindness after learning about his endeavor. He's not versed in any foreign languages, but conveys basic needed information via phrase books.

Many of his conversations have occurred in bike-repair shops where Fahey has landed because of broken spokes and tire problems.

When not off somewhere touring, Fahey enjoys biking to weekday Masses and Communion services at his parish, St. Elizabeth Ann Seton Church in Hamlin.

"I try to stay in shape," he said.

Next up for Fahey is a possible trip next year along U.S. Route 1, beginning in Maine and extending 2,000 miles south to the Florida Keys; or on the Natchez Trace, a 440-mile trek through much of Tennessee and Mississippi.

He also hasn't ruled out a tour of South America, which would be his sixth of seven continents — although he said there are no plans to complete that list by biking in Antarctica.

"I don't like to bicycle when it's cold," he said with a laugh.

Fahey said he might cut back the lengths of his world trips at some point, but for now his motivation remains especially high based on the ongoing threat of cancer on his wife's side of the family. In fact, one of his three daughters, Shari, is in remission from breast cancer.

"I have to keep moving," he stated.

Pope Prays for Priests

Pope says families should create 'spiritual terrain' for vocations

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI said Catholic parents should make sure to create a "fertile spiritual terrain" for priestly vocations as they educate their children in the faith.

The pope, speaking at a Sunday blessing at his summer residence outside Rome Aug. 30, said he hoped for a vocations revival in the Year for Priests, which began in June. The year marks the 150th anniversary of St. John Vianney, the patron saint of parish priests.

"When couples dedicate themselves generously to the education of their children, guiding and orienting them toward the discovery of God's design of love, they prepare that fertile spiritual terrain where vocations to the priesthood and consecrated life arise and mature," the pope said.

He offered a prayer that in the Year for Priests, "Christian families may become small churches in which all the vocations and charisms given by the Holy Spirit will be welcomed and valued."

The pope said the history of Christianity features innumerable examples of saintly parents and families, including Blessed Luigi and Maria Beltrame Quattrocchi, who were beatified in 2001. The couple had four children, including two sons who became priests.

The pope appeared relaxed as he greeted pilgrims in the packed courtyard of his villa in Castel Gandolfo. He returns to his Vatican residence at the end of September.

FROM THE VATICAN

Top Vatican official dismisses talk of rollback on Vatican II

No proposed modifications of liturgical books

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, has dismissed fears that Pope Benedict XVI plans to roll back major ecclesial changes introduced by the Second Vatican Council.

On the contrary, the German pontiff has demonstrated his commitment to the council during his more than four years as pope, Cardinal Bertone told the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, in an interview published Aug. 27.

In the wake of recent reports about plans to reverse liturgical changes made since Vatican II, Cardinal Bertone said reporters and observers should stick to the actual actions undertaken by the pope since his election.

"The other ruminations and whispers about presumed documents of reversal are pure invention, following a standard and stubbornly re-proposed formula," he said.

A week earlier, an Italian newspaper reported that the Vatican's worship congregation had given the pope a document with proposed liturgical modifications, including a curb on the practice of receiving Communion in the hand. A Vatican spokesman later said that, at present, there were "no institutional proposals for a modification of the liturgical books."

Cardinal Bertone pointed to several areas in which he said Pope Benedict had promoted the teaching of Vatican II "with intelligence and depth of thought," including relations with Eastern and Orthodox churches and dialogue with Judaism and Islam.

Vatican approves US catechism revision

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The Vatican Congregation for Clergy has approved a small change in the U.S. Catholic Catechism for Adults clarifying Catholic teaching about God's covenant with the Jewish people.

The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops announced Aug. 27 that the Vatican had granted its "recognition" to a one-sentence revision of the catechism that was approved by the U.S. bishops at their June 2008 meeting.

The revised sentence, in a section that explains relations between the Catholic Church and Jews, reads: "To the Jewish people, whom God first chose to hear his word, 'belong the sonship, the glory, the covenants, the giving of the law, the worship and the promises; to them belong the patriarchs, and of their race, according to the flesh, is the Christ'" (Rom 9: 4-5; cf. CCC, No. 839).

The original sentence read: "Thus the covenant that God made with the Jewish people through Moses remains eternally valid for them."

The statement from the USCCB said: "The clarification reflects the teaching of the church that all previous covenants that God made with the Jewish people are fulfilled in Jesus Christ through the new covenant established through his sacrificial death on the cross.

"Catholics believe that the Jewish people continue to live within the truth of the covenant God made with Abraham, and that God continues to be faithful to them," it said.

According to the USCCB, the Catholic Catechism for Adults is about to go into a second printing. The 664-page adult catechism was adopted by the U.S. bishops in November 2004 and later approved by the Vatican.

New US ambassador to Vatican arrives in Rome

ROME (CNS) — The new U.S. ambassador to the Vatican, Miguel Diaz, arrived in Rome and said he was eager to help expand the "special relationship" between the United States and the Holy See.

Diaz, a 45-year-old Catholic theologian, arrived with his wife and four children at Rome's Fiumicino airport Aug. 27, six days after he was sworn in as ambassador in Washington. He was expected to present his credentials to Pope Benedict XVI at a ceremony later this summer.

"I will be honored to serve President (Barack) Obama and the American people in my new role, and it will be a unique honor to meet his holiness, Pope Benedict XVI," Diaz said in a statement released by the U.S. Embassy to the Holy See.

Diaz, a professor at St. John's University and the College of St. Benedict in Minnesota, is the first Hispanic and the first theologian to represent the United States at the Vatican.

A native of Cuba who came to the United States as a child with his parents, he was the first of his family to attend college. He is a former president of the Academy of Catholic Hispanic Theologians and a board member of the Catholic Theological Society of America. He is fluent in Italian, Spanish and French.

Priest studies sign language to better minister to deaf Catholics

BY JESSIE ABRAMS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The silence of the hallways is only interrupted by intermittent laughter and the occasional sound of moving chairs. A man noiselessly converses with someone on a higher floor, turns away and heads up a spiraling staircase to join his companion.

At Gallaudet University in Washington, an institution specializing in undergraduate liberal arts education for deaf and hard-of-hearing students, the pervasive quiet does not suggest a lack of activity.

During one of Gallaudet's summer sessions, many classrooms were full of hearing and deaf students learning everything from elementary sign language to how to prepare for interpretation exams.

Father Thomas Rozman, pastor of St. Patrick Cathedral Parish in Harrisburg, Pa., was practicing signing with his classmates in one of the rooms, with desks in a circle to maximize visibility. He is in his second consecutive year of summer studies at Gallaudet and is taking American Sign Language II, or ASL, in an effort to help more deaf Catholics feel a part of their faith.

"They feel like they don't have a home in the church because they can't communicate," Father Rozman, who is not deaf, said. "A deaf person who wants to go to confession can write, but it's uncomfortable."

"Evangelization is so important in the church and I think it's troubling when we hear that 96 percent of Catholics who are deaf don't go to church," Father Rozman said. "I think that we as evangelizers need to get the word across and a way of doing that is for someone to learn sign language and help them (deaf Catholics), especially with confession."

Sign language and English are not the same languages just conveyed in different ways, he stressed. Signed Exact English, or SEE, is the equivalent of English without sound, but he said from what he understands the deaf prefer ASL.

For example SEE uses four distinct symbols to represent the question "What are you doing?" In ASL, it's one symbol.

For now, regardless of whether they fully comprehend it, Duncan said, deaf Catholics should attend Mass in hopes they will pick it up little by little.

The priest said he hopes to return to Washington next summer to continue his studies in ASL and wants to attend a couple of conferences. Eventually, he said, he wants to be able to celebrate Mass entirely in ASL.

Upcoming Vatican conference focuses on role of the deaf in the church

Meeting to raise awareness, underline contributions of the deaf

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In response to numerous requests for how the Catholic community could increase its attention toward the deaf, the Vatican has organized an upcoming conference focusing on the role of deaf people in the church.

The Pontifical Council for Health Care Ministry decided to dedicate its annual international conference this year to the condition, needs and experiences of deaf people, including deaf religious and laypeople and their families.

The theme of the Nov. 19-21 Vatican gathering, "Ephphatha: Deaf People in the Life of the Church," recalls the Aramaic word meaning "be opened" that Jesus used to heal a deaf man.

The council said on its Web site that it wished "to respond to the numerous requests that we have received asking for the possibility of organizing a symposium" focusing on how the church could help raise awareness about the various situations faced by the deaf "so as to give them full dignity and respect of their rights."

The council's president, Archbishop Zygmunt Zimowski, presented Pope Benedict XVI with the finalized program of the 24th international meeting during a private audience Aug. 26, reported the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano.

The conference hopes to "offer the church an opportunity to underline the contribution of the deaf in various fields of the apostolate, thus giving them full recognition of the significance of their work," the archbishop told the Vatican newspaper Sept. 1.

The meeting's aim is "to raise awareness and foster concrete and effective action in the church and society toward alleviating the disadvantages the deaf face," he said.

The U.S.- and U.K.-based International Catholic Foundation for the Service of Deaf Persons helped organize the event. Its president, Archbishop Patrick Kelly of Liverpool, England, and executive director, Terry O'Meara, were to participate at the conference.

Other speakers from around the world were to include religious and laypeople who are deaf, those who work with deaf people either in the church or in society, and people who are in charge of pastoral programs dealing with health care issues.

Talks were to look at the medical, psychological and social aspects of deafness as well as pastoral programs that foster the participation of the deaf in church life and the wider community, according to the council's Web site.

worked hard to provide a strong, Catholic foundation for their five sons.

"We have been able to give all of them a good Christian education," said Eugene Rossitch, which in his opinion is "much better for them even after we die than leaving them a lot of money."

Although providing for their family has always been a priority, the Rossitches said the decision to include the Diocese of Charlotte in their long-term financial plan was an easy one.

"How lucky we are in having our health and our faith and our family," said Eugene Rossitch. "It's time that we share our good fortune and blessings with our church and our community."

When the Rossitches immigrated to the U.S. in 1962, they were fleeing the regime of Fidel Castro. They came here for a fresh start.

community and this country, which we have adopted as our own, and we are grateful that we could start our lives over again," said Carmen Rossitch.

After living in Miami for a short time, the Rossitches moved to Winston-Salem, where Carmen Rossitch took a teaching position at Winston-Salem State University.

In Winston-Salem, they found their Catholic home at Our Lady of Mercy Church, where they have been parishioners since 1964. Their sons attended Our Lady of Mercy Elementary School and Bishop McGuinness High School.

For the past four years, Eugene Rossitch has served on the Diocesan Foundation board, a position which has allowed him to see the many good works of the foundation.

When it came time to decide what they wanted their charitable gift to go towards, the Rossitches looked at the various needs within the diocese. After careful consideration, they decided to create an endowment fund designated for seminarian training.

"We think that one of the more immediate needs for the church is vocations and the education of future priests," said Eugene Rossitch.

"We are aware of the shortage of priests in the church and we felt that was a very good way for us to help," he said.

The Rossitches believe that "the future of the church will continue to depend on the people who are willing to answer the call to become priests."

The Rossitch family has grown significantly over the years and the couple now has 16 grandchildren. Knowing that they have equipped their sons with the tools they'll need to provide for their families, the Rossitches feel confident about their decision to leave a charitable gift to the church.

"By leaving a gift from their estate to the foundation the Rossitches are leaving a legacy in perpetuity," said Jim Kelley, director of the diocesan development office and director of the Foundation for the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte.

"More and more people across the diocese are taking that kind of step in living out their lives of stewardship," said Kelley. "I think that is inspirational and exciting."

The foundation is a nonprofit organization established to provide endowments for the diocese and its schools, agencies and organizations.

An endowment is a permanent fund placed in the diocesan foundation that earns income over time. The original amount is not spent, but the income can be used in a manner stipulated in the donor's estate plan or in an endowment agreement.

Once an endowment is established, anyone may add to the fund. A committee of three to five members is set up for each endowment to determine how funds will be distributed.

Three US bishops revisit controversy over Obama honor at Notre Dame

By NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON (CNS) — In two national Catholic publications, two U.S. archbishops and a bishop are revisiting the controversy over the honorary degree conferred on President Barack Obama by the University of Notre Dame.

Retired Archbishop John R. Quinn of San Francisco and Bishop John M. D'Arcy of Fort Wayne-South Bend, Ind., the diocese in which Notre Dame is located, wrote separate articles about the matter for the Aug. 31-Sept. 7 issue of America magazine.

Archbishop Michael J. Sheehan of Santa Fe, N.M., talked about the controversy and how it was handled at a June meeting of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops in an Aug. 12 interview with National Catholic Reporter, published in the newspaper's Aug. 26 edition.

Archbishop Quinn said he felt the U.S. bishops' response to the controversy "communicated several false and unintended messages" to the U.S. public, while Bishop D'Arcy said his refusal to attend the commencement ceremonies at which Obama was honored arose from his responsibility to see that Catholic universities "give public witness to the fullness of Catholic faith."

Archbishop Sheehan, as part of a wide-ranging interview with the independent Catholic weekly, said he believed the majority of U.S. bishops agreed with him that "we don't want to isolate ourselves from the rest of America by our strong views on abortion and the other things. We need to be building bridges, not burning them."

More than 70 bishops voiced their disapproval of Notre Dame's invitation to Obama and its decision to give him an honorary degree, with some saying it violated the letter and spirit of their 2004 statement "Catholics in Political Life."

That document states: "The Catholic community and Catholic institutions should not honor those who act in defiance of our fundamental moral principles. They should not be given awards, honors or platforms which would suggest support for their actions."

Critics of Obama said his support of legal abortion and embryonic stem-cell research also made him an inappropriate choice to be commencement speaker at a Catholic university.

The bishops discussed the controversy in executive session at their June meeting in San Antonio, and passed a resolution expressing "appreciation and support" for Bishop D'Arcy and affirming his "solicitude for (Notre Dame's) Catholic identity and his loving care for all those the Lord has given him to sanctify, to teach and to shepherd."

In his America article, Bishop D'Arcy said the controversy was not about Obama, a replay of the 2008 elections or "whether it is appropriate for the president of the United States to speak at Notre Dame or any great Catholic university on the pressing issues of the day."

The central question, Bishop D'Arcy said, is: "Does a Catholic university have the responsibility to give witness to the Catholic faith and to the consequences of that faith by its actions and decisions — especially by a decision to confer its highest honor?"

Bishop D'Arcy said that, in his 24 years as head of the diocese in which Notre Dame is located, "I have never interfered in the internal governance of Notre Dame or any other institution of higher learning within the diocese."

But he said a bishop "must be concerned that Catholic institutions do not succumb to the secular culture, making decisions that appear to many, including ordinary Catholics, as a surrender to a culture opposed to the truth about life and love."

Archbishop Quinn, however, said there is "deep and troubled disagreement" among the U.S. bishops about how they should speak about abortion, which he called the "most searing and volatile issue in American public life."

Archbishop Quinn urged the U.S. hierarchy to follow the "policy of cordiality" practiced by the Vatican, which "proceeds from the conviction that the integrity of Catholic teaching can never be sacrificed" but "consistently favors engagement over confrontation."

"The Vatican shows great reluctance to publicly personalize disagreements with public officials on elements of church teaching," he said.

The money is then divided among parish ministries.

Homegrown outreach Tennessee parish farmers' market shares bounty, supports ministries

By THERESA LAURENCE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

MURFREESBORO, Tenn. (CNS) — St. Rose of Lima parishioner Larry Wise stood, sweat-soaked by the August sun, drawing in Massgoers like a midway barker, encouraging them to "get your fresh, homegrown vegetables right here."

Franciscan Father James Kallarackan, pastor, stood nearby handing out plastic shopping bags and trying to persuade his parishioners to take a chance with the fiery hot peppers he grew in his own garden.

People stopped and perused the offerings at the St. Rose farmers' market, scooping up handfuls of green beans, marveling at the squat purple and white eggplants, and carefully picking out the ripest red tomatoes.

Wise, a longtime gardener who raised six children on homegrown vegetables, started the farmers' market last year as a way to share the bounty of his and other parishioners' gardens, and to build community at the parish.

The thought was that, "if God's been that good to us, let's give something back," Wise explained.

Wise, a leader in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults program at St. Rose, also thought the farmers' market would be a good way to get new Catholics involved with parish life, "beyond one time a week Catholics," he told the Tennessee Register, newspaper of the Nashville Diocese.

This year, Kurt Potter, who completed the RCIA last spring, is in charge of the market.

Potter, who also is a Knight of Columbus, said the Knights have "helped out a lot" with the market, which serves as a gathering point for all people of the parish. "A lot of good fellowship comes out of it," Wise said of the market.

The concept and logistics for the market are simple, and Wise says they could be replicated at other parishes.

Gardeners bring their produce to St. Rose each Sunday morning and volunteers arrange it on the tables outside the parish's fellowship room. Even if they don't have a vegetable garden, parishioners can donate baked goods or fresh flowers to the market. Parishioners take what they want and leave a donation of any amount in the jar.

The proceeds are donated to the parish to be used for a variety of ministries, including youth ministry, the Haiti Parish Twinning Program and others. Last year, in a four-week period, the market raised about $1,000 for the parish.

The spirit of the market is "if you have something, you contribute," said Father Kallarackan. "If you need it, take it."

Dr. Bob Dray, one of the biggest contributors to the market, farms about one acre on his 50-acre lot.

"I think this parish has a lot of good community outreach," Dray said. "Father knows there are needs outside the church walls" and encourages this creative approach to social justice action.

Episcopal nuns, priest become Catholic is discerning the possibility of becoming a Catholic priest.

In an interview with The Catholic Review, Baltimore archdiocesan newspaper, Mother Christina Christie, superior of the religious community, said the sisters are excited about joining the Catholic Church. The women religious have been studying the church's teachings for years, she said.

Two Episcopal nuns who have decided not to become Catholic will continue to live and minister alongside their soon-to-be Catholic sisters. Members of the community range in age from 59 to 94.

"For us, this is a journey of confirmation," Mother Christina said. "We felt God was leading us in this direction for a long time."

Once the sisters join the church they hope to form the first diocesan institute in the archdiocese.

Diocesan institutes differ from religious communities of pontifical right, such as the Dominicans, whose governance model is under the authority of the Vatican's Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life. Members of a diocesan institute are overseen directly by a diocesan bishop.

Chancellor Diane Barr said the archdiocese is working with the Vatican in developing the diocesan institute. Whether or not the order will retain its name also is being discussed, she said.

Wearing full habits with black veils and white wimples that cover their heads, the sisters have been a visible beacon of hope in Catonsville for decades.

The American branch of a society founded in England, the All Saints' Sisters of the Poor came to Baltimore in 1872. They have been at their current location since 1917.

In addition to devoting their lives to a rigorous daily prayer regimen, the sisters offer religious retreats, visit people in hospice care and maintain a scriptorium where they design inspirational religious cards.

Throughout its time in Baltimore the order has followed its charism, which focuses on hospitality. The order has ministered with Baltimore's poor, children with special needs and AIDS patients. Together with Mount Calvary Church, an Episcopal parish in Baltimore, the sisters co-founded a hospice called the Joseph Richey House in 1987.

Orthodoxy and unity were key reasons the sisters were attracted to the Catholic faith. Many of them were troubled by the Episcopal Church's approval of women's ordination, the ordination of a gay bishop and what they regarded as lax stances on moral issues.

"We kept thinking we could help by being a witness for orthodoxy," said Sister Mary Joan Walker, the community's archivist.

Mother Christina said that effort "was not as helpful as we had hoped it would be."

"People who did not know us looked at us as if we were in agreement with what had been going on (in the Episcopal Church)," she said. "By staying put and not doing anything, we were sending a message which was not correct."

Before deciding to enter the Catholic Church, the sisters had explored Episcopal splinter groups and other Christian denominations. Mother Christina noted that some of the sisters had independently contemplated joining the Catholic Church without the others knowing. When they learned that most of them were considering the same move, they took it as a sign from God and approached Archbishop O'Brien.

"This is very much the work of the Holy Spirit," Mother Christina said.

The sisters acknowledged it has not been easy leaving the Episcopal Church, for which they expressed great affection. Some of their friends have been hurt by their pending departure, they said.

"Some feel we are abandoning the fight to maintain orthodoxy," said Sister Emily Ann Lindsey. "We're not. We're doing it in another realm right now."

The sisters have spent much of the last year studying the documents of the Second Vatican Council. They said there were few theological stumbling blocks to entering the church, although some initially had difficulty with the concept of papal infallibility.

In addition to participating in ordinary Catholic Masses, the sisters are expected to receive permission to attend Mass celebrated in the Anglican-use rite, a liturgy that adapts many of the prayers from the Episcopal tradition. Mother Christina said several archdiocesan clergy members, including Auxiliary Bishop Denis J. Madden, have stepped forward to learn how to celebrate the Anglican-use Mass.

The sisters expressed deep affection for Pope Benedict XVI. The pope exercises an authority that Episcopal leaders do not, they said, adding that the unity Christ called for can be found in the Catholic Church under the leadership of the pope.

"Unity is right in the midst of all this," said Sister Catherine Grace Bowen. "That is the main thrust."

Children from the "Kids Helping Kids" group at St. Gabriel School sold lemonade and cookies around Charlotte during August to raise money for a kindergarten student at Catherine's House Inc., a ministry sponsored by the Sisters of Mercy that provides transitional housing to women and women with children who are homeless. The total sales of $988.39 exceeded their goal. They were able to purchase back-to-school supplies and clothes for the kindergartener and three additional children living at Catherine's House.

been accomplished at Sacred Heart Catholic School," said Bishop Jugis.

"The school families, alumni, parishioners and benefactors have worked together to present this beautiful new school building for the glory of God," the bishop said.

The new school is part of the new Sacred Heart Church campus, which consists of 107 acres of land — half of which is owned by the diocese — located off Jake Alexander Blvd. in Salisbury.

Along with the new school, the property features a cemetery, dedicated Sept. 1, 2007; and a church, which is scheduled to be completed and dedicated before the end of the year.

"I think we are moving forward with the mission of Sacred Heart School," said Dominican Sister Anastacia Pagulayan, principal.

Sacred Heart School is an accredited SACS school with 187 students enrolled in pre-kindergarten through eighth grades.

In keeping with the mission of diocesan Catholic schools, Sacred Heart School strives to proclaim the good news of the Gospel and to develop each student spiritually, intellectually, emotionally and socially, so that each is prepared to live and serve in a changing society as a self-respecting and responsible citizen.

"It is wonderful to see the united effort of parishioners, school families and staff members to provide the beautiful school building for the Sacred Heart students," said Linda Cherry, superintendent of diocesan schools.

"While the new paint, larger classrooms and extra storage are always nice, it is the sharing of Catholic education within those walls that speaks about the true meaning of Sacred Heart," Cherry said.

A firm foundation

Sacred Heart Church has had a school, off and on, since its inception in 1882. The first teachers were young women of the parish, who were aided by the pastor.

In 1910, under the pastorate of Father Leo Kuntz, an organized school was instituted and conducted by the Sisters of Mercy.

The convent-school of early days became a parish school in March 1942.

In 1949, extensive remodeling was done on the school and a new school building was built in 1965, where classes had been held up to the present.

Building a future

The new school facility, including a gymnasium and offices, is 30,133 square feet.

The school office and parish office are now located in the same building.

"I wanted to see a greater recognition of the connection of the church and school," said Father Putnam.

Along with classrooms for pre-kindergarten through eighth grades, the school features a science lab, technology classroom, two breakout classrooms, media center, gymnasium and cafeteria.

"One of the goals that we had in building it was that we wanted it to be state of the art — a 21st century school" said Father Putnam.

All of the classrooms are equipped with the latest media delivery technology.

Perhaps the biggest highlight is the surrounding acreage and most notably, the grass.

"We're just excited that we have more space," said Mike Vaeth, parishioner and chair of the building committee.

"I have two older sons who graduated from the old school," said Vaeth. "They grew up in long pants with holes in the knees from falling on the asphalt."

Another highlight of the school is the gymnasium.

"We didn't have a gym at the old school," said Father Putnam.

In the past, gym time for basketball games was rented from a local YMCA and nearby middle-school.

The new gym has room for 600 people and will be used for parish and school events.

"We're planning to really utilize that gym for big events," said Vaeth, who mentioned that parish events were previously limited due to lack of space.

Along with the gymnasium and plenty of outdoor space, the new school facility will also feature a soccer field.

Young authors hope their books help peers cope

Pocket-size books for faith answers, prayer, reflection

BY TRISTA TURLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON (CNS) — New pocket-size books by two young Catholic authors are aimed at helping their peers put their faith into action and find answers to problems in prayer.

The first book, "The Radical Bible" by Kevin Ahern, is a compilation of scriptural passages, statistics and commentary by Catholic and non-Catholic contemporary thinkers. The selections address poverty, oppression and other major social issues the global community is currently facing.

"Keeping the Faith: Prayers for College Students" by Kerry Weber is a compilation of prayers designed to help college students cope with a variety of challenges ranging from homesickness to difficulties with a roommate.

Ahern, former president of the International Movement of Catholic Students, said he intends his book to be "a tool for personal and group reflection for those seeking to respond to God's radical call for reflection and action in the world." His book is a revision of a 1972 release of the same title.

Ahern told Catholic News Service that he received a copy of the original while working in Rome. He said the book — which like his was published by Orbis — served as a source of inspiration to him while he traveled with the student movement, but he felt that it could be improved to resonate with modern-day readers.

His version is "very, very different from (the original)," Ahern said in a phone interview. "I tried to add other quotes and other dimensions from Scripture that were more spiritual in nature."

Ahern hopes that the use of widely resonating Scripture passages will unite Catholics in spirituality-based reflection and social action.

"One of the big problems in the church today is polarization between those concerned with social justice and those concerned with spirituality," he stated. "I think Scripture provides a common ground."

In selecting which social issues to address in the book, Ahern said he wanted to focus on global affairs rather than interpersonal issues. "I wanted to address the issues that are affecting the entire human family," he said. "I also wanted to avoid getting into issues that would be too political in a sense."

Weber said she wrote "Keeping the Faith: Prayers for College Students," published by Twenty-Third Publications, while she was working as an editor for Catholic Digest magazine. She said the concept of the prayer compilation originated as a group idea.

"We were looking to reach out to different age groups and thought this was a good idea (for college students)," Weber told CNS in a phone interview.

Weber said that she was chosen to write the book because she was only a few years removed from being a college student.

Her co-workers at Catholic Digest aided in the book's development by brainstorming prayer topics relevant to college students, but all the prayers in the book are her own original compositions. She said her writing was influenced by her own college experiences.

"I looked through some of my journals, some old photos and I tried to think about those experiences and what I was going through," Weber stated. "I really tried to draw from those experiences."

"Going through college for me was one of the first times that I was truly making decisions on my own to go to church, or to pray, or to really live my faith," she said.

Weber believes that college is a pivotal period of faith formation for many students. "It's a time when a lot of people are questioning and growing and deciding what they truly believe," she stated.

Weber graduated from Dominican-run Providence College in Rhode Island in 2004. This book is the first of what she hopes will be several published works. "I would love to publish another book for sure," she stated.

Struggle teaches God's grace, gifts of strength

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I had to practically sit on my hands to keep from sending a check. My grown daughter had just been laid off from her job at the same time her apartment lease was up and her roommate moved away. She called "to vent," she said, but she wasn't asking for financial help.

Nevertheless, throughout her brief lament I kept thinking it wouldn't faze my bank account to send a little money, and it would ease her burden considerably. Just a slight boost to buy her a little time would save a lot of stress. She'd pay it back later, and I wanted to think the pain and worry, really, weren't necessary.

Of course, I simply didn't want her to have to suffer — even a little bit — if I could help it.

Luckily a cooler head prevailed: hers. "Don't worry, Mom," she assured me. "It's annoying. But I'll figure it out. I'll be fine."

Sure enough, after months and months of temporary employment, several unsatisfactory living arrangements and a meager pantry, things worked out. In the meantime, she was fine.

She understood that struggle is a necessary part of life, and through it she learned a great deal about the strength and gifts with which God had endowed her. Also, she experienced God's grace through helpful, loving friends and found joy even while enduring difficulty.

She more than survived. She grew — beyond what she could have if I had intervened to "save" her from discomfort.

In this weekend's Gospel, Peter tells Jesus that he knows he is the Christ. He knows he was endowed by God to bring salvation. But in his human heart Peter didn't want his loved one to have to suffer. For a brief moment Peter forgot to believe in God's almighty ability to overcome the suffering and anguish of this world.

Jesus set him straight saying, in effect, "I'll be fine." Then he told his disciples that to follow him, they too must endure necessary hardship with trust that God will save them and give them lives greater than the ones they will surely lose in the process.

John Paul II film festival planned for late October in Miami

Directors hope to make festival annual occurrence, include more forms of art and theater

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The John Paul II International Film Festival is set to take place the last weekend of October in Miami, but co-director Frank Brennan said the organizers still have a lot to do before the event kicks off.

Brennan has been working alongside two other co-directors since March to put together the event. He said they hope to make it an annual occurrence. In the future, he said, he hopes the festival will expand to include other forms of art and theater, but this year he wants to keep it simple.

"For this year for us it's been: Stick to the films, stick to the festival, show the films," Brennan told Catholic News Service in an interview. "Show the art and then at the same time show how faith is applied through the films."

The biggest challenge for the team so far, Brennan said, has been dealing with time constraints. Most festivals, he said, take close to a year and a half to plan but these planners only allotted themselves nine months. Together he, his fiancée, Laura Alvarado, and Rafael Anrrich have been constantly picking each other up and keeping each other focused on their goal, he said.

The festival directors are searching for published or unpublished films that coincide with what they consider to be Pope John Paul II's three most important values: human dignity, the sanctity of life and Christian unity.

The festival is open to people of all faiths and, as long as videos promote one of Pope John Paul's values, filmmakers may submit them to the event.

Brennan said he and Alvarado are both passionate about films and started a company together called 7eventhDay Films. Alvarado took an interest in theater when she was 9 years old. In 2007 she graduated with a degree in fine arts from the New World School of the Arts, a Miami conservatory. Since then, she has produced five independent films. Brennan said he discovered his passion for writing, directing and producing films as a freshman in high school.

Anrrich also found his passion for religious films during his first year of high school after experiencing a "deep personal conversion" while watching "The Ten Commandments." He now works as a therapist to children, adolescents and adults, but has wanted to pursue his idea of a film festival for at least four years, Brennan said.

With time and money short, only a small number of videos at the festival will have been specifically made for the event, Brennan said. The majority of videos that will be included have already been released, but have not gotten as much attention in Hollywood, partially because they lack expensive special effects, he said. These films have good substance but have had a hard time making money in Hollywood, he added.

Before July, the team struggled to find financial support, and even with recent donations Brennan said the festival was still in need of funding and sponsors. To show the festival directors' appreciation, Brennan said he would like to provide a ticket for one student from each of the Catholic schools in the area who exhibits a passion for any type of art.

"Youth is a big target in this," Brennan said.

Learning the ropes

Youth ministry workshop ties in Bishop's introduction

At a full-day youth ministry workshop at St. Francis of Assisi in Franklin on Aug. 22, pastors, parents, youth ministry leaders and coordinators of faith formation discovered the three vital areas of youth ministry.

Sponsored by the Western Regional Office of Faith Formation and conducted by diocesan Office of Youth Ministry director Paul Kotlowski, this workshop illuminated three aspects of Bishop Jugis's Introduction Letter to the Diocesan Youth Ministry Handbook.

In his Letter, the Bishop described as vital three areas in ministry to youth: "The call to and promotion of holiness; the creation of safe and secure environments; and the formation of the ministers as persons commissioned to teach the Truth in Love."

With regard to the call to and promotion of holiness, Kotlowski cited twelve spiritual disciplines essential to youth ministry. Groupings included the inward disciplines of meditation, prayer, fasting, and study, the outward disciplines of simplicity, solitude, submission/obedience, and service and the corporate disciplines of confession, worship, guidance, and celebration.

Kotlowski moved on to address concerns in the creation of safe and secure environments by referring to the policies of the Diocesan Code of Ethics, the Code of Ethics for Youth Ministry Leaders, and Protocols for Ministry to and With Minors.

Finally, to illustrate the formation of the ministers as persons committed to teach the truth in love, Kotlowski led the 18 participants in a reflection process upon "Catechesi Tradendae" (Catechesis in Our Time) by Pope John Paul II.

Diocesan church helps local charities

BY HEATHER BELLEMORE
INTERIM EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — The recent economic downturn and widespread decline in charitable giving didn't stop a local parish from giving big to local charities in need.

Parishioners of St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Charlotte recently collected 500 pairs of socks, 50 sets of sheets, and $5,000 for Urban Ministry Center and the Salvation Army Center of Hope.

"In these tough times when we are serving so many, we are thrilled to receive this gift from St. Thomas Aquinas," said Deranda Metz, social services director for the Salvation Army of Greater Charlotte.

Urban Ministry Program Director Paul Hanneman agreed, stressing "We are very grateful for this gift in a time when our numbers have increased dramatically and the need is greater than ever."

"We wanted to help," responded Mark Nash, deacon at St. Thomas Aquinas church. "So we asked what was most needed and easy to collect."

Hanneman requested "good, clean socks. It's one of the items we need more than anything else." Foot problems can be a health issue for clients, who spend the majority of each day on their feet.

Metz cited clean sheets as an immediate need for the Center of Hope. She also stated that since Center of Hope clients may take sheets with them, additional sets are always needed.

Helping Hands, the social outreach ministry for St. Thomas Aquinas, scheduled a speaker for each Mass the weekend of Aug. 15 and spread the word through bulletins for weeks prior to the collection.

The cart they placed in the vestibule was soon full of fresh white socks and twin-sized sheet sets. A free-will offering collected in a basket outside the church building totaled $5,000, a surprising amount given the recent completion of the church's annual mission appeal and youth fundraiser.

Parishioners did not stop there. They also prepared a meal to feed approximately 350 at the Center of Hope Shelter.

The monetary collection was split equally between Urban Ministry Center and Center of Hope.

Urban Ministry Center will use its $2,500 in its soup kitchen and for services provided to homeless clients. The Center of Hope will use its half to purchase needed shelter supplies, such as hygiene products and diapers.

Urban Ministry Center in downtown Charlotte is an interfaith organization dedicated to serving the poor and homeless with compassion and tangible help, including a soup kitchen and its Room in the Inn program that provides winter night lodging.

The Center of Hope on Statesville Road in Charlotte is a shelter for women and families serving over 300 individuals daily.

An invitation to all

Dear Brothers and Sisters in Christ,

I look forward to welcoming you to our Eucharistic Congress on September 25 and 26 at the Charlotte Convention Center.

The Eucharistic Congress is a time of spiritual renewal for the whole diocese. This is one important blessing we receive as a result of the congress. The congress inspires us and strengthens our faith.

A special enlivening of our faith takes place when we are gathered in such great numbers for this celebration. Even though the Catholic population of our diocese is only about 3 % of the total population, our coming together at the Eucharistic Congress reminds us that the Church is a big family after all, and that we have many brothers and sisters throughout the 46 counties of the diocese who share our faith.

Our faith and our love for the Lord are strengthened when we participate with thousands of our brothers and sisters in the eucharistic procession through the streets of Charlotte. Our faith is also strengthened when we participate with all our brothers and sisters in the eucharistic holy hour of adoration and in the vigil Mass at the close of the congress. Saint Paul reminds us that the Lord's blessings abound as more and more people share in his graces: "Everything indeed is for you, so that the grace bestowed in abundance on more and more people may cause the thanksgiving to overflow for the glory of God" (2 Cor. 4: 15).

Appreciation for the gift of the Eucharist

The Eucharistic Congress gives us the opportunity to reflect on the importance of the Eucharist in our lives. This is another blessing we receive as a result of the congress. The celebration of the Mass is the center of the whole Christian life, as the General Instruction of the Roman Missal (n. 16) reminds us. The Eucharist constantly nourishes our faith and holiness. We constantly draw life from this living Bread, which is Christ himself. By participating in the Eucharistic Congress we grow in our appreciation for the great gift of the Eucharist, which then leads us to a more fervent celebration of the sacrifice of the Mass when we return to our home parishes.

Over the years I have been inspired by adults in our RCIA programs who have told me of their great desire to receive the Body and Blood of Christ once they join the Catholic Church. They already have a great appreciation for the gift of the Holy Eucharist, which draws them to the church. They understand instinctively that the Eucharist is the source and the summit of the Christian life.

Likewise, the Eucharistic Congress serves to increase in all of us an appreciation for our Lord's dwelling among us in this holy sacrament.

Zeal for the new evangelization

Another important blessing we receive from the Eucharistic Congress is increased zeal for the work of the new evangelization. Our late Holy Father, Pope John Paul II, and our present Holy Father, Pope Benedict XVI, have called us to evangelize our secular culture with the message of Christ. It is through our participation in the Eucharistic sacrifice that the Lord constantly enlivens us so that we can faithfully do his work in the midst of our secular society.

Pope Benedict XVI has pointed out that there is a strong connection between the Eucharist and the mission of the Church — that the stronger our Eucharistic faith, the stronger our commitment to Christ's mission. He wrote: "The Sacrament of the Altar is always at the heart of the Church's life: 'thanks to the Eucharist, the Church is reborn ever anew!' The more lively the eucharistic faith of the People of God, the deeper is its sharing in ecclesial life in steadfast commitment to the mission entrusted by Christ to his disciples. The Church's very history bears witness to this. Every great reform has in some way been linked to the rediscovery of belief in the Lord's Eucharistic presence among his people." (Sacramentum caritatis 6).

The Eucharistic presence of Christ — his Real Presence — is the powerhouse of our evangelizing mission as the People of God.

See you at the congress!

There are many blessings we receive from the celebration of the Eucharistic Congress. The prayer card invites us to pray for the success of the congress. We pray that the congress will produce the fruits of spiritual renewal in all of us, a greater appreciation for the central place of the Eucharist in our lives as Catholics, and an increased zeal to do our part in the great mission of the new evangelization. These blessings and many others will be bestowed upon us by the good Lord.

I look forward to seeing you at the congress!

Sincerely yours in Christ,

+ Peter J. Jugis

Prayer for the Success of the Eucharistic Congress

September 25 and 26, 2009

Diocese of Charlotte

O Jesus, who art really, truly and substantially present in the Blessed Sacrament to be the food of our souls, deign to bless and bring to a successful issue all Eucharistic Congresses and gatherings, and especially the coming congress of the Diocese of Charlotte. Be Thou the inspiration of our labors, resolutions and vows; accept graciously the solemn homage we will render to Thee; send Your Holy Spirit to kindle the hearts of priests, religious, and all the faithful, especially the children, so that devout participation in the Holy Mass and frequent and daily Holy Communion may be held in honor in all the countries of the world; and grant that the Kingship of Your Sacred Heart over human society may everywhere be acknowledged to the glory of God, the Father. Amen.

Sacred Heart of Jesus, bless the Congress.

Holy Mary, Mother of God, Patroness of our diocese, pray for us.

Saint Paschal Baylon, pray for us.

Saint Patrick, pray for us.

"The prayer card invites us to pray that blessings come to our diocese as a result of the congress," said Bishop Jugis. "This year's holy card depicts the famous painting by Fra Angelico, 'The Annunciation,' which reminds us of the congress theme: 'The Word Became Flesh and Made His Dwelling Among Us.' At the mystery of the Annunciation, the Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us. In the mystery of the Eucharist, the Word continues to make his dwelling among us as he changes bread into his flesh and wine into his blood. Christ is really and substantially present in the holy Eucharist."

Perspectives

Hot wings to heaven

"And he will raise you up, on eagle's wings, bear you on the breath of dawn, make you to shine like the sun, and hold you in the palm of His Hand." That's the refrain from the very popular song, "On Eagle's Wings." It was the opening hymn for the funeral mass of Gloria Semler, who died on the feast of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mother (Aug. 15) — a celebration that commemorates Mary's entry into heaven. It's an image evoked in Chapter 12 of the Book of Revelation, which talks about a woman clothed with the sun and taken to safety, born on the wings of a great eagle.

Mrs. Semler's son was my classmate at the Pontifical North American College. I am so proud of how he handled the celebration of his own mother's funeral. It is, I'm sure, one of the most difficult, but beautiful liturgical celebrations he will ever celebrate.

Father Semler summed up the final life lessons his mother taught her seven children as she lay sick in bed. He said, "Mom taught us to be happy, and to live our life according to the call to be God's children. You can't separate the two." He spoke in a way that truly uplifted many people — their minds and hearts — to heaven. His words were truly like eagle's wings.

Food for thought

On a recent trip with Father Semler, I made hot wings. He said, as only a Texan can declare, that I made the best hot wings he has ever eaten.

Because I think a lot about food, I actually thought about those hot wings as he was giving his homily. Not because of the wings, but because of the songs that evoked images of the great wings of the eagle that brought Mary to heaven and the great wings of angels that protect us and shield us from sin. I thought about wings because, as humans, we're not supposed to have them. Instead we are supposed to be carried by the angels who do. And we get to heaven by the levity of our souls. But the dead weight of sin can make it difficult for the angels to carry

FATHER LEO PATALINGHUG

such a heavy load.

This recent funeral celebration was so prayerful and peaceful because Father Semler recalled how his mother died after confessing her sins, and that she received viaticum — the Eucharist as the "food that accompanies us and strengthens us" to heaven.

In other words, we get to heaven not because we will someday "grow wings." We get to heaven because God has given us winged assistance — angels. We need their help. But we also need to help them by not "testing our angels" by putting ourselves in unnecessary harm and weighing down our souls with sin.

Gloria's funeral Mass, celebrated by her son, was truly an inspiration for me, and for all of the people who attended. This celebration, around a sacred meal, left my soul feeling a little "lighter." And remember, a lighter soul makes it much easier for the eagle-like wings of angels to carry us to a better place — a place where death has no more sting and a place where tears are wiped away.

Father Semler is a real inspiration to me. As a way of sharing my support of him, I want to "dedicate" the hot wings recipe to him and his mother. Granted, these wings won't bring you to heaven, but depending on how hot and spicy you make them, these hot wings will make you pray.

*Father Leo Patalinghug is the author of the book, Grace Before Meals: Recipes for Family Life. He will speak at the Diocese of Charlotte's 5th Eucharistic Congress Sept. 26. For his hot wings recipe visit www.gracebeforemeals.com.*

The purpose of work

Laboring to create a Christianized economy

Beyond having time off, enjoying cookouts and shopping for bargains, the time period around Labor Day is an excellent opportunity to reflect on the meaning of work.

If we don't sometimes think about the purpose of work, if we don't consider its divine origin and design, we run the risk of becoming cogs in the corporate wheel, buying unneeded things, making weapons of war, polluting the earth, becoming greedy and ultimately dehumanizing others and ourselves in the process.

From the beginning of time God worked, creating the cosmos. He exemplified for us the importance, beauty and wholesomeness of creative work.

Considering all that God made is good — especially human beings — and because God does not favor any one group of humans over another, the bounty of creation must be kept well-preserved and made available to all people, for all time.

But society's endless quest for profit, its insatiable hunger for more and more stuff at cheap prices, is an offense against the God-given dignity of countless men, women and even children.

The global economic Humpty Dumpty has fallen. And it appears that the world's political and economic powers are doing little more than trying to put this Humpty Dumpty back together again.

But like the nursery rhyme, it would be far better if all the king's men could not put their Humpty Dumpty back together again. Instead of throwing trillions of dollars away attempting to rebuild an ethically sick economy, they should be creatively laboring to build a system that works for people everywhere.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his recent encyclical, "Caritas in Veritate" ("Charity in Truth"), writes about the absolute need for economic systems to be based on ethical values.

In addressing the crisis confronting the global economy, the pope writes,

Making a Difference

TONY MAGLIANO
CNS COLUMNIST

"the primary capital to be safeguarded and valued is man, the human person in his or her integrity."

The pope adds that food and water are the "universal rights of all human beings without distinction or discrimination." Yet our ethically sick global economy ignores the sad fact that over 1 billion human beings lack adequate food and water.

And in the United States, still the richest nation on earth — at least for some — the gap between the rich and poor is greater than at any time since the Great Depression. Over 12 million children live in poverty.

The economy is morally broken.

The U.S. bishops, back in 1986, wrote a wise and compassionate pastoral letter, "Economic Justice for All: Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy." It's still so relevant, it could have been written yesterday.

The bishops boldly proclaimed that "the time has come for a 'New American Experiment' — to implement economic rights, to broaden the sharing of economic power and to make economic decisions more accountable to the common good.

"This experiment can create new structures of economic partnership and participation within firms at the regional level, for the whole nation and across borders."

Let's do it!

Let's create a new economic American experiment based on Christ-like values.

Let's labor to create a Christianized economy!

Senator Ted Kennedy

In the hands of God

I have some problems with Fr. Byron's column in the Aug. 28 issue of The Catholic News & Herald.

I don't dispute that Sen. Kennedy was a popular political figure nor that his annulment gave him access to his faith.

The problem I have is Fr. Byron's profession that "he was a Catholic in good standing" and his inference that the Senator is now with his siblings in heaven (my impression).

Would I be a Catholic in good standing if I openly supported the destruction of unborn life, even to a point where the stomach-turning partial birth abortion would be supported? I don't think so.

In his letter to the Pope, Kennedy asked for forgiveness for his shortcomings but at no time sought forgiveness for his failure to protect the unborn.

He bragged that he fought against the death penalty, but not the death penalty for the helpless unborn.

Letter to the Editor

As far as I am concerned Senator Kennedy did what was politically beneficial to himself despite how it would offend God.

Whether he is reunited with his siblings is now in the hands of that same God, fortunately not in the hands of Fr. Byron.

Youth ministry: A lifelong vocation

Working together is the answer to new challenges

As I flew to Chicago recently for a youth ministry meeting, I wondered, "Why am I doing this?"

During my first pastoral assignment, I was in charge of youth ministry. I spent many evenings chaperoning dances. Then for five years I was a campus minister, living in a dorm with students who acted out all sorts of rites of passage.

During my postgraduate studies, I was once again in a dorm with young students.

Eventually I felt I had paid my dues in youth ministry, so I moved on to ministering to families and the aged.

That Chicago meeting dramatically changed my attitude, however. It helped me to realize that no matter our stage in life, youth ministry is a lifelong mission.

Why do I say this?

Between 2001 and 2005, the National Study of Youth and Religion found that 84 percent of Catholic youth see their faith as extremely to somewhat important. The survey was funded by the Lilly Endowment under the direction of Christian Smith, professor of sociology at the University of Notre Dame, and Lisa Pearce, assistant professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina.

The survey's results are good news. But what is disturbing is that a significant number of Catholic youth cannot verbalize what their faith is. The concepts found in our creed are either foreign to them or vaguely understood.

Furthermore, today's youth are exposed to drugs more than generations before them, are increasingly raised by a single parent and live in a highly stimulated culture that often nullifies any taste for life-giving reflection and contemplation.

New challenges face youth. How do we attract Hispanic youth, get on the wavelength of African-Americans and relate to Middle Eastern cultures? What in Catholic liturgies needs re-examination to reflect our multicultural church?

It has been proven that those who cohabit before marriage have a greater probability of divorce. This is a critical message that is vital for youth to help them enter wholesome marriages.

The aforementioned is only the tip of the iceberg of youth issues.

Youth ministry is not solely about

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE
HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

people getting a degree in this field and working with youth. For it to be successful, parents, priests and the entire parish community need to be involved.

But how do we accomplish this with both parents working and priests keeping a greater distance from youth after the news of sex abuse scandals?

How do we come together in a spirit that says, "We are all in this together and need to roll up our sleeves for the task"?

As these questions buzzed around in my head on my return from Chicago, they reminded me that we never pay our dues fully when working with youth. Youth ministry is a lifelong vocation.

Pope says people must become more humble, less materialistic

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In a world full of vice and sin, people need to radically change their lives, becoming more humble and less materialistic, Pope Benedict XVI said at his weekly general audience Sept. 2.

The pope, resuming a series of audience talks about influential Christian writers from the Middle Ages, focused his catechesis on St. Odo, a 10th-century Benedictine monk and abbot of Cluny, France.

The pope flew to the Vatican by helicopter from Castel Gandolfo, south of Rome, to lead the general audience in the Paul VI hall before about 8,000 pilgrims from around the world.

Pope Benedict looked relaxed and well-rested, though his right hand and wrist were notably swollen. He continued to greet visitors and well-wishers with his left hand, and had a friendly laugh greeting a priest whose left arm and hand were immobilized by a cast and sling.

The pope fell and broke his wrist July 17. Doctors performed minor surgery to stabilize and join the ends of the dislocated broken bones with wires later that day. The cast and wires from the pope's wrist were removed Aug. 21; doctors said the healing process went perfectly and that the 82-year-old pope would recover the use of his hand after completing a program of rehabilitation.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

Our catechesis today deals with another great monastic figure of the Middle Ages, Saint Odo of Cluny. Attracted by the Benedictine ideal, Odo became a monk, and later the second abbot, of Cluny. At the beginning of the ninth century, Cluny was the center of an influential movement of Church reform, and Odo, by his example and teaching did much to further this spiritual renewal throughout Europe. His writings reveal how deeply he was influenced by the monastic virtues of contemplation, detachment from this world and longing for the world to come. Odo was particularly devoted to the Eucharist, emphasizing the real and substantial presence of Christ under the species of bread and wine. This conviction of faith led him to work for the reform of the clergy and to stress the need for a worthy reception of the Sacrament. An authentic spiritual guide for his troubled times, Odo blended the personal austerity of a great reformer with a constant and joyful contemplation of Christ's infinite mercy.

Learning how to talk

Six steps to better communication for tough conversations

Growing up is hard to do, especially if you're speech-delayed, meaning that you like to bolt before the tough conversations happen.

Having been raised in a dysfunctional family with the rest of America, I didn't exactly learn good communication skills at home. I couldn't articulate what I wanted or needed without a good silent treatment, screaming session or other manipulation technique.

But to keep friends and eventually win a husband, I had to learn how to talk. About the important stuff.

In their book "Crucial Conversations: Tools for Talking When Stakes Are High," authors Kerry Patterson, Joseph Grenny, Ron McMillan and Al Switzler offer several tips to help guide the communication-challenged folks among us. I've condensed and excerpted their advice below.

1. Start with heart. Remember that the only person you can directly control is yourself; focus on what you REALLY want.

People who are best at dialogue realize that not only are they likely to benefit by improving their own approach, but also that they're the only person they can work on anyway.

2. Learn to look. When caught up in a crucial conversation, it's difficult to see exactly what's going on and why. When a discussion starts to become stressful, we often end up doing the exact opposite of what works.

To break from this insidious cycle: Learn to look at content and conditions, look for when things become crucial, learn to watch for safety problems, look to see if others are moving toward silence -- or violence!

3. Make it safe. When you've made a mistake that has hurt others, start with an apology. You have to give up saving face, being right or winning in order to focus on what you REALLY want.

Sometimes others feel disrespected during crucial conversations even though you haven't done anything disrespectful. Use a contrasting statement that addresses others' suspicion about you. Clarify your real purpose.

4. Master your story. If strong emotions are keeping you stuck in silence or violence, try to do this: Get in touch with your feelings. Learn to accurately identify the emotions behind your story. Analyze your story. Question your conclusions and look for other possible explanations behind your story. Get back to the facts. Abandon your absolute certainty by distinguishing between hard facts and your invested story. Watch too for clever stories. "Victim," "villain" and "helpless" stories sit at the top of the list.

5. State your path. When you have a tough message to share or when you

Our Turn

THERESE J.
BORCHARD
CNS COLUMNIST

are so convinced of your rightness that you may push too hard, remember to STATE your path: Share your facts. Tell your story. Ask for others' paths. Talk tentatively (state your story as a story; don't disguise it as a fact). Also encourage testing; that is, make it safe for others to express differing or even opposing views.

6. Explore others' paths. To encourage the free flow of meaning and help others, start with an attitude of curiosity and patience. Then use four powerful listening skills:

— Ask. Start by simply expressing interest in the other person's views.

— Mirror. Increase safety by respectfully acknowledging the emotions people appear to be feeling.

— Paraphrase. As others begin to share part of their story, restate what you've heard to show that it's safe for them to share what they're thinking.

— Prime. Take your best guess at what they may be thinking and feeling.

priests celebrating jubilee anniversaries were recognized during a Mass at St. Patrick
Cathedral in Charlotte Sept. 8.

The jubilees, or special anniversaries, mark 25-, 50-, 55- and 60-year milestones of service to the priesthood.

Celebrating 60 years are Father Charles Reese and Benedictine Father Matthew
McSorley; 50 years is Father
Gabriel Meehan; and 25 years are Conventional Franciscan Father Jude DeAngelo, Father
Peter Fitzgibbons, Father Paul
Gary, Father Thomas Kessler,
Father Philip Kollithanath and Father John Tuller.

"Our parishioners look for their priests to be authentic witnesses of Christ," said
Bishop Jugis during his homily.

PAPAL PLAUDITS

Sister Sharon Holland, a member of the Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, displays the Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice Cross in Monroe, Mich., July 13. She received the medal from Slovenian Cardinal Franc Rode, prefect of the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, at the Vatican June 26.

US nun receives papal honor for Vatican congregation work

MONROE, Mich. (CNS) — A Michigan nun who before her retirement in June was one of the highest-ranking women at the Vatican has received the Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice Cross, a papal honor recognizing her outstanding service to the church.

Sister Sharon Holland, a member of the Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, is a canon lawyer who was one of the first women to become a "capo d'ufficio," or section chief, at a major Vatican agency.

She spent 21 years as a section chief at the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life. In that role, Sister Sharon responded to questions on governance from congregations of religious from all over the world.

Cardinal Franc Rode, prefect of the congregation, presented Sister Sharon with the papal honor June 26. Upon her retirement she returned to her congregation in Monroe.

In a July 14 statement, Sister Sharon described her ministry at the Vatican as "a wonderful experience in terms of being exposed to the universal church."

Although she didn't expect any kind of honor, she said receiving the medal

"was a very positive sign of my work having been appreciated."

In a March 2007 interview with Catholic News Service in Rome, Sister Sharon said she had seen an increase in the number of women working at the Vatican, "and I think it would be safe to say there's an increase in the level of work they're doing."

Women officials are more directly involved in laying the groundwork for decisions by higher-ups, she said.

"None of us make the decisions finally, but the better they're prepared, the more likely they are to move forward," she said.

In April of this year, the Catholic Health Association honored her with a bronze statuette and a board resolution calling her "a champion of American religious congregations and their ministries" throughout her time in Rome.

In 2007 she was awarded the International Medal from Vincentian-run St. John's University in Jamaica, N.Y. In the citation for the award, presented in Rome where the university has a campus, St. John's called Sister Sharon one of the world's leading canon lawyers and said she "models what is best about religious life."

US bishops impressed with AIDS work in southern Africa

Delegation arranges funding for relief projects

PRETORIA, South Africa (CNS) — Members of a U.S. Catholic bishops' delegation visiting southern Africa said they were impressed with the church-run programs that treat and care for AIDS orphans and those infected with HIV.

Bishop John C. Wester of Salt Lake City said he was "particularly" "touched by the number of volunteers" involved in the efforts, noting that they "make it possible to get the services to the people" who need them.

The bishop was part of a U.S. bishops' delegation visiting southern Africa Aug. 26-Sept. 6. Participants visited Zimbabwe Aug. 26-28, then traveled to South Africa, where most remained until Sept. 6.

Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick, retired archbishop of Washington who joined the delegation Aug. 31, and several others traveled to the landlocked kingdom of Swaziland and saw households where orphaned teenagers are raising their younger siblings. They also visited St. Philip's Hostel for AIDS orphans.

"It was wonderful to see the courage of these children, and I am grateful that people in the U.S. have a role to play in helping them," he said, noting that this help "is a great blessing for everyone."

Swaziland has the world's highest HIV-positive rate.

Members of the delegation met with staff at the U.S. Embassy to Swaziland in Mbabane in an effort to arrange for U.S. government funding for church-run HIV and AIDS projects. The U.S. President's Emergency Plan for HIV/AIDS Relief, or PEPFAR, provides extensive funds for the AIDS projects run by the Southern African Catholic Bishops' Conference, which includes the bishops of Swaziland, South Africa and Botswana.

Catholic parish joins Muslim students to help after Indonesian quake

We must help the people, priest says

TASIKMALAYA, Indonesia (CNS) — A Catholic parish in the predominantly Muslim Indonesian province of West Java is working to provide emergency aid to victims of the magnitude 7 earthquake that struck Sept. 2.

Humanitarian aid is not being adequately distributed to victims "so we must help the people" who have not been reached, Father Albertus Nugroho, a priest at Sacred Heart of Jesus Parish in Tasikmalaya, told the Asian church news agency UCA News.

Parish leaders, representatives of the Indonesian bishops' charitable agency and a representative of the Muslim Students Movement in West Java met Sept. 3 and agreed first to provide emergency aid, then to work on rehabilitation and reconstruction.

Parish leaders said they were told other parishes and the U.S. bishops' Catholic Relief Services would send them aid to distribute.

Bishop Johannes Trilaksyanta Pujasumarta of Bandung visited quake victims in Tasikmalaya Sept. 4.

According to the country's National Disaster Management Agency's Web site, the quake killed at least 59 people and damaged more than 10,000 houses. More than 25,000 people were displaced from their homes.

Learning Eastern, Western spirituality aids Christian unity, says pope

Letter directed to inter-Christian symposium

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A better understanding of Western and Eastern Christian spirituality and doctrine will aid in promoting Christian unity, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Common ground in Eastern and Western spirituality "is the valuable lifeblood for a broader relationship between Catholics and Orthodox," he said.

The pope's remarks came in a written message to Catholic and Orthodox participants in an inter-Christian symposium Sept. 3-5 in Rome. The message, addressed to Cardinal Walter Kasper, head of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, was released by the Vatican Sept. 3.

The pope said the symposium's focus this year on St. Augustine in Eastern and Western traditions was important for learning more about Christian theology and spirituality in the West and East and how they developed.

While the fourth-century saint and theologian was of fundamental importance in influencing theology and culture in the West, "the reception of his thinking by orthodox theology turned out to be rather problematic," said the pope in his written message, which was read at the symposium's opening session.

He added that a better understanding of "the doctrinal and spiritual riches that make up the East and West's Christian heritage becomes indispensable not only for enhancing their importance, but also for promoting a better, reciprocal appreciation among all Christians."

The inter-Christian symposium was sponsored by the Franciscan Institute of Spirituality of Rome's Antonianum University and the department of theology at Aristotle University in Salonika, Greece. The symposiums, which began in 1992, are held alternatively in Italy and Greece.

67th Serra international convention promotes sacramental priesthood

Laypeople have duty to nurture vocations, says Archbishop Dolan

OMAHA, Neb. (CNS) -- New York Archbishop Timothy M. Dolan, keynote speaker Aug. 30 at the 67th Serra International Convention in Omaha, said the lay faithful of the church have a duty to nurture vocations to the sacramental priesthood.

"Ordained priests have the duty to call forth the gifts of the lay faithful as they share in the role of Jesus of teaching, serving and sanctifying," Archbishop

Dolan said. "And the lay faithful have the duty to take care of vocations to the sacramental priesthood."

The archbishop is the episcopal adviser to the Serra Club, an international organization that promotes and fosters vocations to the priesthood and consecrated life. He was one of several speakers at the convention held at Omaha's Qwest Center Aug. 27-30 and attended by more than 500 people.

New student council officers at Our Lady of Grace School in Greensboro were installed in a ceremony following the weekly school Mass Sept. 2. These students in fourth through eighth grades will hold office during the 2009-2010 school year.

The mission of the council is to assist in carrying out the religious, social, academic and administrative programs concerning students as well as plan social functions and raise funds for charities. Once per month, the council sponsors a casual dress day for which each student pays $1 to dress out of uniform. These funds go toward charities selected by the elected council. In addition, the council collects canned food for Urban Ministry, an ecumenical outreach agency in Greensboro that provides crisis intervention and emergency services through the basics of food, shelter, and clothing. The total for the 2008-2009 school year Urban Ministry donation reached more than 1,200 pounds.

Catholic cheers

COURTESY PHOTO

Participants of the Charlotte Catholic High School cheerleading camp are pictured with Jennifer Healy, CCHS dance and cheer director, and the current high school team. Most campers came from Holy Trinity Middle School and St. Matthew and St. Gabriel elementary schools.

During the camp, which was held June 15-19, future Cougars split into two sessions according to skill level and learned CCHS cheers, dance routines, and stunts. The week culminated with a performance for the 'little Cougars' parents and a performance at this year's first CCHS home football game while partnered with the CCHS team.

Healy says, "It was a wonderful way to invite our Catholic youth here to share in our programs in hopes to encourage more participation in our future cheer and dance teams." Casey Corser, whose daughter assisted with the camp, was impressed by the involvement of the CCHS dance and cheer team members. "These young ladies truly emulated all that we as parents hope our children will become; genuinely kind, caring, enthusiastic, and willingly sharing their time and talent!"

Perfect score

COURTESY PHOTO

Anthony Palillo, son of Anthony and Carol Palillo and a senior at Charlotte Catholic High School, was the only college-bound student in North Carolina and one of 84 in the U.S. and abroad to achieve a 36, the highest possible composite score, on the June 2009 national test administration of the ACT. While the number of students earning a score of 36 varies from test to test, less than one-tenth of one percent achieve the top score nationally.

The ACT consists of tests in English, mathematics, reading and science. Each test is scored on a scale of 1-36, and a student's composite score is the average of the four test scores. For purposes of comparison, the average composite score for the national high school graduating class of 2008 was 21.1 out of 36. Some students also take ACT's optional Writing Test, but the score for that test is reported separately and is not included in the ACT composite score.

In a letter recognizing this exceptional achievement, ACT Chief Executive Officer Richard L. Ferguson pointed out that Anthony should have a choice of the widest possible range of future educational options. ACT scores are accepted by all U.S. colleges and universities.

FROM THE COVER

Woman's tale of faith, prayer and survival

In an interview with The Catholic News & Herald, Ilibagiza talked candidly about the power of prayer in her life and the importance of forgiveness.

Overcoming fear

During the first week of hiding, Ilibagiza found herself struggling with the reality of her situation. The town where she was, once loved had suddenly turned against her.

Hiding in the bathroom with the other women, "I thought I would go crazy," she said. "I was hungry, fearful, my stomach was aching."

During the second week the killings began. People flocked to stadiums for protection. But no one was safe.

"They were going home by home," said Ilibagiza, "They threw hand grenades

"Anytime I prayed I felt so strong, but the moment I let go the fear would become overwhelming."

— Immaculée Ilibagiza into the stadiums."

They came to the house where she was hiding and searched for two hours.

It was then that she truly began to rely on God.

"When I realized that God was listening in our hearts, I started to pray every second of the time I was in the bathroom," Ilibagiza said. "I prayed the rosary over and over and over and over."

"Prayer was everything to me," she added.

At first, prayer was a way of keeping her mind off of the fear.

COURTESY PHOTO

Immaculée Ilibagiza, a survivor of the 1994 Rwandan genocide, will speak at the Diocese of Charlotte's fifth Eucharistic Congress at the Charlotte Convention Center Sept. 25 and 26.

"Prayer, in that way, was like food — food and water to drink," she said.

Gradually, she took her prayers deeper by meditating on the words. She began to not only say the words, but to really think about what she was saying.

"For every mystery I went back to the Bible and read," said Ilibagiza.

"Anytime I prayed I felt so strong, but the moment I let go the fear would become overwhelming," she said.

Ilibagiza estimates that during the 91 days she was in hiding she prayed approximately 27 rosaries a day.

Sometime she struggled with the words of the prayers.

"When you are praying the rosary, you must repeat those words, 'forgive us as we forgive,'" said Ilibagiza. "At one point I stopped saying that part of the prayer."

But then she understood, "These are Gods words. You can't change them, you can't edit them. That's when I realized I have to let it go, I have to forgive, I have to understand."

A new beginning

In 1998, Ilibagiza immigrated to the United States. While working for the United Nations she was encouraged by co-workers and friends to write down her story.

That effort became "Left to Tell: Discovering God Amidst the Rwandan Holocaust."

"When I was writing this book, everything was against me," she said. "I had never met an author of a book before I wrote the book. I met the publisher three days after I finished."

Today Ilibagiza travels the world spreading her message of peace, faith and forgiveness.

She uses her speaking engagements as opportunities to talk about the power of prayer, even when she is speaking at nonreligious events.

"When I am given a chance to talk to people who don't believe in God," she said, "I try to teach them about the rosary."

"God has so many ways of using his people," said Ilibagiza. "We can only wish that a little drop of his Word can come through."

When she speaks at the upcoming Eucharistic Congress in Charlotte, Ilibagiza said she hopes to share a message of forgiveness.

"I want people to know that our healing is from God," she said. "I have gone through it, I have seen his hand."

"I want to remind the people, no matter how bad it is to hold on to God," said Ilibagiza. "There will be betrayals, there will be injustice, there will be all kinds of evil, but if you hold onto God and Our Lady and Jesus, they will walk with you."

Holy Angels receives "Good For Kids" award

ASHEVILLE — A local Catholic non-profit organization was recognized recently by the North Carolina Pediatric Society for its work in improving the health of children.

Holy Angels in Belmont was awarded the "Good for Kids" award at a luncheon in Asheville, Aug. 22. Over 200 North Carolina pediatricians were in attendance as Regina Moody, President/CEO and Dr. Ellis Fisher, Holy Angels Medical Director, accepted the recognition.

The award is given each year to recognize organizations that provide services to make a difference in the lives of children.

"We consider it essential to acknowledge and recognize the work of everyone who contributes to improved health outcomes for children and youth," said Steve Shore, executive director of the NC Pediatric Society.

Members of the award selection committee not only looked at the innovative and unique services that Holy Angels has provided for children with special needs but also the long history spanning over 50 years.

In the mid-1990s, the NC Pediatric Society established the "Good For Kids" award to recognize collaborative partners who are essential to helping pediatricians accomplish their work to improve the lives of children.

It is given to an individual or organization that exemplifies the mission of the American Academy of Pediatrics: 'dedicated to the health of all children.'

When asked about the recognition, Dr. Fisher stated, "It is a privilege for me to work with the staff of Holy Angels, where the focus is always about the children who live there and their special needs."

Dr. Docia Hickey, a neonatologist at Carolinas Medical Center and Holy Angels board member, nominated Holy Angels for this award.

Dr. Hickey is very aware of the difference Holy Angels continues to make in the lives of young children who are medically fragile, especially infants with very special needs.

Founded in the 1930's, the North Carolina Pediatric Society met primarily to get pediatric practitioners together for continuing education and fellowship.

Today, it has expanded its mission to include the formation of policy to promote the health, safety, and well being of infants, children, adolescents, and young adults in North Carolina.

Holy Angels was founded in 1956 by the Sisters of Mercy. The private, nonprofit corporation located in Belmont provides residential services and innovative programs for children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation and physical disabilities, some of whom are medically fragile.

Programs include the Morrow Center, four Community Group Homes, five ICF/MR group homes (Intermediate Care Facilities for the Mentally Retarded), Little Angels Child Development Center, Great Adventures, Camp Hope and Cherubs Café & Candy Bouquets in downtown Belmont.

St. Gabriel School students showed their support for Charlotte Catholic High School during the PTO-organized tailgate party in front of a large sign that read "St. Gabriel loves CCHS" and was signed by the students. More than 500 attendees cheered Charlotte Catholic High School coach Jim Oddo and his team during a game against Providence High School Aug. 28.

Coach Oddo did not disappoint as he led the team to his 300th victory in a three-overtime game. The final score was 48-47.

"The family tailgate was a wonderful gathering complete with food and fun for everyone," said St. Gabriel School parent Virginia White. "The kids loved showing their spirit by wearing red "Future Cougar" t-shirts and painting their faces with cougar paw prints."

Following his momentous win, Coach Oddo was named head coach for the 2009 Shrine Bowl.

What is the study?

Rosemary Keely, Living Your Strengths (LYS) coordinator for St. Mark parish in Huntersville, describes engagement as the umbrella and LYS groups as one spoke. LYS was developed by the Gallup organization in the form of a guidebook intended to help readers identify God-given strengths and use them to enhance engagement.

Keely said LYS programs are about "personal, person to person connections."

Meredith Ellisor, LYS facilitator for St. Matthew Church in Charlotte, agrees. "It has such practical applications for faith involvement, and moreover, it is a wonderful way to meet people."

The Gallup Organization, a group known for expertise in public opinion polling since 1958, chose the term 'engagement' to describe the degree of belonging individuals feel to their church.

In the fall of 2001, the Gallup Faith Poll and Congregational Engagement Index was launched. In 2002, St. Gerard Majella Catholic Church in Port Jefferson Station, N.Y. pioneered the application of survey results to improve engagement.

"I've been in corporate America thirty years and I've never seen anything like it," says Bill Conwell, engagement committee co-chair at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte. "The beauty is that it is truly a grassroots movement to better connect individuals to the church."

Conwell said new partnerships are forming across parishes in the Charlotte diocese. Father Francis J. O'Rourke, pastor of St. Gabriel Church remarked that he was "so impressed by Msgr. McSweeney's (pastor of St. Matthew Church) energized and blessed parish" that he wanted the same for St. Gabriel Church.

He adds that during a Gallup summit St. Matthew Church in May for the five dioceses of Charlotte, Charleston, Raleigh, Savannah, and Atlanta, there existed a broader representation of faiths, including Protestant and Jewish.

Conwell says, "Part of the magnitude of these programs is the realization that this is an incredible outreach opportunity from an interfaith standpoint."

Engagement in the Diocese of Charlotte

St. Matthew Church is the first parish in the Diocese of Charlotte to become involved with engagement initiatives and LYS small groups.

The parish heard of the program through Immaculate Heart of Mary (IHOM) parish in Cincinnati, whose pastor spoke at St. Matthew Church.

"We found out about it accidentally, but with the help of the Holy Spirit, there are really no accidents," said Don Garby, chair of the engagement commission at St. Matthew Church, who added they saw the program when looking at the IHOM website. "IHOM was one of the earliest parishes to adopt the engagement concept. We visited them and that got us started."

In December 2007, St. Matthew Church conducted a congregational engagement survey. The parish plans to conduct a follow-up survey Sept. 26.

In the nearly two years that have passed, the parish has trained nine coaches to assist parishioners in deciding how to best use their strengths in the parish and counted approximately 600 parishioners and non-parishioners who have participated in a LYS small group.

In July, the church conducted LYS Level I Coach training and is currently conducting a Gallup Leadership Excellence program for two parochial vicars. St. Matthew Church is considered a Center of Excellence by the Gallup Organization for the southeast region.

How engagement works

The engagement process begins with a parish evaluation survey, intended not only to determine the level of engagement parishioners feel, but clarify expectations of two groups, church leadership and church members.

The LYS process begins with an online, 30-minute questionnaire, the result of Gallup Organization research with over two million people. The questionnaire determines an individual's top five strengths out of a pool of 35 possibilities.

Follow-up resources include small group studies and individual coaching. Small groups provide descriptions of strengths and brainstorm applications in the church and in daily life. Coaches, trained by Gallup, provide in-depth, personalized counseling on the implementation of an individual's top five strengths.

Spreading the word

As a regional leader in the Gallup engagement and LYS programming, St. Matthew Church considers reaching out to other parishes a priority.

A traveling troupe of parishioners that St. Matthew Church has named the "Roadshow" visits parishes across Charlotte to discuss Gallup programs and help train facilitators and coaches.

Other Charlotte diocese parishes have been implementing or considering the engagement program since attendance at the May summit. They include: the Basilica of St. Lawrence of Asheville; Our Lady of the Highways of Thomasville; St. Aloysius of Hickory; St. Elizabeth of Boone; St. Gabriel of Charlotte; St. Leo the Great of Winston-Salem; St. Mark of Huntersville; St. Paul the Apostle of Greensboro; and St. Benedict and St. Pius the Tenth of Greensboro.

CLEMMONS — A new cemetery and columbarium was blessed by Bishop Peter J. Jugis at Holy Family Church in Clemmons Sept. 5.

It is the fifth Catholic cemetery to be blessed in the Diocese of Charlotte in the past two years. The capacity for traditional burial is 222 with 245 niches in the columbarium.

Construction of the cemetery and columbarium began four years ago but came to a halt in 2006 when the diocese implemented a moratorium on constructing and expanding columbaria and conducted a study on the use of columbaria and cemeteries.

In March 2007, the Diocese of Charlotte issued its new policy on cemeteries and columbaria, which states parishes may offer at one location a resting place for both the bodies and the cremated remains of the deceased. Construction resumed in Sept. 2008 and was completed in June 2009.

The columbarium wall is located in the middle of the cemetery. The faceplates on the columbarium are granite and names will be laser engraved. At its center, the cemetery features a bronze-colored fiberglass crucifix.

At the close of the dedication ceremony, Father Michael Buttner, pastor, expressed his appreciation to all who made it possible for the addition of the cemetery and columbarium to the parish campus. Immediately following the ceremony, the bishop greeted parishioners at a reception in the parish Family Center.

Bishop installs pastor at Holy Cross Church

BY HEATHER BELLEMORE

KERNERSVILLE — Parishioners of Holy Cross Church in Kernersville welcomed a new pastor, Salesian Father Paul de Chant into their parish community Sept. 2.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis presided at the Mass and ceremony.

Both Bishop Jugis and Father de Chant were further welcomed at a social gathering sponsored by the Columbiettes, Hispanic Society and Family Life held in Salesian Hall following the installation ceremony.

Father Paul de Chant succeeds Father Joseph Tustin, Holy Cross Church pastor of 11 years who has moved to a parish in Philadelphia, Pa.

Originally from California, Father de Chant was previously located at St. John Neumann Church in Reston, Va. This was not his first visit to Kernersville, however, as Father de Chant conducted a mission trip at Holy Cross Church three years ago.

It was during that mission that Holy Cross Church parishioner and Knights of Columbus member Fred Hogan met Father de Chant. Hogan described him as a "man of character, a timeless priest."

Hogan said that Father de Chant has a black lab named Shadow who greets all parishioners after each Mass and is "a great hit with the youngsters and everyone else."

The nearly two-hour installation was "most impressive as well as informative," said Hogan, "especially for those who attended such a service for the first time." The program included the Knights of Columbus Council 8509 in full regalia.

Holy Cross Church was started as a mission in the early 1970s and has since grown to more than 1,000 families.

Priests honored at Jubilee Mass

It was fitting that the Jubilee Mass was celebrated on the feast day of the birth of Mary, said the bishop, because like Mary, a priest is chosen for Jesus.

Of the factors that indicate priestly happiness, a good relationship with God is followed closely by a positive relationship with the Blessed Virgin Mary, added the bishop.

At the end of his homily, the bishop thanked the priests for their devotion to the people of God in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Of the nine jubilarians, four were in attendance at the Mass. The Catholic News & Herald spoke with Fathers DeAngelo, Fitzgibbons, Gary and Kessler about their 25 years of service to the priesthood.

Conventional Franciscan Father Jude DeAngelo

Father DeAngelo is currently serving as campus minister at Wake Forest University, Salem College and the University of North Carolina School of the Arts in Winston-Salem.

He was ordained May 26, 1984 by Bishop Howard J. Hubbard at Immaculate Conception Cathedral in Albany, N.Y.

Father DeAngelo's first pastoral assignment was at McCorristian Catholic High School in Trenton, N.J., where he taught religion from 1984 to 1990.

He came to the Diocese of Charlotte in 1998 and has been serving as campus minister at Wake Forest University, Salem College and the University of North Carolina School of the Arts in Winston-Salem ever since.

"I just really love being a priest," said Father DeAngelo, who said the most important part of his ministry is the celebration of the Mass. He also enjoys the "Franciscan flavor of preaching" and the "privilege of walking with God's people."

His advice to seminarians and new priests is two-fold: First, "Dedicate everything you do to the Sacred Heart of Jesus through the Immaculate Heart of Mary. That's where your spirituality as a priest has to come from." Second, "Listen to your people in your parishes. They are filled with wisdom and the power of Christ."

Father Peter Fitzgibbons

Father Fitzgibbons is the pastor of Our Lady of the Annunciation Church in Albemarle where he has been for the past five years. Father Fitzgibbons was ordained at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte June 9, 1984.

His first pastoral assignment was at the cathedral, where he served as assistant rector. During the past 25 years he has served throughout the Diocese of Charlotte and around the world as an Army chaplain.

In June 1989, Father Fitzgibbons was released from the diocese by Bishop John F. Donoghue for service in the Army. From 1989 to 1996, he was stationed at various bases in North Carolina as well as in the Persian Gulf, Korea and the Guantánamo Bay Detention Camp in Cuba.

In 1996 he returned to the diocese of Charlotte. He served in the Army Reserve and was called to active duty in 2003. He served in Operation Iraqi Freedom from 2003-2004.

The two things Father Fitzgibbons enjoys most about being a priest are celebrating Mass and administering the sacraments.

"That's why we were ordained," he said.

Reflecting on his time in the Diocese of Charlotte, Father Fitzgibbons spoke fondly of friendships with his brother priests.

"We have great priests here," he said, and "I'm impressed by the younger priests." His advice to new priests and seminarians: "A Holy Hour every day."

Father Paul Gary

Father Gary is the pastor of St. Luke Church in Mint Hill. He was ordained by Bishop Michael J. Begley at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte Feb. 11, 1984.

His first assignment was serving as parochial vicar at Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville.

"I've enjoyed everything about being a priest," said Father Gary. "Visiting the sick, the school Masses, helping people, preaching, confession, and celebrating Mass."

During his 25 years as a priest in the diocese one of the most notable changes Father Gary has seen is the growing number of Catholics in the area.

His advice to new priests or seminarians: "Be prayerful and love the church. Love the people of God and do your best to serve them."

Father Thomas Kessler

Father Kessler is pastor of Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe. He was ordained a priest at the Cathedral of St. Catharine of Siena in Allentown, Pa. on May 12, 1984.

Father Kessler spent the first years of his ministry in Pennsylvania. Then, in 1988 he received permission to serve as a missionary priest in Bolivia.

He served in Bolivia for five years before returning to Pennsylvania.

In 1999 his bishop lent him to Diocese of Charlotte, where he was assigned to St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton for three years.

In 2002 he became incardinated as a priest for the Diocese of Charlotte.

Throughout his 25 years as a priest, Father Kessler has served as a parish priest, missionary, high school administrator and hospital chaplain.

The thing he likes most about being a priest is the diversity.

Through the diversity of his ministerial experiences, Father Kessler said he has been blessed to witness "the goodness of God and his people."

His advice to new priests and seminarians was two-fold: First, "Don't be a naive realist. When it comes to the mystery of God, there are things we don't know and you should know that." Second, "Know what you are doing. The sanctity of your office as a priest is important."

BANGLADESH BEAT

Sohini Mree, 90, poses with traditional Garo musical instruments in August in Tangail, Bangladesh. U.S. Holy Cross Father Eugene Homrich has employed Mree as the curator of a small museum to preserve traditional Garo musical instruments.

Reviving the Rhythm

US priest in Bangladesh helps Garo tribe save musical instruments

TANGAIL, Bangladesh (CNS).—The beat of traditional tribal Garo drums is being heard a little more often these days in the Mymensingh Diocese in Bangladesh.

The playing of these and other traditional instruments is undergoing a revival thanks to the efforts of American Holy Cross Father Eugene Homrich, the parish priest of St. Paul's Church in Tangail, reported the Asian church news agency UCA News.

Father Homrich, 85, has been working in this forested tribal area of northwestern Bangladesh since 1952 and has established a small museum to preserve traditional tribal musical instruments, some of which were at risk of being lost forever.

He also has employed four elderly Garo musicians to teach young people how to play the instruments, UCA News reported.

"After having spent over 40 years with the Garo people, I found that ... they have a rich musical heritage. So I've tried to be of some help" in this area, said the priest, who is known affectionately as "Achchu (Grandfather) Nokrek."

Father Homrich started collecting and preserving instruments in 1993. Since then, he has preserved about 300 instruments, spending almost $3,000 in the process.

He said he had to obtain many of the instruments from India.

"My friends in America and some wealthy local and foreign donors helped me to finance the scheme," said the priest, who speaks the Garo language and often celebrates Mass in Garo.

The museum also has a collection of traditional Garo household utensils, some of which are no longer to be found in the Garo community in Bangladesh.

Father Homrich has employed 90-year-old Sohini Mree as the museum curator and as a teacher of traditional Garo music to 25 young Garo people.

"I learned to play musical instruments from my father," said Mree, who used to be a farmer. He added that he never imagined he would become a music teacher.

Father Joyonto Raksam, an ethnic Garo, said Father Homrich "has revived interest in traditional Garo music, which is also a part of local Catholic liturgy."

Father Raksam, the rector of St. Paul's Seminary, said, "The Garo have hymnbooks and Mass books in their native language," so musical instruments are important for accompanying hymns sung during Mass and other liturgical celebrations.

He also said Father Homrich's initiative has helped reawaken cultural awareness among parish priests in the diocese. They, too, have started collecting and preserving traditional musical instruments in their own parishes, he said.

According to the Bangladesh Catholic directory, nearly 73,000 Catholics lived in the diocese in 2007. Most of the Catholics are members of the Garo tribe, reported UCA News.

Managing Stress, Demonstrating Compassion

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

When we first got our now 7-year-old cat we named him "Mischief," and for good reason: He loved to chew things and caused frequent damage to blanket fringe, Venetian-blind cords and shoelaces when we weren't looking. It was an irritating quirk, but one that we learned to live with by protecting our belongings from his reach.

More antagonistic cat traits eventually surfaced when we had to leave Mischief alone in the house for extended periods of time. He "retaliated" by leaving us "surprises" where we couldn't fail to find them -- usually where we sat or walked. For a while, it seemed as though we were at war with our cat until we recognized that his behavior was directly related to his level of separation anxiety. The hostilities between us lessened as soon as we responded compassionately and stabilized his environment.

In some ways, people aren't that much different from cats. Even well-trained, well-meaning folks can get cranky when exhausted or be callous toward others when anxious. Historians have written volumes about the recurrent patterns of war and bloodshed that occur when fear-based ideologies and severe levels of stress influence entire peoples to act against their common humanity.

Today's readings illustrate but a few of a gamut of passions that are responsible for such human carnage: resentment toward those who would point out our faults, jealousy, "selfish ambition," covetousness and lack of trust. The Gospel of Jesus provides a simple but paradoxical antidote: "If anyone wishes to be first, he shall be the last of all and the servant of all." Putting those words into action, Jesus carried this axiom to its ultimate conclusion when he carried his cross to Calvary.

Demonstrating compassion toward another human being can often be more challenging than showing mercy to one's cat. The same Jesus who died and rose for all of us impassioned, conflicted people gives us both the means and the will to be servants to one another.

Questions:

What human passion is most at the root of your unkindness to others? To whom do you need to demonstrate Christ's compassion today?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Where do the wars and where do the conflicts among you come from?" (James 4:1)

Message of truth lives in film

Pope praises film on St. Augustine as an authentic slice of life

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI praised a made-for-television movie dedicated to St. Augustine, saying the two-part miniseries “represents every aspect of the human life experience with all of its problems, sorrows and failures.”

Furthermore, the movie shows how “in the end truth is stronger than any obstacle,” he said Sept. 2 after viewing a shortened version of the more than three-hour-long film.

“This is the great hope that it ends up with: We cannot find truth by ourselves, but the truth, which is a person (Christ), finds us,” he said.

The movie, called “St. Augustine,” was directed by the award-winning Canadian director Christian Duguay, and was co-produced by Italian, German and Polish television companies.

Promotional materials said the miniseries was one of a number of made-for-television movies being produced, which were also to focus on Roman Emperor Nero, St. Peter and Ben Hur.

The pope said St. Augustine’s life seemed to end tragically because the city of Hippo, “the world for which and in which he lived, ends and is destroyed.”

“But as it has been shown here, his message has remained and, even as the world changes, that message lives on because it is based on truth and guides charity, which is our common destiny,” he said.

The pope has often said his own thinking has been greatly inspired by the fourth-century theologian. When he was a young priest in 1953, the pope wrote his doctoral thesis on St. Augustine’s teachings, and his encyclical, “Deus Caritas Est” (“God Is Love”), owes much to the thought of this saint.

Born in North Africa, St. Augustine for many years ignored the counsel of his Christian mother and led a hedonistic lifestyle before converting and being baptized in Milan, Italy, at the age of 33.

St. Augustine’s spiritual awakening was not an overnight event but a continual process. The saint’s eyes were opened, the pope once said, by an awareness of God’s love, which is “the heart of the Gospel, the central nucleus of Christianity.”

Old school, but media savvy

BY RICHARD A. SOKERKA

PATTERSON, N.J. (CNS) — There’s no doubt Pope Benedict XVI is old school when it comes to his preferred means of personal communications — his passion for reading books and writing out his documents in longhand.

But that doesn’t mean he isn’t media savvy when it comes to today’s new communication tools and the power they have to serve the common good or promote immoral interests.

Toward the end of his encyclical, “Charity in Truth,” the pope included a short but firm analysis about the “increasingly pervasive presence” of modern media.

In his encyclical, the pope cautions:

“Just because social communications increase the possibilities of interconnection and the dissemination of ideas, it does not follow that they promote freedom or internationalize development and democracy for all.”

The pope also noted:

- The mass media are not morally “neutral.”

- The media have a large role in shaping attitudes that requires careful reflection on their influence, especially when it comes to questions of ethics.

While the pope has affirmed new media by utilizing YouTube videos and podcasts to evangelize, he knows perfectly well the downside to modern technology and will not hesitate to voice his concerns when they are warranted.

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

For the month of September, here is a look back as Our Lady of the Annunciation in Albemarle, the sole Catholic parish in Stanley County, celebrates its 75th anniversary.

ARCHIVES PHOTO

Bishop Hafey with priests, nuns, and laity at Our Lady of Annunciation in Albemarle in 1934.

- 23 February 1933 – Diocese of Raleigh Bishop William Hafey wrote the pastor of St. James Church in Hamlet, Fr. Edward Gross, and asked him to visit Albemarle once a month believing there to be four Catholic families residing in Albemarle. The bishop requested Fr. Gross offer Mass for them and provide religious instruction.
- 5 March 1934 – A letter to Bishop Hafey informed him that the Annunciation branch of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith had consented to provide money for a chapel in Albemarle. The chapel was built in memory of Bishop John J. Dunn and under the patronage of Our Lady of the Annunciation. Bishop Dunn died in 1933 and served as Auxiliary Bishop of New York. The Society for the Propagation of the Faith raised funds to construct the church and completely furnish it.
- 20 June 1934 – Work on the church began with Belmont Abbey monk, Fr. Michael McInerney, O.S.B., as architect.
- 1 July 1934 – Fr. James A. Cowan was designated as pastor of the new Our Lady of the Annunciation parish. Bishop Hafey, also, assigned him the care of St. James in Concord. Fr. Cowan's mother, Margaret, resided with him in the rectory.
- 2 September 1934 – Bishop William Hafe dedicated Our Lady of the Annunciation church. Rev. Arthur Quinn of New York sang the Mass and Fr. Thomas McDonnell of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith preached the sermon. A motion picture was made of the ceremony for use in Propagation of the Faith talks.
- April 1936 – A statue of the Blessed Mother arrived at Our Lady of the Annunciation to be placed over the front entrance. The statue was another gift from the Annunciation Branch of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith.
- 1940 – Fr. Cowan held the responsibility of eight Catholic missions in six different counties. The missions under the custodial care of Our Lady of the Annunciation were Badin, Concord, Kannapolis, Gold Hill, New London, Mt. Pleasant, Norwood, and Troy.
- September 1954 – Our Lady of the Annunciation recorded 92 parishioners.
- 31 July 1964 – Our Lady of the Annunciation experienced growth and had 153 registered parishioners.
- 13 April 1966 – Due to the poor health of Fr. Cowan, Fr. (now Msgr.) Anthony Kovacic was appointed Administrator of Our Lady of the Annunciation while Fr. Cowan remained in residence at the church. Except for a brief period during 1946-1947, Fr. Cowan served Our Lady of the Annunciation since its establishment in 1934. He was their pastor for 32 years.
- 4 October 1967 – Bishop Vincent Waters offered Mass at Our Lady of the Annunciation and blessed the newly constructed Education/Social Hall.
- 3 December 1968 – Fr. James A. Cowan died at the age of 80.
- 9 September 1969 – The parish of Albemarle registered 96 families, a total of 288 parishioners. Also, under its tutelage are 40 Catholic Students from nearby Pfeiffer College.
- 31 July 1971 – Constructed on the same site as the original church, Bishop Waters dedicated the new expanded Our Lady of the Annunciation church.
- 25 March 1984 – Bishop Michael Begley offered the Golden Jubilee Mass for Our Lady of the Annunciation church. Pastor Fr. Carl Del Giudice and other former pastors of the parish celebrated the sacred liturgy as well.
- January 1988 – Bishop John F. Donoghue designated Our Lady of the Annunciation as an indulgenced church for the 1987-1988 Marian Year Celebration.
- February 1990 – Our Lady of the Annunciation took over custodial care of Our Lady of the Americas mission, Biscoe. In July 2007, Our Lady of the Americas was elevated to parish status.

Annulments in context

rest of parish life?

In September, candidates in the diaconate formation program hope to discover that. The program is introducing a new class in advocacy to prepare the deacon candidates to assist parishioners with the annulment process.

Along the way, they will discover that annulments can relate to almost every area of parish life.

* Baptism: At least one godparent must be an active practicing Catholic in full communion with the Church, which means they must be in a valid marriage. If the Catholic sponsor is divorced and remarried, an annulment is needed.

* Marriage: Any previous marriage of either party, Catholic or not, requires an annulment.

* RCIA: Married people who were previously divorced need an annulment of the earlier marriage to be received into the Church and admitted to the sacraments.

* Liturgy: Ministers of the Church are required to be in full communion with the Church, which means they must be in a valid marriage. If they are divorced and remarried, an annulment is needed.

* Ministry to the Sick: If not near death, individuals who desire anointing of the sick and who are currently married would need an annulment for any previous marriage.

* Religious education: Catechists, like all ministers of the Church, are required to be in full communion with the Church and, if married, in a valid marriage.

Fresh approach

Deacon candidates have long been taught the portion of the Code of Canon Law that addresses marriage.

However, the application of the canons to real life situations in Advocacy is an innovation that will better equip them to serve their parishioners after ordination.

In another innovation, the wives of the candidates have also been invited to participate in the advocacy class and to become advocates in their own right.

The diocese currently has two wives of deacons who serve as advocates.

Novice advocate Nancy Kopfle is the wife of deacon John Kopfle of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte.

Veteran advocate Catherine Shaw, wife of advocate and deacon Vincent Shaw, serves the St. Mary and St. Benedict parishes in Greensboro.

The Diocese currently has 14 deacons who are also advocates for 26 parishes and missions.

More about annulments

The tribunal, or church court, handles the marriage nullity process, working under a set of procedures and laws established as part of Canon Law, the universal law of the Church.

An advocate is someone who helps those seeking annulments to develop their cases.

The purpose of a nullity process is to determine whether or not an indissoluble marriage bond was created when the parties entered their marriage. It must be proved clearly and without doubt that this enduring bond was not established in order to declare the marriage null.

This proof must focus on grounds of nullity recognized by church law and must apply to the marriage from its very beginning. Grounds are the provisions in the law of the church that identify the circumstances under which a marriage may be invalid.

The tribunal receives around 300 new requests for annulments each year.

When handling the nullity process, the tribunal works under a set of procedures and laws set forth by the Code of Canon Law.

The annulment process

The first step for a petitioner considering a marriage case is to approach the local parish priest or pastoral assistant, who will assist the petitioner in completing a preliminary questionnaire for submission to the diocesan tribunal. This questionnaire provides the tribunal staff an overview of the marriage.

Next, the tribunal contacts the other party to the marriage – the respondent – who has a right to be heard. A questionnaire is sent to the respondent to request information regarding the alleged grounds of nullity.

The petitioner is expected to inform witnesses that they will be contacted by the tribunal, and request their prompt cooperation. Each witness is sent a questionnaire based on the grounds in the case and a cover letter explaining how to proceed. The testimony is to be given under oath, and witnesses have the option of signing the completed questionnaire before a Catholic priest or pastoral minister or before a notary public.

A favorable decision in the diocesan tribunal must be reviewed by the Court of Appeals of the Province of Atlanta, Ga.

Upon completion, the petitioner is notified and sent a copy of the final decree.

Want to serve as an advocate?

The Advocate Training Program was created in 2004 and is open to any parishioner wishing to help those seeking annulments.

An advocate for each party to an annulment is required by the Code of Canon Law. Since 2007, every parish and mission in the Diocese of Charlotte has been assigned at least one advocate.

Advocate training is offered online. Anyone interested in becoming an advocate may contact tribunal advocate Joy Barnes at (704) 370-3343 or jimbarnes@charlottediocese.org.

A call to end wars

German pope recalls Holocaust, other 'barbarities' of World War II

BY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VITERBO, Italy (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI said the memory of the Holocaust and other "barbarities" of World War II should lead people to press for an end to contemporary conflicts around the globe.

The world's religions in particular have a duty to fight against violence and extremism, the pope said Sept. 6 during a visit to Viterbo, Italy. It was the second time the German pontiff had recalled the 70th anniversary of the start of World War II, which began when Germany invaded Poland Sept. 1, 1939.

The pope's remarks came in a long-distance greeting to participants of an interreligious peace encounter in Krakow, Poland.

"We cannot help but remember the dramatic facts that provoked one of the most terrible conflicts in history, causing millions of deaths and so much suffering to the Polish people; a conflict that saw the tragedy of the Holocaust and the extermination of other groups of innocents," the pope said.

"The memory of these events impels us to pray for the victims and for those who still bear the wounds in their bodies and their hearts. It should also be a warning against repeating these barbarities and lead us to intensify efforts to build a lasting peace in our own time, which is still marked by conflicts," he said.

The pope said the key to future peace was the ability to transmit to younger generations a culture and style of life that is marked by love, solidarity and respect for others.

In this sense, he said, the world's religions must promote forgiveness and reconciliation against the "violence, racism, totalitarianism and extremism that disfigure the image of man's Creator" and lead to attitudes of hatred and contempt.

At the Vatican earlier in the week, the pope decried the absurdity of war and called on people to embrace forgiveness, peace and reconciliation.

Speaking in Polish to pilgrims attending his general audience Sept. 2, the pope said that the "human tragedies and the absurdity of war remain in people's memories." The pontiff was 12 years old and lived in Bavaria, in Germany, when the war began.

"Let us ask God that the spirit of forgiveness, peace and reconciliation pervades the hearts of all people," he said. "Europe and the world today need a spirit of communion," which should be built upon Christ, his Gospel, charity and truth, he said.

Two days after German troops invaded Poland from the north, south and west, France and Great Britain declared war on Germany. The war ended in 1945, leaving more than 60 million people dead, most of them civilians.

Delegates representing several religions visit Auschwitz-Birkenau in Poland to pray for peace Sept. 8. Up to 1.5 million people, mostly Jews, died in the former Nazi death camp during World War II. Among the Catholics participating in the service was Polish Cardinal Stanislaw Dziwisz, Pope John Paul II's former personal secretary and the current archbishop of Krakow.

Emphasizing evangelization

Pope encourages strong witness of Gospel, commitment to charity

BY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VITERBO, Italy (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI encouraged Italian Catholics to strengthen the witness of the Gospel in all areas of life, from personal charity to politics.

The pope made the remarks Sept. 6 during a visit to Viterbo, a city near Rome where cardinals instituted the first papal conclave more than 700 years ago.

At an outdoor Mass at a sports complex, the pope told a crowd of some 20,000 people that announcing and witnessing the faith remains a task for every era of history. It begins with the responsibility to listen to God's word and discern his signs, he said.

"The most immediate sign of God is certainly attention to one's neighbor," he said. The charitable activity of the church and its members is an essential expression of faith and an important service to modern society, he said.

The pope said lay Catholics, in addition to doing volunteer and charity work, should also witness the faith in other areas, including service to political action.

"The seasons of history go by, the social contexts change, but what doesn't change and disappear is the vocation of Christians to live the Gospel in solidarity with the human family, in step with the times," he said.

The pope said the desert, popular in the Bible as a place of spiritual drama and difficulty, has relevance in contemporary times.

"The most profound desert is the human heart, when it loses the capacity to listen, to speak and communicate with God and with other people. Then one becomes blind because, unable to see reality, ears are closed against those who cry for help, and the heart is hardened in indifference and selfishness," he said.

While in Viterbo the pope visited a Marian sanctuary and met with the cloistered nuns who reside there. They prayed together to Mary for the special intention of modern families that are "divided and in crisis."

Later the same day, he traveled to the nearby town of Bagnoregio, where he venerated the relics of St. Bonaventure, a 13th-century Franciscan theologian and a doctor of the church.

Addressing townspeople in the square outside the cathedral, the pope underlined St. Bonaventure's incessant search for God and his ability to see and praise the beauty of creation. The saint understood God as the source of such beauty, he added.

"How useful it would be if today, too, people discover the beauty and value of the created world in the light of divine goodness and beauty!" he said.

Are you a lapsed Catholic?

St. Francis de Sales gathers lost sheep

Pretend you were a lapsed Catholic when St. Francis de Sales (1567-1622) was alive. If you were, he would hunt you down like a shepherd in hot pursuit of a prized sheep.

Remember the words of Jesus, "There will be more joy in heaven over one sinner who repents than over 99 righteous people who have no need of repentance" (Lk 15:7).

Well, St. Francis de Sales truly believed that.

Francis was born to a wealthy family at the castle of Sales in Savoy. He was a brilliant student who had ambitious plans for his future. He was dreaming of becoming a successful businessman. However, in his heart there was a yearning he could not seem to quiet, so he was also struggling with the idea of becoming a priest.

Eventually God won, and Francis entered the seminary. As he deepened in faith, he realized that God had a special plan for him. After his ordination in 1593, his bishop sent him to Geneva with a specific mission in mind. It seems that Catholics there were leaving the church in droves.

Some were simply attracted by the world, but others were drawn to the powerful preaching of John Calvin. The Catholics who remained were listless and dwindling in number.

Francis prayed mightily about it and then devised a plan to travel by foot from door to door, speaking about the faith to anyone who would listen. For months he met only jeers and ridicule, but he persevered.

As time went on, more and more people responded positively to his message.

Francis also learned to use the power of the pen to expand his outreach. He wrote a series of pamphlets about the faith. Because of his clarity and conviction, he touched hearts. Each pamphlet was designed to lead to the next, until they all added up to a complete explanation of the Catholic faith.

Francis was not only the writer; he was also the publisher and marketing director. He even performed the delivery service. He would slip the printed tracts under the doors in all the villages around him. Then he began preaching on street corners.

As his fame spread, the crowds grew larger. Within four years he achieved amazing results. The thousands that had left the church began returning. They not only came back; they began practicing their faith with a new fervor. The impact of his ministry became known throughout Europe.

In 1602 Francis was made the bishop of Geneva. His most famous book, "Introduction to the Devout Life" (1608), is still in circulation today.

St. Francis died in 1622 and was canonized in 1665. He became a doctor of the church in 1877, and in 1923 Pope Pius XI made him the patron saint of writers and journalists.

Those of you who are interested in evangelization would do well to follow his example. He understood that the most effective way to win back souls to God is to go directly to the target audience.

Don't wait for them to come to you.

Simple Realities

Setting a few parameters for the health care debate

Guest Column

BY JOE TOWALSKI
CNS COLUMNIST

The national health care reform debate is moving into a critical phase. Lawmakers have talked about various proposals for months and heard an earful from constituents. Now the time for action — whether to adopt changes to the system, or once again forgo reform for the foreseeable future — is fast approaching.

To be sure, making the right decisions won't be easy. The bills under consideration are lengthy and deal with complex issues. There is no simple cure for what ails a health care system suffering from inefficiencies, high costs and barriers to access for too many Americans.

And there is still a lot to debate and decide: Should a new health care approach feature a government-sponsored option? Nonprofit co-ops? Tort reform? Some of the above? None of the above?

The ongoing debate can be fruitful and lead us to make the right choices if we are willing to acknowledge some simple realities and establish a few parameters for the discussion from this point forward.

First, we need to acknowledge that our current health care system is broken and needs to be fixed as soon as possible. It's a scandal that 47 million Americans can't afford or can't access the health insurance they need. It demeans their human dignity. And it drives up the cost of health care for everyone else when visiting the local hospital's emergency room becomes the only option for a doctor visit. Many of us are only a job loss away from being in the same situation.

Second, we shouldn't buy into the false notion popular in some circles that the church is only interested in the abortion issue regarding reform efforts. Yes, we Catholics are adamant that reform efforts don't expand access to abortion. Yes, we believe that the health care system must respect human life from conception to natural death. But that's what a health care system should do: protect and nurture human life, not destroy it.

The church, rightfully, also has been a proponent of efforts to provide quality health care for everyone, including the poor and immigrants. That, too, is an essential part of any reform package, and we need to be vocal about reminding lawmakers that universal care and universal respect for life are twin pillars on which reform must rest.

Third, as we make our views known, we must be civil and take care not to demonize those with whom we disagree. Town-hall meetings where attendees shout down lawmakers and others in the audience are examples of disrespectful and boorish behavior. These actions result in a lot of fire — as well as media coverage — but shine little light on the issues at hand.

As Catholics who believe in everyone's God-given human dignity and Jesus' command to love our neighbor as ourselves, we are called to a higher standard. We should assume that others — like us — are motivated by a sincere desire to do the right thing. And, when we disagree with others, those disagreements should be rooted in facts and logic, not misplaced anger and emotion. We need to show others that civil conversations and debates are still possible.

At the same time, it's clear that many people are very frustrated by what they perceive as a lack of candor on the part of lawmakers to truly listen to their constituents' views and disclose their own views on the particulars of health care reform. Lawmakers need to be clear, honest and offer the same kind of respectful listening that they expect from voters.

Finally, let's not forget that we must look beyond our own personal situations as they relate to the current debate.

The command to love our neighbor means that we must be concerned not only about our own family, co-workers and close circle of friends, but also our family members in faith whom we don't know personally: the uninsured parents with a child suffering from a serious medical challenge, the immigrant newcomer who is working two jobs with no health insurance to help put food on his family's table, the young single woman facing an unplanned pregnancy who needs help to make life-giving choices.

Doing what's right for these people — as well as the people we know — is what it means to be concerned for the common good, to help establish God's kingdom on earth.

That's one of the ideas we as Catholics are called to bring to this health care debate.

Are we up to the challenge?

Welcoming the Deaf

For many years I have interpreted the Mass at a local church and one in Maryland. Not only have I interpreted the regular Mass, I have even interpreted the entire Christmas Midnight Mass including the musical portion prior to the Mass.

About five years ago statistics said that in Rowan County alone there were 11,730 persons 18yrs and up with hearing loss (both deaf and hard of hearing).

I have experienced priests in Maryland saying that with an interpreter

Letters to the Editor

the congregants do not watch him as they should.

There have been parishioners who have complained that having an interpreter is distracting and that the deaf person/s should not sit only in the front pew.

Churches need to have induction loops for the hard of hearing. After Mass I make sure that I am available to interpret between the deaf person and any other parishioner but very seldom does anyone approach the deaf person.

A moral obligation demands respect

Discussing Catholic points in U.S. healthcare reform

Let's make a distinction between sports talk radio and the debate on a vital moral issue — health care reform — before Congress resumes consideration of a myriad of health reform bills later this month.

There is room for vigorous debate on the topic, both sides agree, but what's been happening through the summer months is not vigorous debate. It has been a time full of hyperbole, name-calling, and a time when volume seemed to replace logic.

The gravity of the topic deserves a much higher level of discourse.

"This is, quite literally, a life-and-death issue, about human pain and suffering, and about the proliferation of immoral practices carried out by insurance companies," wrote Michael Jeffries, a columnist for the Manchester Guardian.

"Just as it is important to speak about quality control and efficiency, it is critical to frame health care reform as a moral obligation — as something that we owe to each other as Americans and as parents of future generations."

And that is exactly what the Catholic bishops of the United States are doing.

"Genuine health care reform that protects the life and dignity of all is a moral imperative and a vital national obligation," said the chairman of the bishops' Committee on Domestic Justice and Human Development, Bishop William F. Murphy of Rockville Centre, N.Y., in a July 17 letter to Congress.

Accepting as fact that adequate health care in support of human dignity is a moral question, it is important to insist that it be treated with the respect a grave matter deserves. There should be valid concern about end-of-life issues, but not the caricatures of "death panels."

Those who equate health care reform with Nazism show an appalling lack of understanding both of history and of rhetoric.

"We are in danger of turning evil itself into a triviality when we draw on the images of Hitler's Germany to make political points in debates that are in no way comparable to the terrors of Nazism," Pulitzer Prize historian Jon Meacham wrote recently in Newsweek.

Those demonizing health insurers are no less guilty of a lack of charity.

A free and vigorous debate is not name-calling, angry shouts and incendiary signs. It should be a reasoned discussion as proponents of an issue use logic under an assumption of good faith.

Health care reform is complex, with terminology more common to insurance policies and medical texts. For that reason, it is imperative to understand our Catholic position.

Equally important is knowing what is not the church's position.

For example, the church's position on stem-cell research has been

Consider This

BY STEPHEN KENT
CNS COLUMNIST

misrepresented as opposition to all stem-cell research, thus denying assistance to thousands of suffering people. But the church is not against all stem-cell research. It is in opposition to embryonic stem-cell research, which requires the destruction of life. It favors research involving the use of adult stem cells and umbilical cord cells.

The bishops established four criteria for comprehensive health care reform: respect for human life and dignity, access for all, pluralism and equitable costs. An acceptable bill must exclude mandated coverage for abortion and require continuance of existing laws that restrict abortion funding.

The heat of the summer sniping and name-calling should give way to cooler temperatures and temperaments of the fall and a vigorous presentation of positions conducted well within the bounds of rhetoric and the spirit of charity.

Take time out daily to hear God's voice, says pope

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — People need to carve time out of their busy day to dedicate to silent prayer or meditation in order to hear what God has to say, said Pope Benedict XVI.

The faithful also have to remember not to become completely caught up in their daily activities and concerns, forgetting that Jesus should be the focus of their lives, he said at his weekly general audience Sept. 9.

Continuing a series of audience talks about influential Christian writers from the Middle Ages, the pope focused his catechesis on the life of St. Peter Damian, an 11th-century monk, cardinal and doctor of the church.

Monastic life offers an important lesson to all Christians — that it is important to learn how to achieve an inner silence in order to listen to God's voice, he said.

St. Peter Damian taught that Christ must be at the center of monastic life; Christ must be heard in one's voice, be served in one's life and felt in one's heart, the pope continued.

All Christians, not just contemplative religious, must cultivate this intimate union with Christ, Pope Benedict concluded.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In our catechesis on the Christian writers of East and West, we turn to Saint Peter Damian, who was born in Ravenna at the beginning of the eleventh century and became an accomplished writer and Latinist. His fine sensitivity made him excel in poetry and enabled him to see the world as a parable, full of symbolic references to the supernatural, leading him to embrace as a mature man a monastic vocation at Fonte Avellana, founded not long before. He was fascinated by the salvific mystery of the cross of Christ and promoted as the fullness of Christian living a form of monasticism noted for its austerity. Nourished by a mystical understanding of Scripture, Saint Peter Damian enjoyed precise theological insights especially into the mysteries of the Holy Trinity, our union with Christ, and the Church as a communion, from which he derived practical advice for living in charity with others. In 1057 he accepted the office of Cardinal Bishop of Ostia and assisted the Pope with courage and dedication in the reform of the Church of his time. After ten years he was granted his wish to return to his monastery and continued to serve the Church with prayer and action until his holy death in 1072. May the example and intercession of Saint Peter Damian, my dear Brothers and Sisters, inspire and renew us in our love of Christ and his Church.

I especially hate it when I am moving somebody else's stuff. But that is what I was doing. Schlepping boxes around in the late-August heat and packing stuff up for the "final move."

A friend and former parishioner had died. He appointed me his executor.

It was logical. He had no children. He had never married. He was not particularly close to his siblings. In the last few years of his life I had become his counselor and friend. Since I was both a lawyer and his priest, he figured I would know what to do.

Being an executor is a melancholy duty. When I got the call that my friend had died, I made arrangements for his funeral. I drove three hours to his house and closed it up. I cleaned out the fridge. He had been in the hospital for six weeks, so some stuff was pretty ripe.

After the funeral, I was back at the house for a couple of days. I hired a lawyer and filed the necessary papers with the court. I met with a real estate agent and started the ball rolling on selling the house.

I closed up his bank accounts and shut off his cell phone. I secured the car and arranged for its sale. I filed a change of address card and notified the neighbors and the homeowners' association.

Finally I arranged with an estate auction house to come the next day to take away all his furniture, art and nice things such as china and silverware.

Just before the auction house truck came, I started emptying out drawers. All the little things people collect poured out.

I packed up family photos and other personal items for his sister. I selected a photo of him for myself. Then I tackled the clothes closets. So much stuff!

It all went to the local charity thrift store.

As I sat on a folding chair sorting all this stuff, I was overcome with sadness for my friend. His things counted for nothing in the end.

I believe what he wanted was friendship, and he had outlived his closest friends.

I never realized how important it was to him that we occasionally went out to dinner or talked on the phone.

In just two days time, all the physical evidence of his existence was gone. The accumulated stuff of a lifetime vanished!

As I turned the key in the empty house, I thought of the poet John Keats' epitaph: "Here lies one whose name is writ in water."

We leave little evidence of ourselves.

I know my friend lives on in God's sight. But still it was so sad.

In the end, the stuff we collect matters nothing. Strangers will take it away.

What really matters is friendship.

What really matters is the bond with other people.

What really matters is love.

SPIRITUAL SOLDIERS

Cpl. Andrew Roy Jr., of Holy Family Parish in Watertown, N.Y., gives a lesson on Catholic teaching to troops stationed at the Forward Operating Base Airborne in Afghanistan. Roy said he had struggled with understanding and embracing his faith for most of his life until this deployment to Afghanistan with the U.S. Army's 10th Mountain Division.

Spiritual oasis in an Afghan desert

Soldier's faith takes root, spreads during deployment in Afghanistan

FOB AIRBORNE, Afghanistan (CNS) — On a recent starlit night in eastern Afghanistan, five U.S. soldiers and two civilians spread out under a tent, sitting on leather couches and wooden plank benches to discuss the doctrine of the real presence in the Eucharist.

Cpl. Andrew Roy Jr. of Holy Family Parish in Watertown, N.Y., read aloud from a computer outline on a flat-screen television in the chapel at FOB Airborne. He reviewed the history of Gnostics and councils that have long debated the real-presence doctrine of the Roman Catholic faith.

In May, this stocky soldier with clear blue eyes and a forceful voice was not wearing a wooden rosary over his chest as he was that night. Instead, he was in the throes of a spiritual journey that led him from being agnostic to a devout Roman Catholic.

In the desert of Afghanistan, his spiritual fervor offers an oasis of religious discussion and dialogue about faith and the church.

Roy, who never made it past his first Communion to confirmation until adulthood, struggled with understanding and embracing his faith for most of his life until this deployment to Afghanistan with the U.S. Army's 10th Mountain Division.

"In May, he was bringing in books to disprove God's existence, and now he's willing to fight for it," said the Rev. Jeff Masengale, a captain and a Southern Baptist chaplain.

Over a three-month period, discussions between the two men led Roy back to his Catholic roots. Recently, he decided to turn his private research into a catechism class for other soldiers on this forward operating base, or FOB.

Three Protestants and three Catholics came to Roy's class. They peppered him with questions as he moved through his outline, sharing the debate within the early church on the concepts of real presence and transubstantiation.

Despite the divisions of church doctrine and tradition represented by this group, the discourse was civil and full of laughter.

"When you come from various Protestant backgrounds, there's a lot of stereotypes," said Spc. Gregory Gates, a nondenominational Christian from Youngstown, Ohio.

"Actually what I've been learning is that these stereotypes aren't necessarily so. It's good to hear from someone who's actually Catholic what the Catholic Church really believes, and it has encouraged me to study the Bible more and search for myself what I believe is true in the word of God," he said.

"If now they are forming questions about the faith — maybe they will come to Catholicism," said Roy.

So each night, Roy closes with the following prayer:

"Thank you Lord for these people who are interested in learning (more about you). Despite our differences, we thank you that we all believe in one Savior."

And before the night is over, he encourages participants to bring more students.

"You'll get a free catechism," he jokes. "How can you go wrong?"

USCCB, CHA officials encouraged by Obama's address on health care

WASHINGTON (CNS) — President Barack Obama's pledge to continue the ban on the use of federal funds for abortion and to maintain conscience protections for health care workers in any health reform legislation was welcomed by two officials of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and the president of the Catholic Health Association.

Speaking with Catholic News Service Sept. 10, hours after Obama addressed a joint session of Congress and a nationwide television audience, Kathy Saile, director of domestic social development in the USCCB Department of Justice, Peace and Human Development, said the president's address offered an encouraging sign that the administration has been listening to concerns raised by the bishops and pro-life organizations about abortion funding in any reform legislation.

Citing the bishops' long-standing belief that all Americans must have access to quality, affordable health care, Saile said the president's speech must be followed up with the appropriate changes in legislation currently pending in both houses of Congress.

As currently written, the leading piece of legislation in the House, America's Affordable Health Choices Act of 2009, known as H.R. 3200, allows for federal funding of abortion. Language continues to be worked on in Senate reform measures.

Richard Doerflinger, associate director of the bishops' Secretariat of Pro-Life Activities, echoed Saile in a statement released Sept. 10.

"We believe that incorporating essential and long-standing federal laws on these issues into any new proposal will strengthen support for health care reform," Doerflinger said, pledging to work with Congress and the White House to ensure that current legislation is amended.

Long-term clean-energy initiatives

Vatican installs solar collectors for heating, cooling buildings

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — As part of its long-term clean-energy initiatives, the Vatican has installed high-tech solar collectors to help heat and cool its buildings.

The installation came about a year after the tiny city-state turned the roof of its Paul VI audience hall into a giant solar-power generator to produce energy for the Vatican's power grid.

The new solar collectors will help the Vatican diversify the ways it develops its renewable energy program, said Pier Carlo Cuscianna, director of technical services for Vatican City.

In an article that appeared Sept. 11 in the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, Cuscianna said the new solar collectors are on three different rooftops inside Vatican City.

Two-inch-wide tubes snake across 110 solar collectors, which cover 3,767 square feet, he said.

Through a process called absorption cooling, the hot thermal energy produced can be used to cool buildings in the summer, he said.

Using the sun's intense heat in the summer to produce cool air inside a building is "a very valuable application" available with today's new technologies, he said.

Cuscianna said the new heating and cooling units are reliable, quiet and compact and require very low maintenance. With their use, about 80 tons of carbon dioxide emissions will be avoided and another 80 tons of petroleum will be saved each year, he said.

CHARLOTTE — A monthly Respect Life Mass will be celebrated Sept. 26 at 9 a.m. at St. Ann Church, 3635 Park Rd. Following Mass there is exposition of the Blessed Sacrament and the opportunity to pray a rosary at a local abortion facility. The morning will conclude with Benediction. "Brothers and sisters in humanity"

Vatican says Christians, Muslims should unite against poverty

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Christians and Muslims share concern and compassion for those suffering in poverty and can find common ground to work toward eradicating both the causes and the problems it creates, the Vatican said.

In its traditional message to Muslims at the end of Ramadan, the Islamic holy month of fasting, the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue called attention to poverty as "a subject at the heart of the precepts that, under different beliefs, we all hold dear."

As "brothers and sisters in humanity," the letter said, people of both faiths can help the poor "establish their place in the fabric of society."

The letter, published Sept. 11, was signed by Cardinal Jean-Louis Tauran, president of the pontifical council, and Archbishop Pier Luigi Celata, council secretary. It emphasized that in addition to the suffering endured by the poor the consequences of poverty on society as a whole are dire and require the attention of all people of faith.

"We all know that poverty has the power to humiliate and to engender intolerable sufferings," the letter said.

"It can provoke hostile actions using any available means, even seeking to justify them on religious grounds."

This is why "confronting the phenomenon of extremism and violence necessarily implies tackling poverty through the promotion of integral human development," the letter said, citing a concept promoted by Pope Paul VI in his 1967 encyclical, Populorum Progressio.

The origin of poverty lies in "the lack of respect for the innate dignity of solidarity and calls us to a global solidarity," the letter said.

As believers, it continued, Muslims and Christians can work together "for a just and durable solution to the scourge of poverty," while also "reflecting on the grave problems of our times."

The letter acknowledged that steps had been made in improving Christian-Muslim relations and that in many parts of the world "we have passed from tolerance to a meeting together, beginning with common lived experience and real shared concerns."

This year's Ramadan period began Aug. 21 and was to finish Sept. 19.

Pope to meet artists in Sistine Chapel to rekindle faith-art dialogue

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI has invited hundreds of artists to meet with him in the Vatican in an attempt to rekindle the special historical relationship between faith and art.

More than 500 personalities from the worlds of art, theater, literature and music have been asked to gather with the pope under the legendary Michelangelo frescoes in the Sistine Chapel Nov. 21.

Archbishop Gianfranco Ravasi, president of the Pontifical Council for Culture, said the meeting was to be the first of many initiatives aimed at bridging the gap that has developed between spirituality and artistic expression over the last century or so.

in the sacraments. Paraphrasing a Gospel passage Evans calls himself, "a fisher of little men." He spoke recently with David Hains of The Catholic News & Herald about his ministry and the Eucharistic Congress. His responses have been edited for brevity.

As the name implies, the emphasis of the Eucharist Congress is the Eucharist. How will your presentation reflect that?

The Eucharist is the source and summit of the Catholic faith. We begin with the covenant of creation and then the greatest covenant of all, the sacrifice of the Eucharist. There isn't a concert that goes by that I'm not eucharistic.

Why "The Donut Man," why not "The Cruller Guy," or "The Sticky Bun Dude?"

Donuts make me cry. They are good, but they have something missing. So every concert alludes to a donut which I discovered is an edible object lesson for the state of man. I am harkening back to St. Augustine himself who said there is a God-shaped vacuum in every man that only God can fill. So, as "The Donut Man" I present the Gospel and ask what fills that empty place in us? Well of course it is Jesus Christ who comes to us in the sacraments of the holy Catholic Church. I think it's urgent that children understand which (passages of) holy Scripture elaborate on the core sacraments of the Catholic Church.

How will you present that message to the children at the Eucharistic Congress?

I am looking forward to using music, stories and songs to help children consider the holy Scriptures from the inside out. For example, the parable of the mustard seed is sung by the mustard seed and (the children) are the seed. The story of Daniel and the Lion's den is sung by the Lion and the children are the Lion.

What is it like in the room when you are leading several hundred children in song and storytelling?

It's what gets me out of bed in the morning. Praising God is such a joy; seeing a room full of children, their life and enthusiasm is something that I capture. They come up on stage and help me. They become the wind and the rain, for example, in the parable of the wind and the rain. My presentations live or die by their enthusiastic participation.

I understand "The Donut Man" has a companion.

I do. My little buddy is a puppet named Duncan the talking donut. He is someone who is sweet but he is also a bit of a gadfly who says unspeakable things like, "I don't want to clean my bedroom," "I don't want to be good," and "I don't want to listen." He gives voice to those temptations that we actually have to cope with. I teach the children how to help Duncan to be good by addressing his temptation with the Holy Spirit, the Word of God and the sacraments.

his seminary training at the Pontifical University in his native Mexico in June. Prior to entering the seminary he worked as a lay missionary in Mexico. He also attended Immaculate Conception seminary in Huntington, N.Y.

Carvajal jokingly says that he was encouraged in his vocation by Father Mark Lawlor, pastor of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte. "I asked him to come and bless my home," said Carvajal, "but when he learned how many brothers and sisters I had, he said, 'If you go to the seminary you can bless all of their homes.'"

"I am very grateful to God for his guidance in my vocation," said Carvajal. "I look forward to my new responsibilities."

Carvajal also credits Father Ricardo Sanchez of Our Lady of the Americas Church in Biscoe for guidance in his vocation.

After the Mass, Deacon Carvajal posed for pictures with his proud parents and five of his brothers as well as several cousins, nieces and nephews. Carvajal is the oldest of 15 children; many of his 12 brothers and two sisters live in the Monroe area.

"I want this to be the beginning of a great journey for him," said his father Heron Carvajal through an interpreter. "I feel closer to God today."

The role of the deacon is defined as being a servant. In his homily, delivered especially to Carvajal from a chair in front of the altar, Bishop Jugis emphasized the role of service in the life of a deacon.

"Jesus came not to be served, but to serve," said Bishop Jugis "This is the model for your diaconate: Jesus, the servant of all."

The service of a transitional deacon includes the ministry of the Word, the ministry of the altar and the ministry of charity. Deacon Carvajal assisted Bishop Jugis in the preparation of the gifts of bread and wine that were changed into the Eucharist.

After several months in the transitional diaconate, a candidate for the priesthood petitions the bishop for ordination.

Deacon Carvajal joins transitional deacons David Miller and John Eckert, who were ordained in April. Deacon Carvajal is currently assigned to St. Francis of Assisi Church in Lenoir.

The next priestly ordination for the diocese will take place in June 2010.

North American archbishops join the entrance procession at the opening Mass of the eucharistic congress sponsored by women religious at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington Sept. 11. Following the altar servers are Washington Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl, Cardinal Sean P. O'Malley, archbishop of Boston, and Cardinal Marc Ouellet, archbishop of Quebec. At left is Mother Agnes Mary Donovan, superior of the Sisters for Life.

attended workshops held throughout the day Sept. 12. The theme of the gathering was "Sacrifice of Enduring Love."

Before the opening Mass began on the evening of Sept. 11, hundreds of sisters in many different colored habits filled a large portion of the center pews in the basilica's Upper Church.

Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia, who delivered the homily at the Mass, said the key to understanding the Eucharist is to understand how Jesus was "motivated by a great love for his Father."

There is an "explicit connection between Calvary and Christ's love for his Father," the cardinal said. "We are here to acknowledge the power of his blood, ...the sacrifice our Lord, Jesus Christ offered for us on Calvary."

Concelebrating the Mass with Cardinal Rigali were Cardinal Marc Ouellet of Quebec; Cardinal Sean P. O'Malley of Boston; Cardinal William W. Baum, retired archbishop of Washington; current Washington Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl; Bishop Paul S. Loverde of Arlington, Va.; Washington Auxiliary Bishops Francisco Gonzalez, Martin D. Holley and Barry C. Knestout; and nearly 40 priests.

Archbishop Wuerl said what brings people to the eucharistic congress is the knowledge that the "central work of (the church's) salvation becomes really present" in the Eucharist.

Following the Mass, Carl Anderson, supreme knight of the Knights of Columbus, said the Eucharist is a "living sign of a spiritual reality."

"The Eucharist reaches every corner of every life," he said. "Each of us has some vocation, the vocation to love. If God is love, and the Eucharist is the face of God's love, it makes sense to take the Eucharist inside ourselves because we become more loving."

Anderson also spoke about vocations, and the need to live a joy-filled life so others can see the beauty of the priesthood, consecrated life and married life.

It is "not scandal, but joylessness," that is responsible for the lack of vocations, he said.

Students from Oklahoma State University and the University of Tulsa in Oklahoma flew across the country to attend the eucharistic congress.

Beth Willis, a junior at Oklahoma State University, said she came to see St. Gianna Molla's daughter, Laura Molla. She also came to discern her vocation and grow in faith and love for the Eucharist.

"That is the source and summit of our lives," she said. Participating in Mass and sitting in front of the tabernacle can "be a release," she added.

Joan Nuttall, a junior at University of Tulsa, said she also came to learn more about the Eucharist.

She said she hopes to learn "something about how to apply (the Eucharist) in my daily life." Nuttall added that sometimes after Mass dismissal, she doesn't use the grace given to her in the Eucharist as much as she could. She hoped to learn more about how to do this at the eucharistic congress.

Lynne Jakobowski, whose husband served in the Knights of Columbus honor guard at the Mass, said the Eucharist brings her peace and closeness with God.

Later that evening, families, priests and sisters gathered outside the shrine to pray, sing and watch a fireworks display.

A saint's daughter

Laura Molla's mother sacrificed life for unborn child

BY CAROL ZIMMERMANN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Many people might say their mothers are saints but very few have an official church declaration to back it up.

Fifty-year-old Laura Molla, daughter of St. Gianna Beretta Molla, is one of those people.

Molla addressed participants at a Eucharistic Congress at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington sponsored by the Council of Major Superiors of Women Religious. The theme of the Sept. 11-12 congress was "Sacrifice of Enduring Love."

St. Gianna, often called the "pro-life saint," was canonized in 2004 by Pope John Paul II for having put her unborn child's life before her own. In 1962, when she was pregnant with her fourth child, doctors discovered a large ovarian tumor that required surgery. Although surgical procedures at the time called for removal of her entire uterus, Gianna Molla, 39, insisted surgeons remove only what was necessary and allow her baby to live.

She pleaded with family and doctors: "If you must decide between me and the child, do not hesitate. Choose the child, I insist on it, save the baby."

When she died of an infection — a week after giving birth to Gianna Emanuela — the Italian saint left behind not only her newborn, but also her husband, Pietro, and three other children including Laura, who was just shy of her third birthday.

"We had to work through the shock of losing our mother to find the joy in knowing she is a mother for all," Molla told Catholic News Service Sept. 11, the day before the congress.

Molla, who now works in the furniture business in Italy, said she has learned a lot about how her mother juggled a career as a medical doctor with being a wife and mother.

She described being a saint's daughter as "a great joy and a huge privilege," and added that she often asks herself if she's "worthy of this privilege."

As she sees it, her mother's decision nearly 50 years ago was not an isolated choice. She told participants at the Eucharistic Congress Sept. 12 that her mother's action was "the crowning of a whole life of virtue, a life lived constantly in the light of the Gospel as a young woman, physician, spouse and mother."

When she hears people question the choice to leave behind three children in order to give birth to a fourth, Molla insists her mother was convinced her unborn child had the same right to live as her other children.

"She did not choose death," but "at that moment she chose the life of her child."

EUCCHARISTIC CONGRESS

5TH DIOCESAN EUCCHARISTIC CONGRESS

SEPTEMBER 25-26, 2009

CHARLOTTE CONVENTION CENTER

The Word Became Flesh and Made His Dwelling Among Us

Dear Brothers and Sisters in Christ,

I invite you to participate in our Eucharistic Congress on Friday, Sept. 25 and Saturday, Sept. 26 at the Charlotte Convention Center. During this past year, the Eucharistic Congress committee has devoted many hours of selfless labor to prepare for this joyful event, and I am grateful for the service they have given to the Lord and to the Church.

The Eucharistic Congress is a time of spiritual renewal for the whole diocese. Our faith is strengthened when we come together with our brothers and sisters from across the diocese. The Catholic population of our diocese is only about three percent of the total population, but our coming together at the Eucharistic Congress reminds us that the Church is a big family after all, and that we have many brothers and sisters throughout the 46 counties of the diocese who share our faith.

Our faith and our love for the Lord are strengthened when we join thousands of our brothers and sisters in the eucharistic procession through the streets of Charlotte. Our faith is also strengthened when we join thousands of our brothers and sisters in the eucharistic Holy Hour of adoration and in the Vigil Mass at the close of the congress. We see how marvelously the Eucharist brings us together as one. We, though many, are one body, for we all partake of the one Eucharistic Lord. The Eucharist strengthens our unity as a diocesan family, and makes us grow in faith and charity.

The holy card for this year's congress depicts the mystery of the Annunciation, when the archangel Gabriel announced to the Blessed Virgin that she was to be the Mother of God. This holy card was chosen because it illustrates the theme of the Eucharistic Congress: "The Word Became Flesh and Made His Dwelling Among Us." In the mystery of the Annunciation, the Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us, in the womb of the Blessed Virgin Mary. In the mystery of the Eucharist, the Word continues to make his dwelling among us as he changes bread into his flesh and wine into his blood.

Christ is really and substantially present in the Holy Eucharist. He is truly dwelling among us.

This year's congress begins on Friday evening, Sept. 25 with a concert of sacred music, followed by an inspiring keynote address by Immaculée Ilibagiza. After her talk, exposition of the Blessed Sacrament begins at 10 p.m. for all night adoration at St. Peter Catholic Church.

On Saturday, Sept. 26, we start the day with a Eucharistic procession through uptown Charlotte. The procession goes from St. Peter Church to the convention center. After the procession, Bishop Felipe Estévez, the Auxiliary Bishop of Miami, will deliver the homily during the Holy Hour.

During the day we will hear from an array of very inspiring speakers — Father Tad Pacholczyk, Father Leo Patalinghug, Father Walter Lawson, Immaculée Ilibagiza, Maria de la defensa Michel, Milton Lopez and "The Donut Man." Children, teens, adults and Hispanics have separate programs with messages specifically directed to them. Eucharistic adoration and the sacrament of confession are available during the day.

The day culminates with the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass in the convention center with everyone participating. My brother priests will join me in the concelebration of the Eucharist. This Mass will fulfill your Sunday Mass obligation.

On the following pages you will find more detailed information, as well as a map of the procession route. Other information is available at the Web site www.goEucharist.com.

The Eucharistic Congress is a unique opportunity for us to come together each year in faith and love to proclaim Christ our savior. I look forward to seeing you at this event, which is a great blessing for our diocese.

Sincerely yours in Christ,

+ Peter J. Jugis

Most Reverend Peter J. Jugis
Bishop of Charlotte

Watching and participating in the eucharistic procession

THE ROUTE

The eucharistic procession, led by Bishop Peter J. Jugis, will begin at 9 a.m. on Saturday, Sept. 26, at St. Peter Church, South Tryon Street and First Street. (First communicants with parent or guardian, clergy, religious and banner carriers should gather on Tryon Street south of St. Peter Church at 8:30 a.m.)

The procession will head north on Tryon Street for two blocks, then turn east onto Martin Luther King Boulevard for one block. The procession will then turn south onto College Street to the Charlotte Convention Center.

People of the Diocese of Charlotte are encouraged to line the procession route.

TO PARTICIPATE

As the Blessed Sacrament comes near, it is the custom to be silent and kneel until the monstrance passes.

After the Blessed Sacrament passes by, look for your parish's banner. When your parish banner passes by, you may fall in along with your parish to join in the procession. Once you have connected with your parish group, simply join in the communal prayers or just pray silently as the procession moves along.

When the procession arrives at the Charlotte Convention Center, move as directed by the ushers to enter the main hall. Proceed to the seating area, joining in the singing until the beginning of the Holy Hour.

Frequently asked questions about the Eucharistic Congress

What is the Eucharistic Congress?

The Eucharistic Congress is a teaching and worship event that is centered on the Eucharist, the source and summit of Catholic life.

What is the schedule of events?

The Congress begins Friday evening, Sept. 25, with a program of Sacred Music at the Charlotte Convention Center.

After the program, the Eucharist will be available for adoration throughout the night at St. Peter Catholic Church, 501 South Tryon Street in Charlotte.

The events of Saturday, Sept. 26, begin at 9 a.m. with the Eucharistic Procession forming at St. Peter Church on South Tryon St. Congress attendees are asked to position themselves along the procession route and to join the procession behind the church banners.

Programs or "Tracks" at the Congress are designed for different audiences: General, Hispanic, Children, Middle School and High School. During the day, the Eucharist will be available for adoration in a special chapel in the Convention Center. Priests will be available for confessions all day and there will be an area for vendors selling religious merchandise and offering information about Catholic schools, vocations, etc.

The Congress concludes with a Vigil Mass that begins at 4:30 p.m.

Where does the idea for a eucharistic congress come from?

The first eucharistic congress was held in Lille, France, in 1881 under the direction of Msgr. Gaston De Segur. In time, eucharistic congresses developed to their present international character.

The congress of 1908, which met in London, was the first occasion on which a representative of the pope had entered England since the Protestant Reformation. Two international eucharistic congresses have been held in the United States — Chicago in 1926 and Philadelphia in 1976.

The Diocese of Charlotte celebrated its first eucharistic congress in September 2005.

Who is allowed to take part in the procession?

Everyone.

Leading the procession will be altar servers, first communicants, organized societies such as the Knights of Columbus, clergy and most importantly, the Eucharist.

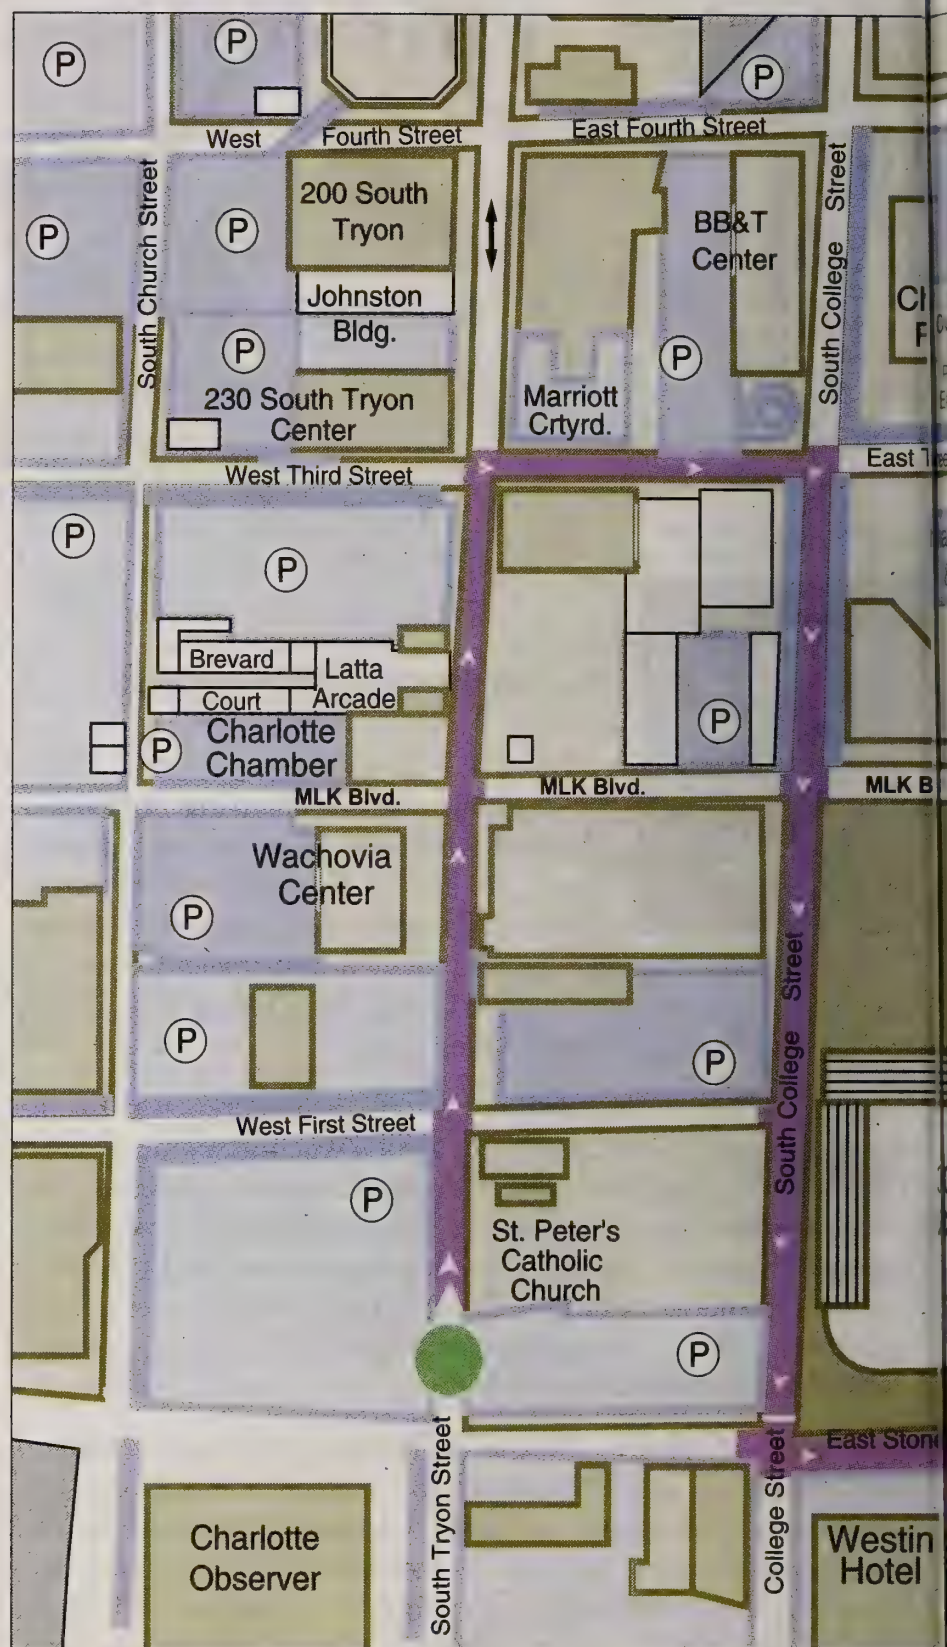

Following the Eucharist will be banner carriers representing churches, schools and organizations in the Diocese of Charlotte.

The faithful are invited to join the procession as the banners for their churches or organizations pass by.

What if I am handicapped or unable to walk in the procession?

The Charlotte Convention Center is handicapped-accessible. In addition, individuals with handicaps and those who choose not to walk in the procession are invited to witness part of the procession on the video screens in the Convention Center. For those who are hearing impaired a sign language interpreter will sign all joint services in Hall A as well as the General Track speakers in Hall A. Seating in the front rows will be reserved for the hearing impaired.

What if it rains?

The Eucharistic Congress will be held rain or shine. The procession may be moved into the Charlotte Convention Center, depending on the weather.

Where can I park?

The uptown area of Charlotte offers ample weekend parking. Visit GoEucharist.com for additional information.

What is being done to provide a secure environment for the children?

The Diocese of Charlotte is committed to the "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People" as adopted by the U.S. bishops.

All adult volunteers at the Eucharistic Congress who will have supervisory contact with children will be required to attend the diocesan training, "Protecting God's Children." Background checks will also be performed on any adult having supervisory contact with children.

Who is speaking at the Eucharistic Congress?

The list of dynamic, inspiring speakers can be accessed by visiting the speakers' page of the Eucharistic Congress Web site at www.goEucharist.com and on page 10 of this issue of The Catholic News & Herald.

Will there be a Mass at the Eucharistic Congress?

Yes. A Vigil Mass will be celebrated at 4:30 p.m. on Saturday, Sept. 26.

Is there a charge to attend the Eucharistic Congress?

There is no charge for any of the events associated with the Eucharistic Congress. It is estimated that staging the congress costs approximately $30 per person who attends. The Diocese of Charlotte is accepting contributions to defray the cost of staging the congress. There will be opportunities to donate at the Congress or donations can be made at www.goEucharist.com.

Will food be served?

The Charlotte Convention Center will offer a variety of foods for sale throughout the day. Lunch will be provided at no charge for the youth attending the Children's Track, Middle School Track and the High School Track. Before and after the congress, attendees may want to take advantage of the many restaurants, hotels and attractions that are within easy walking distance of the Charlotte Convention Center.

Music, universal language in New Orleans

Catholic Vietnamese-American youths learn traditional Vietnamese music

BY BETH DONZE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW ORLEANS (CNS) — Thuy Mai Nguyen worked her 22-string zither like a magician, plucking out precise, chime-like notes with one hand, and using the other to apply varying degrees of pressure on the strings to make the notes reverberate.

The performance, held at Mary Queen of Vietnam Church in New Orleans, was part of a program of traditional Vietnamese music presented in August by 37 of the parish's children, teenagers and young adults.

In addition to showcasing how far the students had progressed on their instruments, the concert was also a poignant farewell to instructors Bo Tran, Uyen-Tram Phan and Hanh Vuong, professional music teachers from Saigon who spent their summer teaching interested parishioners the flute, the bamboo xylophone and the two-stringed Vietnamese fiddle.

"Although I left Vietnam and went halfway around the world, I felt at home here," said Phan, speaking through an interpreter after her students' recital. "I remember a priest making a statement at one of the (non-Vietnamese) churches where we played: 'Music is a universal language that somehow unites all people.' Although our music is different, people can feel it and join in with it. Music is a bridge," she said.

"The knowledge of music among the students here was very high, so in a short period of time I was able to transfer a lot to them," Vuong said, noting that her students — and the city itself — never allowed her to get homesick.

Boats moored along the Mississippi River reminded Vuong of river scenes from her native country, while Phan was struck by how older women at Mary Queen of Vietnam wore the traditional Vietnamese headdress to Mass. The visitors were also cheered by the sight of the many fruits, gourds, herbs and trees that thrive in both New Orleans and Vietnamese gardens.

"The people of New Orleans were very welcoming and encouraging. They really enjoyed our music, so it was very heartwarming," Tran told the Clarion Herald, archdiocesan newspaper of New Orleans.

At an archdiocesan prayer service for racial harmony at St. Maria Goretti Church in New Orleans this summer, the Vietnamese musicians contributed a haunting, Asian-imbued rendition of "The Prayer of St. Francis." They also played on a rotating basis at a Mass each Sunday at Mary Queen of Vietnam.

"The gathering of the Vietnamese Catholics into a parish like (Mary Queen of Vietnam) is something very unique," said Tran, citing his amazement at finding a Vietnamese community outside the borders of his native country still practicing its language and customs. The music teachers were amused by their pupils' American-accented Vietnamese and impressed with the young people's dedication to learning the intricacies of each instrument.

"We have a lot of parishioners who play the piano, guitar, organ and drums, but we really didn't have anyone with knowledge of Vietnamese musical instruments until now," said Father Vien The Nguyen, pastor of Mary Queen of Vietnam. Father Nguyen, who had always wanted to add a music component to his parish's many cultural offerings, sought out the teachers after hearing Tran's students performing at a Filipino refugee camp in 2002.

"People (at Mary Queen of Vietnam) are very surprised and happy that in two summers this level of proficiency could be achieved," Father Nguyen said.

Trading personal gain for personal holiness

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

As I tried to think of good and holy people who had followed the advice of James to seek justice and avoid the selfish greed that would cause us to treat those who work for us unjustly, I came up with a fairly long list of names.

I found many still on the list when I added the requirement, spoken of in the psalm, of scrutinizing our behavior before God, even humbly imploring him to reveal our unrecognized sins, so that we might correct our behavior.

Some were men, some women, some lay people and some priests and deacons, along with a number of religious sisters and brothers.

But particularly prominent were four priests of varied ages who had given up wealth and public acclaim and the privileges that go along with these things.

Each had been highly successful. Two had family money. Another previously had been at the top of his field, attaining an income that allowed him to drive a fancy sports car he had thought would bring him fulfillment but still left him wanting something more.

In this weekend's Old Testament account, the Spirit of the Lord came on the two men who were not present when the Lord made his presence known to Moses and the 70 elders gathered in the tent.

In the same way, God had come to each of these priests, calling them out from their positions of privilege to pursue the higher good of serving God and his people. They responded by forsaking material wealth and the freedom to pursue personal gain so that they might speak God's words to all people, encouraging others to grow in holiness and charity.

Jesus calls all of us to be his servants where we are, to act humbly and justly, to seek the personal holiness that the psalm and the Gospel speak of, to speak and live his words. And when we act as his disciples, he will treasure us as he treasured his first disciples to whom he said, "Anyone who gives you a cup of water to drink because you belong to Christ, amen, I say to you, will surely not lose his reward."

Learning leadership

This past summer, three St. Pius X School eighth-grade students, John Boyle, Joshua Markwell, and Harrison Plemmons, attended the 2009 Leadership University.

The conference, sponsored by youth leadership organization LeadAmerica, was held on the campus of Stanford University in Palo Alto, Calif.

The students learned leadership skills such as team building, collaboration, negotiation, creative thinking and problem solving by practicing with realistic, hands-on scenarios.

The Leadership University aims to inspire and empower young people by instilling in them a sense of purpose, integrity and personal responsibility, according to Chris Salamone, founder and executive director of LeadAmerica.

Over the past 20 years, nearly 80,000 exceptional students from over 51 countries have attended the conferences.

The South Rosary Group of Charlotte is pictured during a devotion to the Blessed Mother in one of the group members' homes Sept. 4.

Rosary groups have become popular among Filipino Catholics throughout the Diocese of Charlotte.

During the monthly celebrations, the Blessed Mother's image is transferred from home to home and stays for one month in the house of the host family. The evening of prayer includes recitation of the rosary and novena devotion to the Santo Niño, a traditional figure of the child of Jesus which originated in Cebu, Philippines. The celebrations also include a reflection on a faith issue as presented by some of the participants.

During the past 10 years more than eight rosary groups have formed among the Filipino Catholic community throughout the diocese. The groups are not formally affiliated with particular parishes, but all the groups collaborate with local pastors for festivals in May and October.

Retreat emphasizes personal relationships with God

Hendersonville, focused on renewal of commitment to the sacraments and the relationship we should have with Jesus through those sacraments.

Featured speaker Augustinian Father Michael P. Sullivan, of the Augustinian Preaching Apostolate at Villanova University, led the retreat in a theme of relationships.

The series was organized around four talks. "To Be Born Again" focused on baptism. "The Healing Love of Jesus" spoke of forgiveness and referred to the sacrament of reconciliation. "The Call to Be Church" included reflections about St. Peter and church leaders, as well as the relationships of marriage. "Our Response to Christ's Call" focused on the sacraments of the Church, particularly the Eucharist.

Father Sullivan said that finding Catholic connections and celebrating beliefs held by the Catholic Church had to development of more lasting and deeper relationships, first with Jesus, then with everyone we meet.

Father Sullivan, who celebrated 40 years in the priesthood on the final day of the retreat, has been working full-time with retreat work and parish renewal preaching since 1980.

"During high school, I went to Fordham Summer School of Catholic Action and admired the priests who were speaking," said Father Sullivan. "I thought that one day I would like to do that, and after eight years as a parish priest, I asked my superiors if they would allow me to speak to groups of Catholics."

During this one-year experience, Father Sullivan was given the opportunity to see if he could do anything with his passion for oration and preaching. It has since grown into a commitment that requires national travel to speak at various parishes almost every week of the year.

With appearances scheduled three years in advance, Father Sullivan is a much-appreciated and in-demand speaker for Catholics eager to hear his humor and share in his enthusiasm for the faith.

Barbara Wilde, leader of the Evangelization Committee at the church was initially disappointed when Father Sullivan's scheduled appearance in February had to be cancelled due to a snow storm in Hendersonville.

The initial disappointment was replaced with elation when the rescheduled event fell on Labor Day weekend. This meant more parish members, who typically reside in Florida during the winter months, would be able to attend.

"It has been a magnificent turnout, the church has been full," said Wilde. "He combines humor and tells us things we've known all our lives, but through these talks, he has us renewing our relationship with Jesus."

Examining each sacrament, participants found themselves changed by the message, while hearing the Word of the Gospels on a personal level.

"There has been something every night," said John DiFiore, a parishioner who attended with his wife. "It gave me a different attitude toward my marriage, toward people, and toward dealing with my anger."

Throughout the retreat, Father Sullivan placed emphasis on renewing the relationship we have with Jesus and bringing that into the relationships we have with others.

"It's been good seeing our church come together in community for a common purpose to deepen our relationship with Christ," said Bob Lange, who leads Bible study classes at the church.

"This has caused us to re-examine where we are in our relationship with God," said Joann Kelly, parishioner and retreat attendee. "We need to build a better relationship with God and that will lead to making our relationships with others better," she said.

"It has opened our hearts about things we don't really talk about during regular Mass," added his wife Nancy Lange. "We are making sense of some of our everyday concerns and it has us thinking more about things beyond the moment."

A reception was held at the conclusion of the retreat. Many of the hundreds who attended joined together for further fellowship. They sought ways to apply the lessons to the ministries throughout the communities in which they are already involved.

"Doing follow-up on this will make a difference in our lives from this time forward," noted parishioner Jim Moon.

"As an Extraordinary Minister of Holy Communion to Hospice, it will be particularly helpful in dealing with others," said Moon. "We will have those relationships both vertically and horizontally, with the Cross and with others."

Benefits from the retreat are expected to continue as Immaculate Conception Church brings the relationship with Christ into a fuller and more complete union within the parish and throughout the community.

"We need to nurture (all) the seeds that were planted," said Capuchin Franciscan Pastor Nick Mormando, pastor. "The graces will flow through this parish."

A witness to faith

Looking back 800 years, religious order sets sights on future

BY ANDREW JUNKER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

PHOENIX (CNS) — Founded in 1210 by former Belgian crusader Blessed Theodore de Celles, the Canons Regular of the Order of the Holy Cross — or, more simply, the Crosiers — has shown an ability to reconstitute itself and adapt to the needs of the times over the past 800 years.

Crosier Father Tom Carkhuff said that in recent years the order has found "a much better balance and appreciation" for the communal life, a boon for the Crosiers.

When looking to move their provincial headquarters to Phoenix in 2007, he said they saw an opportunity to help show locals an example of the religious life.

"When we were looking at the Valley, a big part was the witness of religious life," he said. "That's clearly one of the greatest gifts we and our men bring — whether it's in the jail, in spiritual direction or in weekend liturgies."

And as they look toward the future, the Crosiers hope to promote their religious life even more. They've begun a program called Companions of the Cross, where they train lay people in their charism.

"What I see there are men who are living the life they professed and doing it with joy, and there's going to be enough visibility there of being able to draw people in to pray with us," said Crosier Father Steven Henrich, prior of Phoenix's two Crosier priories.

"I also see us as being a place that will serve immigrants, issues of the elderly, hospice as being a part of the campus," Father Henrich said. "I see it as a large community — Crosiers and laypeople who are working together. We see this as a real opportunity."

Some Crosier brothers and priests gather for midday prayer at their Phoenix priory Sept. 3. Celebrating its 800th anniversary, the Crosier order is looking forward to training laypeople in a new program called Companions of the Cross.

Lessons in brevity

Be concise or you won't be able to tweet

R U my BFFE Catholic? Do you tweet or have a page on Facebook?

I have spoken with young adults who do both: tweet to their friends and family via Twitter and share photos on Facebook. I also know people who won't touch it for various reasons, not the least of which is that it takes an inordinate amount of time to keep up with all the electronic communication.

I tend to fall into this category: It takes too much time to update a Facebook page, understand what someone tweeted or put my glasses on so that I can text or tweet a message to someone else. My fallback position is to use the telephone and call whomever I'm trying to message.

While I readily admit I'm not sure how I lived until cell phones became ubiquitous, I am not drawn to the latest electronic media. I see the dangers of too much or too little information circulating, especially when tweeting allows for no more than 140 characters.

Accepting that no one tweeting or blogging or uploading photos to Facebook is looking for an "A" in English, these media do provide ways to reach out to young people who might otherwise be unreachable by the usual means of evangelization.

Over the years, one piece of truth keeps coming back to me: If you want to talk to people about their faith, listen, learn and preach the Gospel; you can't wait until folks cross the threshold of the church. You have to go where they are and meet them in their own milieu.

Before the electronic explosion, people — especially young people — met at coffeehouses or someplace on college campuses. They still do, but they also depend on their electronic social networking to keep in touch with family and friends.

Although some extreme cases of abuse of Twitter and Facebook make headlines, these media have contributed positively to world communication, especially, for example, during the Iranian elections when people tweeted and texted and e-mailed video of what was really happening at rallies and other gatherings.

In short, the church has an opportunity to use the new electronic media to spread the Gospel, to interact with people, to influence young people in ways they could not have imagined in earlier times.

However, I would add a cautionary note: When the church engages in this kind of communication, whoever sends the messages into cyberspace must know and understand the new media, especially in terms of communicating a truth in very few words or characters.

Lengthy messages won't work with young adults used to transmitting quick, short ideas to each other via our many electronic highways.

Our leaders will have to "write tight" or be unable to use Twitter for evangelization. If I had to boil down a message, a tweet, as it were, it would be: "Jesus lives in you. Believe it. Act on it. Pass it on."

Respond to hatred with love, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — When one's love for others is so great that he or she can respond to hatred with love and forgiveness, God is truly present in that person's heart, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"Only divine love can open our hearts to other people and make us sensitive to their needs, make us think of them as brothers and sisters, and invite us to respond to hatred with love and to offense with forgiveness," the pope said.

The pope led his weekly general audience Sept. 15 in the Paul VI hall before about 8,000 pilgrims from around the world.

Getting to truly know God doesn't happen from reading books, the pope said, "but from spiritual experience and a spiritual life."

To know God, the faithful must first start a journey of "inner purification that begins with a conversion of heart which comes from the strength of faith and love," he said.

Then the faithful must experience "deep repentance and sincere regret for one's sins in order to reach union with Christ, who is the source of joy and peace," he said. With this inner purification and conversion, "the Holy Spirit can really become present in us and guide us," he added.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear brothers and sisters,

Today's catechesis focuses on the life of Symeon, an Eastern monk known as the "New Theologian". He was born in 949 in Asia Minor. As a young man, he moved to Constantinople to embark on a career in the civil service but, during his studies, he was shown a work called The Spiritual Law by Mark the Monk which completely changed his life. It contained the phrase: "If you seek spiritual healing, be aware of your conscience. Do everything it tells you and you will find what is useful to you". From that day on, he made it his way of life always to listen to his conscience. He became a monk and his life and writings, collected afterwards by a disciple, reflect Symeon's deep understanding of the presence and action of the Holy Spirit in the life of all the baptized. Symeon teaches us that Christian life is an intimate and personal communion with God. True knowledge of God comes, not from books, but from an interior purification through conversion of the heart. For Symeon, union with Christ is not something extraordinary, but the fruit of the baptism common to all Christians. Inspired by Symeon's life, let us pay greater attention to our spiritual life, seeking the guidance we need to grow in the love of God.

Blogging and the church

The challenges, opportunities of the new media

I am NOT a dinosaur. Technology-wise, that is. I may not Twitter. I don't have a Facebook page (my wife and kids do); nor do I have my own Web site. At least not yet.

But neither am I completely clueless about today's communications technology. I get all my news and most of my mail on my computer. My cell phone handles the occasional text from my kids. Even my latest book can be downloaded onto Kindle, that newfangled electronic reading device. And I keep up with the doings of the Catholic blogosphere.

Blogs are the 21st-century version of the printing press which give just about anyone with a computer or cell phone the ability to offer (and often inflict on) the world their comments, observations, demands, criticisms and praise.

And far too often without complete information or any sort of filter.

Blogs are part of the new media, a high-tech spider web that is rapidly wrapping its electronic strands around our lives, giving us millions of personal Web pages, podcasts and social networking sites like Facebook, Twitter, Flickr, and MySpace.

Just as the printing press in Benjamin Franklin's Colonial era made every scribbler an opinion-shaper, the Web today has made everyone — for better or for worse — a news commentator.

That has great implications for the church, where the people in the pews historically have had little ability to voice their opinions.

Like traditional journalism, which is responding to new media by offering its own blogs, public reporting and more, the church is finding rich opportunity — and some concern — in the blogosphere. Consider that Boston Cardinal Sean O'Malley's blog is one of many by bishops ... and worthwhile reading as well.

Even the Vatican has taken notice.

The papal spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, said earlier this year that the church recognizes the Internet's "chorus of voices" and that Vatican news often provokes a flurry of comments on the Web, positive and negative.

Despite the new media's "potential for manipulation," he said the church must use it to "keep the truths of the faith in close touch with the emerging culture and the younger, growing generations."

So Vatican officials — including Pope Benedict XVI — have begun using YouTube videos, podcasts and even text messaging as communications tools.

The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Catholic News Service, and many dioceses and parishes have also adopted Facebook, Twitter and blogging.

In the Archdiocese of Chicago, Cardinal Francis E. George offers regular e-mail messages of reflection and Scripture. In addition, there's a weekly blog on the archdiocesan Web site by the cardinal and church officials providing news, viewpoints and other information to help Catholics understand their faith.

Surely the future holds the promise of more electronic connection, not less. For instance, use your cell phone to find the Mass schedule for the nearest church when on vacation.

Or download the prayers of the Divine Office to your iPhone. I've even checked out an "app" to aid daily prayer.

See, I told you I wasn't a dinosaur.

Catholic Charities answer increased need

Annual report cites recession in 10 percent client roll increase

BY DENNIS SADOWSKI

WOODBIDGE, Va. — In a time of recession, Sondra knows she and her four-year-old daughter Hope could be on the street.

Forced to flee an abusive relationship with her husband, Sondra, 45, who asked that her last name not be used, had nowhere to turn. Her time at the emergency shelter was limited. While Sondra had a job as a custodian at a local church, there was no way she could afford an apartment. There was no chance of moving back home, even if she and her husband could reconcile; their home had gone into foreclosure.

Enter St. Margaret of Cortona Transitional Residences in Woodbridge, Va. It's where Sondra and Hope now have a home.

It is a peaceful, cozy and, most importantly, safe place where they can enjoy dinner every evening. It is where they can read and play and learn together.

"I love it here," she said.

MORE THAN A RING

Walter Dray Sr., 92, of Davenport, Iowa, displays his 1940 class ring from the University of Notre Dame. The ring went missing 52 years ago when he lost it in a Wisconsin lake. But he and the ring were reunited after a Wisconsin lawyer discovered it in a collection of jewelry his late father acquired years ago while combing beaches and lakes with a metal detector.

Notre Dame alum reunited with missing class ring after 52 years

DAVENPORT, Iowa (CNS) — Walter Dray Sr. treasured his 1940 class ring from the University of Notre Dame in Indiana. He even wore it in place of a wedding ring, with the blessing of his wife, Peg.

When the Davenport businessman and father of eight lost the ring in 1957 at the bottom of a Wisconsin lake, he was heartbroken, but Peg assured him the ring eventually would be found.

She was right, but unfortunately did not live to see the joy the ring's return would bring to her husband. Fifty-two years after it disappeared, the ring is back on Dray's finger. He believes it's a gift from his late wife, with God's blessings.

"The whole thing is sort of miraculous," Dray said, happily wearing the gold ring with a blue stone.

The reunification of Dray, now 92, and his ring is a story within a story.

Years ago, a Wisconsin retiree named John MacDonald took up a metal-detecting hobby and found numerous pieces of jewelry while combing beaches and lake bottoms. MacDonald died years ago and the jewelry sat in his wife's closet, said their son, Drew MacDonald, a real estate planning attorney in Appleton, Wis.

The younger MacDonald began a quest to find the owners of the long-lost heirlooms that were traceable.

"I help people plan for their family heirlooms to be passed on to the next generation and here I am sitting with a box of heirlooms and I want to get them back to their owners," he told The Catholic Messenger, newspaper of the Diocese of Davenport.

MacDonald found the inscription "Walter Dray Class of 1940" etched on the inside of Dray's ring. He contacted the Notre Dame Alumni Association in early July inquiring about the ring's owner.

"They said, to my surprise, that the gentleman who graduated in 1940 was still alive and they asked if he could give me a call," he said.

Dray called MacDonald July 8.

"He was so incredibly happy you couldn't believe it," MacDonald said. "His faith that he was going to get this ring back was incredible. He was under the complete belief that his wife helped guide it back home to him."

The recovery of Dray's ring gives him a comforting sense of Peg. Longtime members of St. Paul the Apostle Parish in Davenport, the couple had been married 66 years when she died in October 2007.

Dray lost the class ring while swimming and snorkeling with his kids during a family trip to the lake. Dray's children wanted to get a replacement ring for their father, but his wife advised against it.

"Peg said, 'You're going to find that ring. Someday it's going to come back.' And here it is more than 50 years and it came back!" Dray said. "My kids say that's Peg's gift. She wanted to give me a gift. That's the way I feel about it. This was a gift from Peg."

Georgia attorney named to head CLINIC

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A Georgia immigration attorney, Maria Odom, has been named executive director of the Catholic Legal Immigration Network, known as CLINIC.

Odom is the principal attorney and owner of Odom Immigration Law Group in Atlanta and a former partner of the Georgia immigration firms Kuck, Casablanca & Odom and Antonini, Odom & Sullivan. She also has served as a liaison with Immigration and Customs Enforcement, as a member of a committee of the American Immigration Lawyers Association and as a faculty member for continued legal education and seminars for the lawyers' group.

When she assumes the post Dec. 1, she will take over for acting executive director Mark Franken, who has held that position since longtime

Bishop Jaime Soto of Sacramento, Calif., chairman of CLINIC's board of directors, said Odom "brings a heart for the Catholic Church's social mission to migrants and their families." In a CLINIC press release, he noted she has "a strong background in providing legal services to the indigent and proven leadership in executive, financial, human resources and public relations management."

Odom is a native of Puerto Rico who moved to the United States at age 16. After receiving a bachelor's degree in criminology from Florida State University and a law degree from Mercer University, she began her career at the Executive Office for Immigration Review, a government agency, and has held other federal positions including as counsel for the former Immigration and Naturalization Service.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope recognizes foreign troops' role in building peace in Afghanistan

We can never grow accustomed to" deaths and injuries resulting from violence around the world

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI gave assurance of his prayers for civilians caught in the world's conflicts and foreign troops working to promote peace and development.

After praying the Angelus Sept. 20 from the papal summer residence in Castel Gandolfo, the pope said he was deeply saddened to hear news of the deadly roadside bombing in Kabul, Afghanistan, that killed 11 Afghan civilians and six Italian soldiers Sept. 17.

The deaths and injuries resulting from violence around the world "are facts we can never grow accustomed to and that incur strong reprimand and dismay in communities that hold peace and civil coexistence close to heart," he said.

While he had special prayers for the families and friends of the Italian casualties, the pope said he was just as pained over the deaths of other international contingents "who work to promote peace and the development of institutions necessary for human coexistence."

He said he also prayed to God "with a special thought for the dear civilian population."

The pope appealed to everyone to help promote solidarity between nations and oppose "the logic of violence and death by fostering justice, reconciliation and peace and supporting the development of people, starting with love and mutual understanding."

Pope meets with Russian Orthodox official, Vatican says ties improved

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI met with a key official of the Russian Orthodox Church amid signs of a significant improvement in relations.

The Vatican provided no details of the pope's encounter Sept. 18 with Russian Orthodox Archbishop Hilarion, president of the Moscow Patriarchate's Department for External Church Relations. The private meeting took place at the pope's summer residence in Castel Gandolfo.

Archbishop Hilarion was in Rome for five days of meetings and talks with Vatican officials and Catholic groups, at the invitation of Cardinal Walter Kasper, the Vatican's chief ecumenist.

Speaking to Vatican Radio Sept. 17, Cardinal Kasper said the church's relations with the Russian Orthodox had improved appreciably under Pope Benedict, and that the Moscow patriarchate was expected to participate in a major dialogue session with the Vatican in mid-October.

Cardinal Kasper, who is president of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, held lengthy talks with Archbishop Hilarion during his visit. The cardinal said the reduction in tensions from a few years ago was evident in the "very calm conversation" they had about a number of issues, including theological and practical problems.

Perhaps most importantly, the Russian Orthodox will be returning to the plenary meeting of the international Catholic-Orthodox theological commission in Cyprus in October, which will take up the topic of the historic role of the bishop of Rome. The Russian Orthodox delegation walked out of the commission's last plenary session in 2007 in an inter-Orthodox dispute that has since been resolved, Cardinal Kasper said.

Cardinal Kasper said he had suggested that the Orthodox churches form some kind of bishops' conference at the European level that would constitute a "direct partner of cooperation" in such dialogue encounters. This will be a topic of discussion in coming months, he said.

Breaking bread together

Muslims eat after they break their fast during Ramadan in Damascus, Syria, Sept. 16. The Islamic holy month is a time for repentance, prayer, fasting and almsgiving.

Catholics and Muslims share 'iftar'

SIDON, Lebanon (CNS) — Parish priests in South Lebanon said breaking the fast with Muslims during the month of Ramadan means more than sharing a meal.

For many Christians, sitting together for "iftar," the breaking of the fast each evening after sunset, is a chance to get to know others in the community and learn about different customs.

"We go to a lot of iftars," said Maronite Father Elias Asmar. "When we sit down together to break the fast, we get to know each other."

"We learn about their fasting, and they ask about our fasting," the priest said. "We also learn about their diets, their calendars and how they pray. These meals create an atmosphere for dialogue."

A ministry of helping hands

Student club raises the bar for service

WINSTON-SALEM — A rummage sale held Sept. 12 at Our Lady of Mercy School in Winston-Salem raised the bar for student service projects.

More than $2,500 was collected to purchase new computers for the school office, and preschool through the efforts of a student service club called Helping Hands of Mercy.

Helping hands for many ministries

At Our Lady of Mercy School, the entire student body is encouraged to be involved in this service club. The commitment that the students demonstrate through a number of service projects is intended to reflect the hands of mercy.

Projects can involve the entire student body. All classes assemble food baskets for needy families, create and sell luminary kits to benefit the Ronald McDonald House in Winston-Salem, as well as stage bake-offs and send cookies to families of patients involved with Hospice.

Students also collect soap, toothpaste, lotions, shampoo and other toiletries, and assemble them in cosmetic bags and send them to The Battered Women's Shelter in Winston-Salem.

Autism Awareness month is a school-wide effort for which Our Lady of Mercy has scheduled speakers and ongoing education efforts to develop student awareness of the unique needs of children with autism.

Middle school students help facilitate the running of the Forsyth County Special Olympics spring motor activity games. Fourth- and fifth-grade students show their support with sideline cheers.

All children at the school also complete school projects ranging from childcare assistance to grounds keeping.

Helping Hands of Mercy has become involved internationally. Students collect used shoes and lightly used toys for the children of the Dominican Republic. They send them through medical mission teams from Forsyth Hospital to clinics in the Dominican Republic.

Participation in established national service organizations has been included in regular events such as the American Heart Association's "Jump Rope for Heart" competition. Students also participate in the Catholic Social Services "Wee Care" program, through which supplies and gently-used clothes are donated for newborns and their families.

Student commitment

Shirley Shaw, vice principal for Our Lady of Mercy School, recounted the story of the first project the student service group organized.

"Mercy has had a long history of being attentive to the needs of the poor, but in the fall of 2007 they organized and escalated their efforts. The first project involved the collection of satchels and backpacks for children who must be removed from their homes by Forsyth County Child Protection Services.

"On learning that these children are often given a big trash bag in which to collect their belongings when they are taken from their homes, the Mercy Mustangs got busy and collected hundreds of new and gently-used bags," said Shaw.

The effort became so popular as word spread to parents, friends and co-workers of parents that Helping Hands of Mercy continued collecting for months and was able to present the children with more than 400 bags.

"Through the insight of a relative of a staff member, Eastpack even sent a shipment of 30 beautiful new bags which were used at Christmas," said Shaw.

"It is inspiring to see what children can do to aid in the many complex challenges of living in poverty," she said.

Possible sainthood for Knights of Columbus founder

New evidence of miracle could finalize process within two years

BY JACK SHEEDY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

HARTFORD, Conn. — Carl Anderson, supreme knight of the Knights of Columbus, said he hopes that consideration of new evidence of a possible miracle will lead to sainthood for the founder of the Knights of Columbus within two years.

Anderson made the remarks to The Catholic Transcript, the newspaper of the Archdiocese of Hartford, moments before Hartford Archbishop Henry J. Mansell signed documents containing new information gathered by the tribunal that is investigating the cause for canonization for Father Michael J. McGivney.

The documents, which remain secret, were sealed Sept. 22 in the presence of about 50 witnesses and prepared for delivery to the Vatican.

Father McGivney (1852-90) was a priest of the Archdiocese of Hartford who founded the Knights of Columbus in 1882 in New Haven. The cause for his sainthood formally began in Hartford in 1997.

Anderson said the ceremony marked "a very important day for the cause of Father McGivney because it is the conclusion of the medical evidence and assessment (of) the miracle that has been submitted, or what we hope will be considered a miracle, and so this is a very important step for us."

As to how much longer the sainthood process might take, he said, "Well, the fact that the Congregation (for Saints' Causes) has declared Father McGivney to be (a) venerable servant of God (in March 2008) means that it is now on a higher priority track, so we hope, once all the material that has been obtained through this process is assessed and put in a written report to the congregation, that they'll act with expedition. So maybe within two years."

MACS teachers awarded $47,867 in grants

“This is just so exciting!”

— Melissa Kurek

The Books program with fellow teacher Kathleen Murray.

Awards for the 2009-2010 school year were made possible through the Annual Grants for Educational Excellence (GEE) program overseen by the MACS Education Foundation.

This year's event was scheduled on a teacher in-service date so all grant awardees could attend.

On hand to congratulate grant recipients were school principals, members of the MACS board of directors, and staff from the office of Catholic schools for the Diocese of Charlotte, including superintendent of schools Linda Cherry.

Grant winners arrived for individual photos with Bishop Jugis. Afterwards, they gathered for the awards ceremony moderated by Tom Quigley, vice chair for the MACS Education Foundation, and Benne Hudson, grants committee chair for the MACS Education Foundation. The event concluded with a catered luncheon and a group photo.

Many grant programs capitalized upon technological advancements such as the SMART board, a whiteboard that acts as a large touchscreen when a computer screen is projected onto it. Children and teachers can interact with computer programs displayed on the SMART board simply by touching the board to move the mouse or by writing with special “digital” markers.

Teachers Jennifer Cabrera, Socorro Davaz, and Maritza Ortiz use SMART board technology with special software in the Spanish TV Gameshow program at Holy Trinity Middle School.

“Kids can review for tests while they play in the classroom,” said Ortiz, who explained that foreign language vocabulary and grammar skills are reinforced in a fun way.

Some grant programs turn apparent disadvantage into opportunity. Stan Michalski, band instructor who teaches at all the MACS schools, needed resources to provide specialized instruction to students of the tuba, oboe, flute and clarinet. His Artist in Residence program received a grant for bringing members of the Charlotte Symphony Orchestra into MACS schools to provide that specialized instruction.

“The vision is to have one instructor per instrument provide lessons every two weeks,” said Michalski.

Other grant programs get back to the basics, like the Wee Deliver program at St. Gabriel School.

“It’s an intra-school post office,” said Sue Cornish, St. Gabriel teacher.

“We even have street names,” added Mary Ellen Reese, St. Gabriel teacher who partners with Cornish for the Wee Deliver program.

They explained that children learn a “friendly letter format” while corresponding with each other and their parents through handwritten letters. The program also encourages art skills through a stamp design contest.

Mathematics and sciences were well-represented in the grant awards. Annie Jost, teacher at Holy Trinity Middle School, received a grant for her Outdoor Learning Science Garden program.

“Through planting, growing, eating and even naming plants, children learn about the earth through this hands-on outdoor experiment,” said Jost.

Funds will be used to convert land into a garden for the project, which Jost has previously completed with success at another middle school.

The Math in the 21st Century program addresses the persistent question, “when will I ever use this?” through real-world applications of mathematical concepts.

“This program is experiment-based,” said Jeff Prys, teacher at Holy Trinity Middle School.

“It implements a new math program through an investigative approach,” he said.

Prys will partner with teacher Michelle Marcelais for this program.

GEE applications are open to all MACS teachers, who may make proposals for individual awards up to $1,500, and group awards up to $3,000. The program is funded through the MACS Education Foundation, which has raised nearly $5 million and awarded 150 GEE grants for the benefit of more than 6,000 children in MACS schools over the past 16 years.

Standing for life

Life Chains to be held around Diocese of Charlotte

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte will soon line the streets of their cities and towns to show their support for the sanctity of human life.

The U.S. Catholic Church observes October as Respect Life Month, with Respect Life Sunday falling on Oct. 4.

To help kick off the activities during the month and show their support for life, hundreds of parishes in dioceses around the country will be participating in Life Chains.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, parishioners will be standing along the property lines of their respective churches, on city sidewalks and with other church groups in their towns.

People will hold pro-life signs with messages such as "Abortion Kills Children" and "Jesus Forgives and Heals."

"The Life Chain provides an opportunity for all who cherish the gift of life to prayerfully witness to others," said Maggi Nadol, Respect Life program director in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"It is an ecumenical, peaceful, silent effort that has the possibility of touching hearts and changing lives."

LIFE CHAINS IN THE DIOCESE OF CHARLOTTE

Life Chains in the Diocese of Charlotte area will be held Sunday, Oct. 4. Pro-life individuals are welcome to participate in any of the gatherings. Participants should arrive 30 minutes before scheduled start time. Life Chains include:

Caring confirmands

COURTESY PHOTO

Four confirmation candidates from St. Therese Church in Mooresville collected nearly 800 pounds of canned goods for the Mooresville Soup Kitchen. The girls came up with the idea as a way to earn confirmation service hours. They wanted to help others in their community who are less fortunate, so they wrote a letter to their neighbors asking them to donate canned goods or non-perishable food items. The girls dropped off empty grocery bags at houses in their subdivision on Sept. 16. Three days later they collected 73 bags full of food. They delivered the food to the soup kitchen on Sept. 19.

Recession increases Catholic Charities needs

Services such as financial education classes, employment counseling and help with transportation and child care are some of the advantages for residents.

Sondra and Hope are among thousands of people who have turned to local Catholic Charities agencies for housing services when they had nowhere else to go during the current recession.

Increased numbers

The need for housing services like the St. Margaret of Cortona program as well as emergency shelter and permanent housing jumped 12.4 percent in 2008 as the economic recession gained momentum, reported Catholic Charities USA in its 2008 annual survey of services.

Released Sept. 15 during a nationwide teleconference from the agency's Alexandria headquarters, the report shows that Catholic Charities agencies served nearly 600,000 people in need of some type of housing assistance in 2008.

Overall, the 142 Catholic Charities agencies responding to the survey — about 85 percent of the nationwide Catholic Charities network — reported serving more than 8.5 million people in 2008, a 10 percent increase from 2007.

Without being able to offer specifics, Father Larry Snyder, president and CEO of Catholic Charities USA, said the demand for housing and other social services continued to climb as the recession deepened during 2009.

"We can only conjecture that when we get the figures for 2009 it's going to be much, much greater," he said.

Father Snyder also said the recession is causing local Catholic Charities agencies to struggle with "many of the same challenges as our clients." Cuts in government funding for social services coupled with significant losses in donations of cash and goods are causing local agencies to scale back services, reduce hours of operation, lay off staff, freeze wages and implement workdays without pay, he said.

"It is going to continue to put a great stress on our local agencies to continue to provide services," he added.

Overall, Catholic Charities agencies had revenues of more than $3.9 billion in 2008. Two-thirds of the revenue came from local, state and federal government sources.

Positive response

Despite the challenges posed by the recession, Father Snyder expressed optimism that the agency will be able to make strides in its nearly three-year-old campaign to reduce poverty by 50 percent by 2020.

"I actually think (the recession) gives us a greater opportunity to do that because when you look at the challenges that we have right now, one thing that should be very clear is that we can't just meet those challenges with what we were doing before," Father Snyder explained.

"Things have gotten so desperate it gives us the opportunity to really look at a solution that doesn't depend on... the social structures we had before, but to really redefine how we do it," he said.

shows nearly half — 48 percent — were adults 18 to 64 years old, 29 percent were children and 13 percent were seniors. Ten percent were unknown.

Prepared by the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate at Georgetown University, the survey revealed:

- Nearly 6.3 million people sought food services, a 3.8 percent decline from 2007.
- More than 3.6 million people — a 4.7 percent increase — received social services such as education, day care, programs aimed at at-risk populations, health care, and socialization and neighborhood services.
- More than 1.7 million people — an 11 percent jump — received assistance with basic needs, such as clothing, utility payments, emergency financial needs and prescriptions.
- Slightly more than 1 million people — a 7.3 percent decline — received various services that fall under what Catholic Charities USA calls strengthening families, including counseling and mental health, addiction, pregnancy, adoption, immigration and refugee services.

- More than 330,000 people received disaster services, a decrease of 21 percent from 2007, but still nearly 60 percent more than in 2005.
- More than 67,000 people — a 35 percent spike — received employment services.

Overall, the statistics reflected the nationwide growth in poverty in 2008 reported Sept. 10 by the U.S. Census Bureau. Census data show that 39.8 million people — 13.2 percent of the population — lived in poverty last year, up from 37.3 million people, or 12.5 percent, in 2007.

This certificate is awarded to individuals who complete all six modules of the catechist recognition process. These modules are the core curriculum areas of formation and include the call to be a catechist, skills and theory, sacraments, creed, morality, and sacred Scripture. Billy also received a certificate of completion for his service as a catechist for the past five years. Approximately 80 people attended the in-service workshop which was held at the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory. Participants included Catholic school personnel, faith formation leaders, youth ministers, campus ministers and young adult ministers.

Father Arnsparger presented the topic "Building a Foundation: Engaging and Implementing the National Directory for Catechesis."

The presentation included an overview of the National Directory for Catechesis, a breakdown of the seven characteristics of catechesis and an assessment of the strengths and challenges of catechetical programs.

the love we give one another."

He added, "With an authentic spiritual life, a strong missionary zeal, and an active participation in our local parishes, you must spend time in eucharistic adoration to engage the noisy world."

Attendees were encouraged to live prayer-filled lives so that their catechesis would bring growth to their parishes. To this end, Father Arnsperger stressed the need for the catechists to become active members of the whole diocese. He said everything they do must lead to an authentic faith in Christ.

Father Arnsperger then led the community of catechists in the Liturgy of the Hours, the prayer of the church.

Catechists speak from experience

First-year catechist James Jeffries of St. Mary Church in Greensboro remarked on the classes he took this year.

"I've come here today because I believe this would help me as I continue on my religious journey back home to God," said Jeffries, a recent Catholic convert. "I've learned that I must allow God to speak through me to the children as I use all the modern technology available."

Regular attendees of the Lighting the Fires of Faith series find continuing value in the classes.

"I came today to learn more about my faith and to learn how to feel better about myself as I discover ways to relate to and teach the young people of the parish," said Julie Michaels, catechist for Our Lady of the Rosary Church in Lexington. "I love coming to these classes because they demonstrate ways to improve teaching and they are very spiritually uplifting."

After achieving Level One certification from 11 years of work, Muriel Hughart of Holy Infant Church in Reidsville said now she can relax a little.

"However, I will still give my time and talent to the church for a few more years in appreciation of the gifts (with which) God has blessed me," said Hughart.

Hughart's most recent class focused on the Creed. She said this class helped her better understand the power of prayer offered by the Creed.

A gathering with growing purpose

The Lighting the Fires of Faith gathering was developed as an opportunity for catechists to share thoughts, ideas, and experiences they could use in their efforts to teach children.

"From the very beginnings of the diocese, it was expected that the faith formation leaders were to facilitate the Level One certification for catechists in the local parishes," said Sister of Providence Betty Paul, northern area regional coordinator for faith formation.

"The goal is to offer catechists personal and uplifting classes, which would lead to the certification of the individual catechists throughout the diocese," said Sister Paul.

She attributed the large number of catechists who signed up for a class named "Called to be a Catechist" to the incredible turnover of catechists in the parishes. At the same time, she indicated that the faithful who still attend Level Two courses are committed to their calling.

Sister Paul looks to the future with hopes of expanding upon opportunities to promote leader formation, like those available through Lighting the Fires of Faith. Her vision includes plans to advance parish catechetical program leader formation so those leaders are then enabled to support their parish catechists.

Sister Paul concluded by saying that she felt "greatly privileged to be able to work on the regional level supporting the catechetical leaders in their own environment, with these opportunities to gather as community."

RIGHT TO LIFE IN LUXEMBOURG

Grand Duke of Luxembourg receives 2009 Cardinal Van Thuan Prize

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Grand Duke of Luxembourg was awarded the 2009 Cardinal Van Thuan Prize for his efforts in defending the right to life and freedom of religion, the Vatican said.

The prize, which included a special silver medal and a certificate, was given to Henri, the grand duke, at a ceremony in Rome Sept. 16.

Cardinal Renato Martino, president of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, said at a press conference Sept. 15 that the grand duke had been chosen "for his efforts in the defense of human rights, but especially for the right to life and religious freedom."

The grand duke lost his right to veto in late 2008 when he refused to sign a law legalizing euthanasia in the tiny European country, earning the respect of Catholics and others who oppose euthanasia.

Cardinal Martino said the grand duke, who is married with five children, is worthy of the Van Thuan prize, which is "tailored to people who live according to their faith and put it into practice in their daily lives."

The grand duke met with Pope Benedict XVI in a private audience at the papal summer residence in Castel Gandolfo, outside Rome, the day after the ceremony.

The award is given in honor of the late Vietnamese Cardinal Francois Xavier Nguyen Van Thuan, who spent 13 years in prison under the communist regime in his country before fleeing to Rome in 1991. He died of cancer at age 74 in September 2002, after serving as president of the justice and peace council.

A cause for sainthood of the late cardinal is under way, with the Diocese of Rome collecting his writings as part of the process.

Some of that written material, in the form of prayers and poems, was put to music by Msgr. Marco Frisina, composer and choirmaster, and performed at the awards ceremony.

Four humanitarian organizations working in underdeveloped parts of the world also will receive about 22,000 euros ($32,400) each for excellence in their fields from the St. Matthew Foundation, which established the Van Thuan prizes last year. They are:

— Cooperation Mission and Development, based in Thailand, which builds and establishes parishes in Africa, Asia and South America.

— ALAS, a project of the Path of Freedom organization run by the Archdiocese of Bogota, Colombia; the project assists incarcerated people and their families.

— Skills Development Center for the Blind, a center in Thailand that trains blind people in motor skills and vocations such as Thai massage.

— Le Rocher, an association that aids street people in France and helps them return to society.

Not meant to be alone

A 'communion of persons' in the sacrament of marriage

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Having a master's degree in theology and working for the church can get me in trouble, or at least scoffed at, from time to time.

While back, my wife and I were having a light-hearted discussion about "bedroom" matters with a group of married friends. I put forth the idea that the consummation of marital love is symbolic of the total self-giving of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit among each other and suggested this is a primary reason for the sacrament of matrimony. When we give ourselves to each other out of love, we mirror the Trinity.

One person laughed and said, "I never think about that at such times."

I shrugged it off, and we moved on to other topics, but the comment stayed with me.

Our society has reduced sex to a selling point for material goods and a recreational activity for the partaking of any and all. The problem with this is that God has a much deeper and fulfilling purpose for marriage, in and out of the bedroom.

This weekend's readings speak of the origins of marriage. Both Genesis and Mark remind us that "a man leaves his father and mother and clings to his wife, and the two of them become one flesh." To emphasize this, Mark adds, "So they are no longer two but one flesh."

God did not intend for humans to be alone. We are at our best when we are in community.

Pope John Paul II explained this idea in depth in his work "Theology of the Body" in which he speaks of a "communion of persons." He says we are created to be like the Trinity — persons in communion with each other. The most excellent expression of this is the sacrament of marriage, but extended family and friends fit into this communion as well.

In a society that has warped the gift of marital love, the church stands as a beacon of light calling us to a more perfect understanding of how we share ourselves whether we are single or married. We were never meant to be alone; we have been made to live like God does, in union with each other.

Questions:

How does our society make it difficult to be a communion of persons? What are ways we can be more united with the people in our lives?

Pope holds meteorite from Mars

New Vatican observatory headquarters inaugurated

ROME (CNS) — When Pope Benedict XVI officially inaugurated the Vatican Observatory's new headquarters in Castel Gandolfo, a Jesuit astronomer let the pope hold a meteorite from Mars.

"The pope very much wanted to be involved with our new headquarters," U.S. Jesuit Father George Coyne told Catholic News Service Sept. 17.

Pope Benedict spent the evening of Sept. 16 in the company of papal astronomers who conduct study and research in Castel Gandolfo, outside of Rome, and at another research center in Tucson, Ariz.

His hourlong visit began with "a very beautiful prayer and blessing" for the staff and official inauguration of their new headquarters, said Father Coyne, the former director of the Vatican Observatory.

The pope also blessed a dedication plaque in the main-floor entrance area and took a leisurely tour inside, visiting the new library, conference room, staff offices and laboratory. The new facility is located in a renovated monastery about one-and-a-half miles from its previous location inside the papal palace.

Father Coyne said the pope "looked very carefully at the exhibits we have" and readily accepted the invitation of U.S. Jesuit Brother Guy Consolmagno to hold a meteorite.

In order to prevent contamination, the pope used a white handkerchief to hold the specimen, which, according to Father Coyne, was the Nakhla meteorite — a fragment of a larger meteorite from Mars that fell in the Nakhla region near Alexandria, Egypt, in 1911.

The small chunk of carbon-rich stone weighs just five-and-a-half ounces — just a bit heavier than a baseball.

The pope was led to the new headquarters' second floor to say a prayer in the chapel and pose for a group picture on the terrace.

Afterward, the astronomers treated the pope to a small reception of cookies and orange soda. The whole event was "very informal and cordial," said Father Coyne.

He said the visit "was magnificent because it shows the pope's personal interest in our work. After all, it's his observatory.

"He was curious about all we do in Arizona, so we had some very nice photographs of our mountain observatory in Arizona" to show the pope and explain the reason most of the research is done there, said the Jesuit priest.

nighttime observation.

The Vatican Observatory's headquarters had been located inside the papal palace at Castel Gandolfo since 1935, when it was moved from Rome to escape the nighttime light pollution coming from city streets.

But the papal astronomers expanded their activities so much in recent years with their popular summer school for budding scientists and research-related events that "we were overusing our facilities in the papal palace," said Father Coyne.

The decision to move to separate and larger facilities was made many years ago, he said. Astronomers started to move into their new, more modern headquarters this spring.

Father Coyne said the pope was scheduled to give an address to astronomers from all over the world, including members of the International Astronomical Union and the head of the American Astronomical Society.

The event, planned for Oct. 30 at the Vatican's Pontifical Academy of Sciences, is one of the Vatican's many initiatives to celebrate the International Year of Astronomy.

Henry Gibson, 'Laugh-In' star and cardinal's friend, dies at 73

WASHINGTON (CNS) — John and James were pals in high school who kept up that friendship after they graduated from St. Joseph Prep School in Philadelphia more than 55 years ago.

John is U.S. Cardinal John P. Foley, pro-grand master of the Knights of the Holy Sepulcher and formerly the 23-year president of the Pontifical Council for Social Communications.

James was James Bateman, who later changed his name to Henry Gibson, a fixture with his offbeat poems and deadpan delivery on the TV smash "Rowan and Martin's Laugh-In," which aired from 1968 to 1973.

Gibson died Sept. 14 at his home in Malibu, Calif., seven days before his 74th birthday. His son Jon said the cause of death was cancer.

The cardinal remembers Gibson fondly, as have legions of baby boomers who grew up following Gibson on "Laugh-In" and in a subsequent film and television career.

"I just wrote to his widow yesterday. He was a good friend," Cardinal Foley told Catholic News Service Sept. 18.

"He had been here for the ceremonies when I was made a cardinal, and he was also attempting to interest people in the work of the church in the Holy Land, too, which was very nice of him," the cardinal added.

Gibson had done some fundraising for the church in the Holy Land after Cardinal Foley was appointed to his post with the Knights of the Holy Sepulcher.

Cardinal Foley and Gibson, while classmates at St. Joseph Prep, had acted in different plays together.

"He was a wonderful person, a delightful person," Cardinal Foley said. "He was always an excellent person, a very good actor and a good friend."

Gibson, after graduating from high school, graduated from the theater program at The Catholic University of America in Washington.

Revering the rose

COURTESY PHOTO

Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor of St. Matthew Church in Charlotte, is pictured with members of the parish's Knights of Columbus following the Silver Rose prayer service in the chapel of the church Aug. 28.

Sponsored by the Knights of Columbus and the St. Matthew Respect Life committee, the prayer service was held to honor Our Lady of Guadalupe, patroness of North America and of the unborn.

The prayer service included recitation of the rosary, an act of consecration, the litany of the Blessed Virgin Mary and a solemn blessing.

The Silver Rose devotion was started in 1960 by a group of teenage boys known as Squires, an affiliated organization of the Knights of Columbus. The boys were looking for a means to give thanks to Our Lady of Guadalupe. Since a real rose has a short life span, a jeweler in Mexico City crafted a rose out of silver.

Today there are three Silver Roses making a pilgrimage across North America. All three left the city of London in Ontario, Canada in May and will arrive in Laredo, Texas, prior to Dec. 12, the feast day of Our Lady of Guadalupe.

Returning to paradise

Catechetical Sunday emphasizes proclamation of the Word

Catechists across the United States were blessed on Sept. 20, this year's Catechetical Sunday. The theme "Catechesis and the Proclamation of the Word" is a reminder that our Lord has commissioned us to proclaim the Word.

The General Catechetical Directory states that "catechesis is that particular form of the ministry of the Word which matures initial conversion to make it into a living, explicit and fruitful confession of faith."

Pope John Paul II explained that the definitive aim of catechesis "is to put people not only in touch but in communion, in intimacy, with Jesus Christ: only He can lead us to the love of the Father in the Spirit and make us share in the life of the Holy Trinity."

Regaining paradise

To be "in communion, in intimacy, with Jesus Christ" is to be in the restored "Eden," the garden.

The early Church Fathers commented on the connection between the story of the Garden of Eden and the parable of the Good Samaritan. Centuries later, stained glass artists paired these two Biblical accounts in the same windows. This is seen in the great gothic cathedrals of Chartres, Bourges and Sens.

is the account of the creation of Adam and Eve, their subsequent original sin and expulsion from the garden. The Good Samaritan parable is from Chapter 10 of St. Luke's Gospel.

In the parable of the Good Samaritan, the man leaving Jerusalem is leaving "communion, intimacy" with God. He represents Adam and Eve and all of humanity leaving the garden of God's presence. Outside of the garden, man is beaten and bruised by his decision to sin.

The Samaritan is the Redeemer who has arrived to proclaim the Gospel and fulfill God's promise that the "woman and her offspring" would conquer evil.

The Samaritan-Redeemer, who is Christ, picks the man up and takes him to the inn, a representation of the Church. In the Church, the man is anointed and nourished until the Samaritan-Redeemer returns.

The Samaritan-Redeemer entrusts care of the man to the keeper of the inn and says he will return to pay the full price. Of course, Christ paid that price on Calvary. Paradise lost in Eden is paradise regained in heaven. Everyone is invited to the restored paradise, the restored garden where man can "walk" with God in "intimacy."

Catechesis and intimacy with Christ

This movement from alienation to walking with God in intimacy is the goal of catechesis.

In the Church, we are fed and nourished by the proclamation of the Word, which invites us to the intimacy of a sacramental encounter with Christ Himself.

The work of catechists through the centuries has been to proclaim that Gospel which leads us to a personal faith, intimate communion with Christ and the Church.

Each Christian is a catechist in one way or another, using each providential moment and tool to do what our Lord commissioned the apostles:

"Go, therefore, and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all that I have commanded you. And behold, I am with you always, until the end of the age." (Mt. 28: 18-20)

On Catechetical Sunday especially, we are most grateful to everyone in our lives who has been and is "catechist" to us, and who led us into the Garden of the Church where we can have intimate communion with the Lord. May God bless those who have proclaimed the Word to us.

Father Arnsperger is Vicar of Education in the Diocese of Charlotte and pastor of St. Michael the Archangel Church in Gastonia.

GUIDELINES FOR PROCLAIMING THE WORD

Description of the work of the catechist in the National Directory for Catechesis, 2005:

"The apostolic work of the catechist springs from the Sacrament of Baptism. ... It is strengthened by the Sacrament of Confirmation. ... Catechists need to be practicing Catholics who participate fully in the communal worship and life of the Church and who have been prepared for their apostolate by appropriate catechetical training. ... Their personal relationship with Jesus Christ energizes their service to the Church and provides the continuing motivation, vitality, and force of their catechetical activity ... to follow (Christ) as a teacher of the faith and a witness to the truth of the faith."

Nourished by the Church, catechists fulfill the six tasks of catechesis: 1) promote knowledge of the faith; 2) promote a knowledge of the meaning of the liturgy and the sacraments; 3) promote moral formation in Jesus Christ; 4) teach Christians how to pray with Christ; 5) prepare Christians to live in community and to participate actively in the life and mission of the church; 6) promote a missionary spirit that prepares the faithful to be present as Christians in society.

Letters to the Editor

Welcoming everyone

I read with interest the letter from June Clancy "Welcoming the deaf" (Sept. 11).

I find it amazing that priests and parishioners find Ms. Clancy's interpreting as a distraction.

We have been blessed in our parish by Jenny Fox signing for the deaf. Although I am not hard of hearing, I find the interpretation beautiful and another form of praise to Our Lord.

I also witnessed signing when Mother Teresa came to the Charlotte Coliseum years ago.

Again, I was moved by being able to witness this form of prayer.

My husband lost his sight over seven years ago due to complications from diabetes.

I am saddened at times by the people who will not shake his hand at the sign of peace as he holds his hand out to reach out to others.

I am so moved by the people who do come up to him and shake his hand or give him a hug to let him know he is loved.

I know there will be a warm welcome for these people at the gates of Heaven.

Powerful tool for the faith

In response to "Lessons in brevity" in the Sept. 18 issue of The Catholic News & Herald, I want to point out that Twitter is so much more than 140 character messages.

In fact, if you learn how to use it, it can be a great tool for helping to live a fuller Christian life.

In Twitterland, there are casual users and there are power users, and everyone in-between.

A casual or new user may see an individual 'tweet' as 140 characters, but the power user sees the initial tweet as a kind of advertisement, or way to redirect readers to a Web site, video, picture, or other content-rich link.

Here are some examples:

A Tweet from @usccbmedia: @CatholicNewsSvc Wow. And we thought we had church-state tensions in this country. <http://tinyurl.com/kujbpz>

Note: this Tweet redirects and gives another Catholic Twitterer's address.

A Tweet from @CenteringPrayer: News About Fr. Thomas Keating <http://> post.ly/5Wuz

Note: in this Tweet, readers are redirected to a Web site with an update about Fr. Keating's surgery.

A Tweet from me @MarieGoocher: <http://twitpic.com/holy9> - The new altar at St. Francis Springs. Check out the 'candle' lights!

Note: I sent a picture taken on a Mother/Daughter retreat.

Connections can be made with friends, family, and strangers.

Recently, I sent a tweet including a picture of our new building at St. Mark to a dad who had just dropped off one of his eight children at Davidson College.

I also use Twitter to communicate with other Catholics about retreats and Centering Prayer.

So, you see, Twitter is a great tool, if a little time is spent to learn this great form of communication.

Christ the healer

The importance of absolution

Confession is good for the soul.

Forgiveness brings healing.

I think that, just as God has forgiven us in Christ, if someone sincerely asks for forgiveness, we should forgive that person, even though he or she might sin again.

The image Jesus wants us to have of God the Father is described in the story of the prodigal son. The father here forgives immediately. The sorrowing son does not even get a chance to finish his confession before the father orders a ring and a garment and a banquet to celebrate their reconciliation. The father is really the "prodigal" in the sense that he is extravagant with his forgiveness.

In hearing thousands of confessions, I have never heard a confession from someone who was not truly sorry. I have never refused absolution.

Confession is meant to be an encounter with God's mercy.

The people who come to confession are rare in today's world. They are people who actually take sin seriously. They are people who accept their guilt and feel the need for the forgiveness of the church.

We should encourage such people.

They are like King David, who expressed his guilt in Psalm 51, the "Miserere" or "mercy" psalm. David asks for mercy after his sin with Bathsheba. Actually, his most serious sin was not adultery with Bathsheba but the murder of her husband Uriah, which he arranged to cover up their adultery.

Anyway, David was totally sorry.

He says: "Have mercy on me, O God, in your goodness; in the greatness of your compassion wipe out my offense. Thoroughly wash me from my guilt and of my sin cleanse me. For I acknowledge my offense, and my sin is before me always."

Now that's an act of contrition!

In my experience, the people who come to confession have carried around their guilt for a long time, sometimes for years. So, when people finally find the courage to come to confession, I don't think we priests should discourage them. We are meant to be a "balm in Gilead."

Now, there is a tension in the priest's role of confessor.

Canon law says priests are to be judge as well as healer (Canon 978).

This is hard to do.

When I was a young priest, I think I put more emphasis on being a judge. Today I think I represent Christ the healer. I certainly appreciate people's persistent striving more than I used to.

But, in all my years of hearing confessions, I've never questioned anyone's sorrow. Nor have I questioned the person's "firm purpose of amendment." I take it at face value.

Canon law says priests should not refuse or delay absolution if the penitent is sincere.

Some people will commit the

Parish Diary

same sin again. After all, many sins are also addictions. I know that people will likely use pornography or alcohol again until they get help to overcome their addictions.

It is a harder case when people are living with someone who is not their spouse. I ask them to live as brother and sister, but I don't check on them.

Occasionally a person comes to confession and tells me that absolution was refused by another priest. I don't question that priest's judgment. I was not there.

But I do admire the persistence of the penitent. I'm not sure I would ever go back to confession if I was refused absolution.

In the tension between being judge and healer, I would rather err on the side of healing.

David also said it well in Psalm 51: "A heart contrite and humbled, O God, you will not spurn."

One must first believe in order to understand God's truth, says pope

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Understanding the divine mystery will never come from study alone — one must first believe in the Christian faith in order to understand it, said Pope Benedict XVI.

Theologians and Christians who wish to deepen their faith "cannot count on just their intelligence, but must cultivate a profound experience of faith at the same time," he said at his weekly general audience Sept. 23.

The pope spoke in the Paul VI hall before about 9,000 pilgrims from around the world, which included a group of 25 Chinese priests.

The catechesis was dedicated to the life and teachings of St. Anselm of Canterbury, an 11th-century Benedictine and doctor of the church.

According to the saint, people who wish to better understand the Christian tradition can carry out "a healthy theological quest" by following three steps, the pope said.

First, one must have faith, he said, which is "a free gift from God to be welcomed with humility."

The second step is experience, which entails incorporating the word of God in one's everyday life. The final step is "true understanding, which is never a result of ascetic reasoning, but of contemplative intuition," he said.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Our catechesis today turns to an outstanding churchman of the eleventh century, Saint Anselm of Canterbury. Anselm received a monastic education in his native town of Aosta, in the north of Italy, and entered the Benedictine monastery of Bec in Normandy. Under the guidance of his prior, Lanfranc of Pavia, he devoted himself to study and prayer, and eventually was elected abbot of Bec. Some time later he succeeded Lanfranc as Archbishop of Canterbury.

Anselm's years in England were marked by the reorganization of ecclesial life in the wake of the Norman invasion and the struggle for the Church's legitimate freedom from political inroads, which resulted in his being exiled for three years. This great spiritual leader was also a brilliant teacher, writer and speculative theologian. In the prayer which opens his most celebrated work, the Proslogion, he expresses his desire to understand the faith, the divine truth which his heart already believes and loves. May Saint Anselm's life and teaching inspire us to a more fruitful contemplation of the mysteries of the Christian faith, and a deeper love of the Lord and his Church.

Keeping up with life's changes

Estate planning foundations

As the seasons change from summer into fall and we approach the end of the year, it can be a good time to reflect on estate plans and other arrangements that provide for family members and loved ones. The foundation of most estate plans is a will, used either alone or in conjunction with a living trust, life insurance policies, retirement accounts, joint ownership arrangements, or other financial management plans.

When planning a will, it is best to work with professional advisors who are experienced in estate planning so that your goals and objectives will be met with a minimum of fees, concerns and delays.

Once your plans are in place, it is also important to review them every few years. Minor changes can usually be accomplished through simple adjustments to existing plans. Major changes, on the other hand, sometimes require a fresh look at your overall arrangements. A variety of factors — some obvious, some not — can affect your estate plan including:

- Births, marriages, or deaths within your family.
- A difference in your marital status.
- Significant increases or decreases in your financial status.
- The inability or unavailability of the named executor, personal representative, or trustee to settle your estate.
- Moving to another state or acquiring property in a different state.
- Selling or giving away property.
- Changes in federal and/or state tax laws.
- A desire to include charitable gifts as part of your estate plan.

You may also wish to include your parish, Catholic school, agency, the diocese or the Foundation for the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte as a beneficiary to receive a portion of the assets remaining in your estate. You simply stipulate whether you wish for the entire balance, a specific amount, or a percentage of your estate as your gift. Keep in mind that you can provide that a gift be made only if your other beneficiaries are unable to receive the funds. This way you can assure that your heirs' future security is not jeopardized in any way.

Up-to-date plans ensure that your wishes will be followed and will bring you and those who rely on you added peace of mind.

Pope announces synod on Middle East for 2010

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI announced that he will convene a Synod of Bishops for the Middle East to be held in October of 2010. They will address the problems of the Christian population in the region.

The pope said the synod would look at the various problems faced by the minority Christian communities in Middle Eastern countries, from migration to interreligious dialogue.

He announced the initiative at a meeting Sept. 19 with patriarchs and other church leaders from the region. After the encounter at the papal residence outside Rome, the pope hosted the prelates at a working lunch.

The synod will be held Oct. 10-24, 2010, on the theme "The Catholic Church in the Middle East: Communion and Witness: 'The community of believers was of one heart and mind.'" The quotation is a description of the unity of the early church from the Acts of the Apostles.

"During this brotherly meeting, from your speeches will surely emerge the issues that beset you and the orientations toward their proper resolution," the pope said. He told the church leaders that he was praying for them and their communities daily.

A Vatican statement said the informal discussion between the pontiff and the Eastern church representatives focused in particular on problems related to migration, ecumenical relations and interreligious dialogue, and highlighted the church's efforts to promote peace in the region. As he often does during synods, the pope gave an impromptu talk at the end of the encounter to summarize the various points that were made.

Pope Benedict has spoken frequently about the pressures faced by Christian and Catholic minorities in the Middle East, particularly in the Holy Land and in Iraq. The synod was designed to provide an opportunity for a much-needed strategizing session at the level of the universal church.

Archbishop Nikola Eterovic, secretary-general of the Synod of Bishops, said the idea for such a synodal assembly on the Middle East has been around for a while. He said that last spring, during the pope's visit to the Holy Land, he decided to go ahead with the idea.

Archbishop Eterovic said the synod would include representatives from other Christian churches, and perhaps those of the Jewish and Muslim faiths.

"We don't know the format yet, but it is clear that one must take into account the entire complex reality of the Middle East," Archbishop Eterovic told the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano.

"The synod is not 'against' anyone, but is an open space of dialogue that aims at communion and peace in justice and truth. Certainly we will find the way to hear the voices of the Jewish world and the Muslim world," he said.

Archbishop Eterovic said it would be the first regional synod held in modern times. It will last two weeks, one week less than usual, and preparatory work was already beginning with a two-day meeting Sept. 21-22 among Vatican and Middle East church officials. Present at this planning session were many of the Eastern church representatives who met with the pope Sept. 19, as well as the president of the Iranian bishops' conference, Chaldean Archbishop Ramzi Garmou of Tehran, and the president of the Turkish bishops' conference, Bishop Luigi Padovese.

The "lineamenta" or outline for the Middle East synod was expected by the end of the year, and the "instrumentum laboris" or working document for the synod should be ready by Easter. Archbishop Eterovic said both documents would be briefer than usual.

Those participating in the talks with the pope included the Chaldean patriarch, Cardinal Emmanuel-Karim Delly of Baghdad, Iraq; Latin Patriarch Fouad Twal of Jerusalem; the Lebanon-based Maronite patriarch, Cardinal Nasrallah P. Sfeir; and representatives of the Ukrainian, Syro-Malabar, Coptic, Melkite, Syrian, Armenian, Romanian and Syro-Malankar rites.

Last January, Chaldean Archbishop Louis Sako of Kirkuk, Iraq, and other Iraqi bishops in Rome for their "ad limina" visits asked the pope to convene a special synod for the churches of the Middle East.

Archbishop Sako said the priority topics for such a synod would include the problem of Christians fleeing the Middle East, paying Christian witness in a predominantly Muslim world, relations with Muslims, the role of Christians in civil and political life, lack of full religious freedom and Christians' prospects for the future.

Bishop Maroun Lahham of Tunis, Tunisia, a Jordanian native of Palestinian parentage, told Catholic News Service earlier this year that when the church discusses Asia — as it did in a 1998 synod for that region — "it's the Philippines, India, Japan, not the Middle East."

Bishop Lahham, who worked as a priest in the Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem as well as in the United Arab Emirates, said while the Middle East is technically part of the Asian land mass, "the issues ... were very unlike those" in typically Asian countries.

"We didn't feel (the Asian synod) was meant for us," said the bishop, who was head of the seminary in Beit Jalla, West Bank, at the time.

Contributing to this story was Pat Morrison in Tunisia.

KNIGHTS ON SHINY WHEELS

Members of the Knights of Columbus Motorcycle Ministry arrive for the organization's monthly meeting at St. Ann Parish in Raritan Borough, N.J., in late July.

Motorcycle ministry

Knights' unique ministry combines spirituality, fundraising

RARITAN BOROUGH, N.J. (CNS) — When about 15 men on motorcycles wearing "colors" or leather vests arrived at St. Ann Church, they weren't looking for trouble.

Rather, as members of the Knights of Columbus Motorcycle Ministry, they came to their monthly meeting to help spread the Gospel through the order's principles of charity, unity and fraternity.

George Muniz, a member of Council 9199, Our Lady of Peace Parish in Fords, said the motorcycle ministry gives him an opportunity to help others and enjoy the outdoors at the same time.

Riding can also be a "spiritual" experience because it provides time to pray, he said.

"I wanted to join because I have been riding a motorcycle most of my life," said Muniz, a member of Our Lady of Fatima Parish in Piscataway, who serves as a maintenance employee at three parishes in Perth Amboy.

"I am one of those guys who make the sign of the cross whenever I ride by a church," Muniz said.

With Father Edmund A. Luciano III, parochial vicar at St. Ann Parish, serving as chaplain, the ministry's meeting began with prayer and the Pledge of Allegiance.

John Brandon, founder and president, then led the 90-minute session in businesslike fashion interspersed with humorous anecdotes and some mild ribbing from members.

Minutes of the previous meeting were reviewed, old and new business was taken care of, finances were disclosed and plans were made for future charity events.

The organization's first fundraiser, the Alzheimer's Disease Respite Care Motorcycle Run in late spring, raised more than $400, Brandon said. Another fundraiser in September benefited Our Lady of Mount Virgin Parish in Middlesex.

After ending the meeting with a prayer, Father Luciano said he is happy to see anyone trying to follow in Jesus' footsteps, even a group as unique as the motorcycle ministry.

"The Gospel comes to us in our everyday lives and riding is part of their everyday lives," he said. "Pope John Paul II encouraged us to go for the new evangelization. I don't know if this is what he had in mind but it is certainly the spirit of it."

For Brandon, the organization also offers an opportunity to change the negative image some people have of motorcyclists.

"It is not 800 guys living in a house all carrying guns," Brandon said. "Nobody is here to knock over a grocery store or sell drugs."

The motorcycle ministry's roots go back about three years when Brandon, a member of St. Mary Parish in Middletown, started it with members from local councils.

With the approval of Thomas Ciborski, immediate past state deputy, the ministry was given the green light to go statewide, Brandon said.

"I told him there are a lot of guys that would join the Knights if they knew there was a motorcycle ministry," Brandon said.

Since registration began at the Knights' annual state convention in Wildwood in May, more than 100 members have joined, including 30 from the Diocese of Metuchen, Brandon said.

Vatican asks US bishops to help pay for apostolic visitation

Study of women religious to cost $1.1 million

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The head of the Vatican congregation that ordered a comprehensive study of U.S. institutes of women religious has asked the U.S. bishops to contribute funds to offset the projected $1.1 million cost of the study.

The request came in a letter from Cardinal Franc Rode, prefect of the Vatican's Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life. Dated July 14, the letter was made public Sept. 28 by the National Catholic Reporter, an independent Catholic newspaper based in Kansas City, Mo.

The study, known as an apostolic visitation, was authorized by Pope Benedict XVI in November 2008 and was expected to last three years.

"Because this apostolic visitation is so very important for safeguarding and promoting consecrated life in the United States, it is also imperative that it be methodically and efficiently conducted," Cardinal Rode wrote. "I am asking you, my brother bishops, for your help in offsetting the expenses which will be incurred by this work for the future of apostolic religious life in the United States."

The cardinal said the $1.1 million budget would cover "the three years which the total work of the apostolic visitation will require."

Part of the study of U.S. women religious involves a questionnaire distributed to 341 congregations Sept. 18. Included were questions about membership, living arrangements, the ministries in which members participate, and spiritual life, including the practice of prayer and the frequency of Mass.

Pope's wrist still healing, but he can write

Second volume, following 'Jesus of Nazareth' bestseller, is in progress

ABOARD THE PAPAL FLIGHT TO THE CZECH REPUBLIC (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI said his right wrist has still not fully recovered from being broken after he fell July 17, but that it has healed enough so that he can write again.

During a two-hour flight Sept. 26 from Rome's Ciampino airport to the Czech Republic, the pope answered questions submitted to the Vatican press office.

One of the questions, read by the Vatican spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, was how the pope's wrist injury was healing and whether he was able to get much work done on his second volume of a book on Jesus of Nazareth.

The pope told reporters that the five weeks his hand was in a cast and the subsequent days of recovery were very difficult for him. "My thoughts mostly develop through writing, so for me it was truly a test of patience to not be able to write for six weeks," he said.

"I did make a little progress on the book, but there is still a lot to do," including the bibliography, he said.

He said the book "could be finished by the spring. But this is a hope."

The book is expected to cover Christ's childhood, passion, death and resurrection. The first volume, the best-selling "Jesus of Nazareth," was published in 2007.

Knights of Columbus leader named to Vatican bank council

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The head of the Knights of Columbus has been named by Pope Benedict XVI to a five-member council that supervises the activities of the Vatican bank.

Supreme Knight Carl A. Anderson, who heads the 1.7 million-member fraternal organization, was among three new council members announced by the Vatican Sept. 23.

"I hope that my experience in working with the Vatican on a variety of issues over the past decade, and my work in the business and financial sector — as Supreme Knight and Chief Executive Officer of the Knights of Columbus — will enable me to contribute to the success of the IOR's (Vatican's Institute for Works of Religion) many important initiatives," said Anderson.

Leaving his post on the council was Virgil Dechant, who stepped down as head of the Knights of Columbus in 2000.

The pope also named a new president of the council, Ettore Gotti Tedeschi, an Italian banker and a professor of financial ethics at the Catholic University of the Sacred Heart in Milan, and a new vice president, Renaldo Hermann Schmitz, a retired German business manager.

The Vatican bank, known formally as the Institute for the Works of Religion, was established in 1942 and is used by Vatican agencies, church organizations, bishops and religious orders around the world. It offers currency exchange services and interest-bearing accounts and, like all banks, has an investment portfolio.

Anderson, 58, also runs the Knights of Columbus insurance program, which has more than $14 billion in assets and $71 billion worth of insurance in force. For the 34th year in a row, Anderson said recently, the program has earned the highest rating given by A.M. Best and for the 17th year in a row it earned Standard & Poor's top rating.

People stranded by floodwaters take refuge inside a church in Cainta Rizal, outside Manila, Philippines, Sept. 28. The Philippines appealed for international aid to help tens of thousands marooned by flash floods related to typhoon Ketsana.

Catholic organizations aid Philippine victims of flooding

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Catholic charitable organizations are stepping up to help victims in the Philippines after the worst flood in decades hit in late September.

"They're calling this the Katrina of the Philippines," said Luc Picard, Catholic Relief Services' country representative in Manila. The equivalent of a month's worth of rain fell in six hours and, at one point, more than 80 percent of Manila was under water.

"With CRS' initial funding, we're helping 5,000 families through Caritas," Laura Sheahan, CRS regional information officer based in Cambodia, told CNS by e-mail.

Caritas is the umbrella organization of Catholic aid agencies. In a statement, the Caritas office in the Philippines said it was providing aid to a total of 10,000 families, or 50,000 people.

Catholic leaders urge change at UN summit

Pope sends message that 'creation is under threat'

Sept. 22 U.N. Summit on Climate Change in New York.

"It is unfair that people in developing countries pay the consequences for problems that rich countries have created," said Elyzabeth Peredo, director of the Solon Foundation in Bolivia, at a Sept. 22 press conference.

As an example, she said Bolivia generates only 0.1 percent of global greenhouse gas emissions, but melting glaciers caused by the warming effect of emissions worldwide endanger crops for small-scale farmers in communities throughout the country's Andes mountains.

The proposals now under discussion at the United Nations set goals and targets for international investment in adaptation technologies to help countries withstand climate change.

"We have 2020 targets and even 2050 targets, but it's necessary to act now to reduce the vulnerability of the poorest," said Rene Grotenhuis, president of CIDSE, a Belgium-based international alliance of Catholic development agencies.

"We're trying to put a human face on climate change," he added. "Beyond the statistics, there are people living with the effects of climate change already. It's necessary and urgent to get a bold and ambitious treaty in Copenhagen."

Pope shares concern

Pope Benedict XVI urged world leaders to address global environmental issues "with generous courage" and reminded them that the world's resources are to be shared by all, including poorer countries.

He said "creation is under threat" and that it was everyone's responsibility to protect the environment because "the earth is indeed a precious gift of the Creator."

The pope's message was sent by the Vatican to the climate change summit and appeared on the U.N. summit's Web site. The papal message had been recorded during an Aug. 26 general audience in Castel Gandolfo, Italy.

Government leaders have an obligation to work together for the "protection of the environment, and the safeguarding of resources and of the climate," in respect of the law and in solidarity with weaker nations, he said.

Natural resources must be shared, he said, and the social and economic costs of consuming them "must be recognized with transparency and borne by those who incur them, and not by other peoples or future generations."

Summit details

The Sept. 22 summit, called by U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, is a prelude to a comprehensive international climate change deal that will be finalized at the Conference of the Parties to the U.N. Framework Convention on Climate Change Dec. 7-18 in Copenhagen, Denmark.

The nonbinding convention, or treaty, was adopted in 1992 and aims to prevent "dangerous" human interference with the climate system.

Representatives of the 192 countries that are parties to the climate change convention meet annually to review progress on implementing it.

This year's meeting in Denmark is viewed as a pivotal opportunity to reverse the causes of climate change by implementing a new treaty that will expand the reach of the convention's 1997 Kyoto Protocol, which expires in 2012.

That agreement set binding targets for developed countries to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

The Catholic contingency

The 15-member Catholic delegation of laity and religious was organized by CIDSE and Caritas Internationalis, a network of 164 Catholic charities. It is led by Cardinal Keith O'Brien of St. Andrews and Edinburgh, Scotland. The group met with heads of state, government and religious leaders and delegates in multiple venues Sept. 20-23.

Cardinal O'Brien called on heads of state to give the issue the highest political priority and to attend the meeting in Copenhagen to make sure a strong and equitable agreement is reached.

"Leaders should be getting down to serious negotiations for the sake of all humanity," he said. "Instead, we are seeing political disagreements and a lack of commitment. The lives of millions of people in the developing world, who have done least to cause the problem, are at stake."

Grotenhuis said a fair, just climate treaty is endangered by "too many countries holding their cards close to the vest, waiting to see what the main actors will do. There is not yet a broad commitment from players other than" the European Union.

He said climate change relates to a basic principle of Catholic social teaching, the common good. "It's a fundamental issue at the heart of Catholic social thinking to care about climate change and make it an important issue," he added.

Catholic delegates also participated in a Sept. 21 panel that addressed practical steps being taken to reduce vulnerability and enhance resilience of affected populations. The speakers also gave examples from their regions to illustrate the scope of the situation.

Janet Mangera, executive secretary of Caritas Kenya, said changing climate patterns made rainfall unreliable in Kenya, where only 17 percent of the land is moderately productive. "Of 38 million people, 10 million are in need of food," she said. "In the past, we have had drought and famine, but it has not affected this high a percentage of the people."

She said Caritas Kenya is helping communities adapt to the water shortage by promoting traditional and drought-resistant crops, such as sorghum, millet and cassava, and demonstrating bio-farming in the dioceses.

Mangera said Caritas is also "capacity-building in climate change," by training development coordinators to enable communities to advocate for policy changes.

Nafisa D'Souza, executive director of Laya Resource Centre in the Indian state of Andhra Pradesh, said, "Local communities are very much affected by the climate crisis, but they are also very resilient." But resilience erodes, she said, when scarce energy resources "go to meet the demands that come from the elites, either in or out of the country."

Bishop Alvaro Ramazzini of San Marcos, Guatemala, said the Catholic delegation was committed to encouraging fundamental policy changes by its presence at the meeting and by promoting the relationships among development, climate change, social justice and the suffering of poor people.

He urged people to adopt an austerity toward natural resources. He said his morning shower at a New York hotel dumped a surprising amount of water on him. "It was not only incredible, but unfair," he said, reflecting on the irregular availability of potable water in his country.

"We need to encourage a social system where to be is more important than to have," Bishop Ramazzini added.

Message of hope

Pope urges Czechs to regain values that inspired fight for freedom

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

PRAGUE, Czech Republic — Commemorating the 20th anniversary of the peaceful revolt that brought down the country's communist regime, Pope Benedict XVI urged people in the Czech Republic to rediscover the spiritual and moral values that sustained their struggle for freedom.

In gatherings Sept. 26-28 with political, social, cultural and religious leaders as well as the Catholic faithful, the pope delivered a message of hope meant to inspire both the country's majority of nonbelievers and the minority Catholic community.

Central to his message was that no society, no matter how democratic, could ever maintain a healthy and ethical sense of freedom without guidance from the truth found in God and the wisdom of faith.

The pope's trip to Prague, Brno, and Stara Boleslav was his 13th trip abroad and his seventh to Europe. The fact that more than half of his apostolic journeys so far have been to Europe reflects his deep concern for revitalizing the continent's Christian heritage.

"True freedom presupposes the search for truth — for the true good — and hence finds its fulfillment precisely in knowing and doing what is right and just," the pope said during a meeting Sept. 26 with diplomats and political, civil, religious and cultural leaders in Prague's presidential palace.

Under the soaring gilded stucco ceilings of the palace, the pope reminded his audience that the country's hard-fought freedom must be properly used. Leaders in society have the duty to encourage citizens to seek the truth and goodness, he said.

"Jointly we must engage in the struggle for freedom and the search for truth, which either go together, hand in hand, or together they perish in misery," the pope said.

He urged people "to apply their faith respectfully yet decisively in the public arena" so that the truth and wisdom of faith could light the path of human progress.

"Far from threatening the tolerance of differences or cultural plurality, the pursuit of truth makes consensus possible, keeps public debate logical, honest and accountable" and ensures a society that is united and dedicated to the common good, he said.

The Czech Republic represents a unique challenge for the church. Some 60 percent of the population claims to profess no religious belief — making it the most secular country in Europe.

The largest faith community on the landscape is the Catholic Church, but Catholics are still only 30 percent of all inhabitants, and only a small percent say they are active members of the church.

At a welcoming ceremony at Prague's airport, the pope said the impact of 40 years of an atheist totalitarian regime could not be underestimated. The flame of faith has been kept alive thanks to the many "courageous martyrs whose fidelity to Christ spoke far louder and more eloquently than the voice of their executioners," he said.

The papal visit drew Catholics from all over the Czech nation and from neighboring Austria, Slovakia, Germany and Poland, specifically for the outdoor Mass Sept. 27 in the Moravian diocese of Brno, some 140 miles southeast of Prague. Local organizers said 120,000 people attended the event, making it the largest Mass ever celebrated in the Czech Republic.

The pope's homily focused on hope and how "the only certain and reliable hope is founded on God."

Talks illuminate faith centered around sacrament of Eucharist

Ilibagiza spent 91 days hiding in a bathroom with seven other women during the Rwandan genocide in 1994. During that time, anger was her obstacle and the rosary became her refuge.

"Prayer has the power to change us," said Ilibagiza, who was able to forgive the men who killed her family.

"There is so much peace in forgiveness, so much freedom," she said.

Ilibagiza prayed approximately 27 rosaries a day during the time she was in hiding.

"Our Lady said that if we say the rosary, anything is possible," Ilibagiza said.

"We can do so much if we just trust in God."

Holy Hour and Benediction

The homilist during the eucharistic holy hour and Benediction on Saturday morning, Sept. 26, was Bishop Felipe Estévez, auxiliary bishop of the Archdiocese of Miami.

Bishop Estévez talked about the powerful witness of having the eucharistic procession through the streets of uptown Charlotte.

"The civil society notices that we hold this treasure not as a private secret, but that we are bold to hold it publicly as a public gift to all," he said.

"We do it because in exercising our religious freedom we are sharing our faith with others," said Bishop Estévez.

He went on to talk about the importance of eucharistic adoration and how the practice of adoration goes hand-in-hand with receiving the sacrament of holy communion.

Bishop Estévez quoted St. Augustine when he said, "No one eats the flesh without first adoring it."

"Only in this way do we become one with him (Christ)," he said, referring to a quote from Pope Benedict XVI.

General track

To kick off the general session, Ilibagiza spoke about the apparitions of Our Lady of Kibeho.

The apparitions, which took place during the 1980s at an all-girls' Catholic high school in the remote Rwandan village of Kibeho, are the only Vatican-recognized Marian apparitions on the continent of Africa.

In keeping with the theme of this year's Eucharistic Congress, "The Word Became Flesh and Made His Dwelling Among Us," Ilibagiza said that the messages of Our Lady of Kibeho were not just for Africa, but for the whole world.

Making his fourth appearance at the Eucharistic Congress was Father Leo Patalinghug, a member of the faculty of Mount St. Mary Seminary in Baltimore and host of the Internet cooking show "Grace Before Meals."

Father Patalinghug is a multi-talented priest — a former national full-contact stick fighting champion, a black belt in tae kwon do and an '80s break dancer.

His talk was centered on a cooking presentation in which he showed the audience how to make an Italian dish called "Penne a la Vodka."

"As a priest I gave God everything, including my hobbies, and he turned it into a ministry," said Father Patalinghug referring to how he has been able to incorporate his unique skill-set in his vocation as a priest.

"As a priest I feed people — body, mind and soul," said Father Patalinghug.

With "Grace Before Meals" he follows a similar philosophy.

"I touch their hearts through their stomachs," he said.

Next on the general speaker track was Father Tad Pacholczyk, director of education at the National Catholic Bioethics Center in Philadelphia, Penn.

In his talk, "The Science and Ethics of Stem Cells and Cloning," Father Pacholczyk took a daunting topic and broke it down into understandable terms.

"We've got to help people understand why they should never lay their hands on a human embryo," said Father Pacholczyk.

He touched on the moral and ethical dilemmas of scientific research using embryonic stem cells.

"I am convinced that the true measure of the greatness of a society will always be in terms of how it treats its lowest members," he said. "When you choose to go after good ends by using evil means, you always end up in a pickle."

Closing Mass

"The Eucharistic Congress is an opportunity for us to gather to thank our Lord for his great gift to us," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis in his homily during the closing Mass.

Bishop Jugis mentioned the many ways in which Jesus is present to us, specifically the ministry of the priest, the liturgy of the Word, and worship through prayer and song.

However, he said the presence of Jesus in the Eucharist is different from the other ways in that it is real and substantial.

"We are a eucharistic people," said the bishop.

"It is the real presence of Christ that moves us to say, 'We cannot live without the Eucharist, because we cannot live without Christ,'" he said.

The bishop closed his homily with a reminder of the theme of the congress.

"The very reason 'The Word Became Flesh and Made His Dwelling Among Us,' was to offer himself as a sacrifice for our salvation," Bishop Jugis said. "Jesus instituted the Eucharist so he could continue to offer himself for us and we could have new life in him."

Thousands share in grace of fifth Eucharistic Congress as he led the eucharistic procession, part of the fifth annual diocesan Eucharistic Congress held Sept. 25-26. The two-day event was themed "The Word Became Flesh and Made His Dwelling Among Us," taken from John 1:14.

"We pray that the congress will produce the fruits of spiritual renewal in all of us, a greater appreciation for the central place of the Eucharist in our lives as Catholics, and an increased zeal to do our part in the great mission of the new evangelization," said Bishop Jugis in a Sept. 4 letter to parishioners about the congress.

"It is through our participation in the eucharistic sacrifice that the Lord constantly enlivens us so that we can faithfully do his work in the midst of our secular society," he said.

Seminarians of the diocese with bearers of the crucifix and torches led the procession, followed by a Knights of Columbus color guard, sodalities, first communicants, members of religious communities, deacons, and priests from around the diocese.

Gentle, rhythmic bells and curling incense signaled the approach of the Blessed Sacrament, held in a monstrance by Bishop Jugis under a canopy carried by the Knights of Columbus.

Bishop Jugis was followed by Bishop William G. Curlin, bishop emeritus of the Diocese of Charlotte, and guest Bishop Felipe Estévez, auxiliary bishop for the archdiocese of Miami. The rest of the procession included representatives of many of the 93 parishes and missions, religious ministries, lay ministries and cultural groups in the diocese. Hundreds of people watching the procession along the city streets knelt reverently as the Eucharist passed by, then joined the procession behind parish banners.

"It's emotional, beautiful," said an onlooker from Raleigh, in town for business. "It's impressive, even for this Baptist who is not high into ceremony."

"The first year was also very impressive," said Kevin Routen, parishioner of St. Barnabas Church in Arden.

"All the construction workers along the route either knelt or took off their hard hats and stopped work. All the noise stopped," he said.

"It may sound corny, but I think of myself as a rechargeable battery and this (Eucharistic Congress) as my charging station," said Kevin Dieter, parishioner of St. Aloysius Church in Hickory, who has attended all five congresses.

"As Catholics, we all know what the Eucharist is about, but we come here to be re-energized," he said.

Call to evangelization

After participants entered the convention center, Bishop Estévez emphasized the evangelistic nature of the Eucharistic Congress in a Holy Hour homily.

"The Lord does great things in your midst," said Bishop Estévez, "through his real, divine, loving and sacramental presence."

Citing only 30 percent regular Sunday Mass attendance by Catholics, the bishop said there exists an "urgency for Catholic evangelization."

The Eucharist is our "source of strength to reach out and share Christ with others in an ongoing history of salvation," he stated.

Bishop Estévez added that the Last Supper is the "most tangible expression of love passed from Jesus to the apostles, and from the apostles to every succeeding generation."

"The church does not own the Eucharist, but is the faithful custodian," he said.

He added that through a public event like the annual Eucharistic Congress, we are "passing on the most precious gift received from the apostles and Mary."

Bishop Estévez also said that studies have shown the practice of eucharistic adoration results in increased participation in Sunday Mass.

Bishop Jugis then concluded the Holy Hour with an invitation to deepen appreciation and devotion to the eucharistic presence in adoration during the congress.

Faith intensified

Eucharistic adoration during the congress began Friday evening, Sept. 25, when a number of groups — including clergy, religious, young adults and families — each spent an hour before the Blessed Sacrament at St. Peter Church until morning.

The Friday night opening of the Eucharistic Congress included a concert of sacred music and a talk by keynote speaker Immaculée Ilibagiza, survivor of the Rwandan genocide in 1994.

The concert choir included approximately 70 singers from 17 parishes across the Diocese of Charlotte accompanied by a trumpeter and an organist.

"One of the pieces we sang was a musical setting of the angelus prayer [from Biebl's 'Ave Maria']," said Dr. Larry Stratemeyer, concert director. "Within that text is 'The Word Became Flesh and Made His Dwelling Among Us.'"

"It is not only a beloved piece for people to listen to and to sing but it was also the centerpiece of our theme," he said.

Keynote speaker Ilibagiza expanded upon her Friday evening talk about the power of forgiveness and prayer, especially of the rosary, in a Saturday discussion of the Marian apparitions at Kibeho in Rwanda, Africa.

Expanding knowledge

Ilibagiza's Saturday morning presentation was part of an entire day of opportunities for all ages and interests, which were organized into specific programs called tracks. The general track consisted of three talks in English paralleled by three presentations in Spanish for the Hispanic track. Tracks were also available for youth and children, split into the three categories of high school, middle school, and kindergarten through grade five.

"They were great speakers, the best so far," said Linda Dillon, parishioner of Our Lady of the Highways Church in Thomasville, who has attended all five annual events.

Referring to Father Leo Patalinghug, whose talk "Grace Before Meals" was part of this year's general track, Dillon said "his humor and very energetic presentation keep you interested."

"The speakers are phenomenal," said Dr. Larry Kwan, parishioner of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point. "I could sit there all day."

Jennifer Shinn, parishioner from

St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte and past children's track volunteer, said the Eucharistic Congress was a "very good experience" for her and increased the love of the faith for the children.

"It was extremely well organized, with two adults for each small group, bags full of activities, art projects, lunch provided, stories and dances," Shinn said.

"Each year is a different experience," said Leslie Choate, parishioner from St. Frances of Rome Church in Sparta.

"For me, it is a day of pride, when we can come together and share the presence of our Savior with everyone," said Choate. "It is one of those 'wow' moments, a very humbling experience, to walk the streets of Charlotte and say this is what we're all about."

Throughout the day, a large area was filled with more than 80 vendors who provided information about religious ministries and sold books written by the speakers and a wide variety of religious items.

Congress participants spent time in eucharistic adoration and hundreds received the sacrament of Reconciliation offered by priests in both English and Spanish.

All events concluded with a late-afternoon vigil Mass.

"The Eucharistic Congress helps us grow in our amazement of the real presence of Christ with us in the Holy Eucharist," said celebrant Bishop Jugis, who announced plans for the sixth Eucharistic Congress to be held at the Charlotte Convention Center Sept. 10-11, 2010.

believe because they don't know and they don't have anyone to tell them about it," said Father Lawson.

His talk focused on making theological sense of the Incarnation and God's promise to his people that he would be born of human flesh in order to redeem them.

A second speaker in the Hispanic track, Maria de la Defensa Michel, is a homemaker with a master's degree in civil engineering who now spends the majority of her time proclaiming the kingdom of God.

Through the assistance of an interpreter, she told The Catholic News & Herald that the message of her presentation was the Incarnation of Jesus and how we become carriers of the Incarnate Jesus when we receive the sacrament of holy Communion.

"When we receive the Eucharist, we become eucharistic," she said. "We are called to bring the Incarnate Jesus in ourselves to the world."

A third presenter, Milton Lopez, felt called to work in the new evangelization, new ways of bringing the Gospel to all, after experiencing a personal encounter with Christ in 1985.

"At that time I was a musician," said Lopez.

He recalled the days of touring with his band across the United States and how he was enthralled by material things.

"I was very lonely," he said. "I was looking for an answer."

It was at a Cursillo retreat, a movement which seeks to promote faith renewal for adults, that Lopez had a personal encounter with Jesus.

Now he spends the majority of his time proclaiming the Gospel by speaking at retreats and teaching weekly religion classes.

"New evangelization is the same Gospel but uses different ways of communication," explained Lopez, who utilizes radio, TV, books and music to "bring the Gospel to the reality of life."

His message was simple: "Love," he said. "Jesus is love."

Making an impression

Those who attended the Hispanic track had unique and personal reactions to the eucharistic procession and the speakers.

Rosana Caruso, parishioner of St. James Church in Concord and immigrant from Argentina, said she only occasionally attends Sunday Mass and was not even planning to attend this year's events.

At the last minute she came and, with tears in her eyes, declared "I found God today."

After hearing the first speaker, Father Lawson, she said, "Something big inside is changing. We all think we have God, but today we really can say God is with us."

Father Lawson's talk also made a big impression on Juana Martinez, parishioner at St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem.

"He said we not only need to believe in him but believe him when he says he gave his life for our salvation," she explained.

Martinez said that this year's event, her third experience of the Eucharistic Congress in Charlotte, seemed to have doubled in attendance from last year. Each of the 3,000 seats in the Hispanic hall was filled for the entire day.

"At first I attended as a curiosity, I was used to it in Mexico," she said. "I was amazed to see all the people gathered and the procession took my breath away."

She joined in the singing in the streets and immediately "fell in love with it."

This year she brought her brother and sister to experience the fact that "God is here with us and wants to change us to be similar to him."

Juan Morales, parishioner of Our Lady of the Assumption Church in Charlotte, said he came with his girlfriend's family. Originally from Guatemala, he said the Eucharistic Congress reminds him of similar processions at home.

"I wanted to see everything," he said.

When he heard the singing, he said it reminded him of home and brought tears to his eyes.

"Tomorrow I remember my father died two years ago, it's the anniversary," said Morales. "I prayed for my family, and I want to change my life for good. I want salvation with Jesus. I want him to touch my heart."

THE NUN RUN

Alicia Torres takes a lunchtime run outside the Cardinal Meyer Center in Chicago Sept. 8. She ran the Chicago Half Marathon Sept. 13 to help raise funds so she can pay off her student loans and become a nun.

For the long haul

Chicago woman runs in order to raise funds to enter religious life

CHICAGO (CNS) — When Alicia Torres laced up her running shoes and tackled the 13.1 miles of the Chicago Half Marathon Sept. 13, her goal was to become a nun.

Torres is not a runner and had never run a distance race. But she ran the race as part of an appeal to friends and strangers to help pay off more than $90,000 in student loans so she can enter religious life.

When Torres felt God calling her to this vocation, she realized there was one major obstacle in her path — $94,000 in student loans that must be paid off to enter the Franciscan community she has chosen. Most of her loans are held by private lenders so they can't be consolidated or the interest rates negotiated.

It is a contemporary issue. Men and women graduate from college with student loan bills and feel God calling them to join communities that take vows of poverty. But they must enter debt-free since the communities do not typically have resources to pay off the loans.

The 24-year-old graduated in 2007 from Loyola University Chicago with a degree in theology and bioethics and works in the Respect Life Office for the Archdiocese of Chicago.

Facing this large debt and feeling God's call to her becoming clearer every day, Torres chose to do something public to seek help. She took the "nun run" vocation idea literally and decided to run a half marathon to call attention to her situation and to encourage donations.

Torres created www.TheNunRun.com to chronicle her journey. Several of her friends ran the half marathon with her in solidarity.

She is also working with the Laboure Society (www.labourefoundation.org), a nonprofit that provides financial assistance to individuals who must eliminate personal debt in order to pursue their vocations to the priesthood or religious life.

Torres tells anyone who asks that she's not looking to get out of paying her loans. She will continue to work until they are paid and she can enter the community free and clear. She's just looking for help to realize her vocation sooner rather than later.

She is peppered with questions and comments whenever she shares her story. Why can't her parents pay the loans for her? (They don't have the means and still have kids at home.) Why doesn't she just get a better-paying job? (She's doing good work where she is.) Why can't the community pay it for her? (They have a vow of poverty.)

They are all questions she takes in stride and opportunities she uses for evangelization.

A little bit of heaven

Need for God exists regardless of finances

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I'm looking forward to visiting my church's twin parish in Haiti in a few months. My standard explanation for traveling to the impoverished Caribbean island every couple of years is that I go there to find God. For me, Haiti is a little bit of heaven.

One wouldn't think so, given the Haitians' daily struggle for survival without the barest necessities for living: potable water, food, electricity, basic medical care. But in reading this weekend's Gospel about the rich young man who asks Jesus what is required to enter the kingdom of heaven, I think of my Haitian friends. In today's parlance, "They're there!"

The pastor of the parish in Cabestor,

Haiti, helped me see why. He recently visited our church community in Virginia, and one evening over dinner I discussed with him how hard it is to be a pastor in Haiti.

He agreed, explaining that a continuous flow of parishioners come to him for help. "They say, 'I'm hungry, I need money, my child is sick.' Sometimes I can help. But usually I can't. I don't have what they ask for — in Haiti there is no money, there is not enough food.

"They keep coming, but I tell them I can't provide those things," the priest said. "I remind them to look to God for help. They come to Mass, and they always keep faith in God because they know food and money aren't what they most need. They need the love of God, and they know God cares for them and their children."

Then he smiled wryly. "Here in the United States it's different," he said. "People have money. They have food. But they don't know what to do with it. They know it doesn't bring them faith," he explained. "They know they need something more, but they don't know how to find it. That's difficult too."

Guiding people to God, he said, "is different here."

Living in a wealthy society presents a particular difficulty. Jesus made this point to his disciples after the rich man went away. Attachment to worldly comforts and success is hard to break. One can forget a need that will come soon enough: the need for God.

Questions:

What material attachments are obstacles to your relationship with God? When have you experienced a deep need for God that couldn't be fulfilled through your own resources?

House resolution honors work of women religious in United States

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A U.S. House resolution passed Sept. 22 “honors and commends Catholic sisters for their humble service and courageous sacrifice throughout the history” of the nation.

The resolution approved with a voice vote also specifically supports the goals of a traveling exhibit on women religious in the United States that is being sponsored by the Leadership Conference of Women Religious.

The resolution was introduced by Rep. Marcy Kaptur, D-Ohio, and co-sponsored by 67 members of both parties.

In speaking on the floor of the House in support of her resolution, Kaptur, a Catholic, cited the history of Catholic sisters in the country dating back to 1727, and their roles in nursing during the Civil War, in health care today, and in education and other types of ministries. She noted that since 1980 at least nine U.S. sisters have been killed for their work; they include three Ohio nuns murdered in El Salvador in 1980.

The resolution also cited the legacy of the nuns who were murdered “while working for social justice and human rights overseas.”

Rep. Mark Souder, R-Ind., a member of the United Brethren in Christ, also offered remarks for the Congressional Record about the influence of the sisters in his state, particularly St. Mother Theodore Guerin, who established a system of parish schools in Indiana.

The resolution said “the social, cultural and political contributions of Catholic sisters have played a vital role in shaping life in the United States” and that “such women have joined in unique forms of intentional communitarian life dedicated to prayer and service since the very beginnings of our nation’s history, fearlessly and often sacrificially committing their personal lives to teaching, healing and social action.”

In addition, the resolution noted that about one in six hospital patients in the United States is treated in a Catholic facility and that Catholic sisters “have been among the first to stand with the underprivileged, to work and educate among the poor and underserved, and to facilitate leadership through opportunity and example.”

They also “continue to provide shelter, food and basic human needs to the economically or socially disadvantaged and advocate relentlessly for the fair and equal treatment of all persons,” it said.

It also noted that Catholic sisters “work for the eradication of poverty and racism and for the promotion of nonviolence, equality and democracy in principle and in action.”

“The humanitarian work of Catholic sisters with communities in crisis ... throughout the world positions them as activists and diplomats of peace and justice for some of the most at-risk populations,” the resolution said.

The traveling exhibit “Women & Spirit: Catholic Sisters in America” opened in the Women’s Museum of Dallas Sept. 25, after a three-month showing at the Cincinnati Museum Center. The exhibit will move on to the Smithsonian’s S. Dillon Ripley Center in Washington in January, the Ellis Island Immigration Museum in New York next September and the Mississippi River Museum in Dubuque, Iowa, in early 2011.

Debbie Fagnano plays the calliope on a New Orleans steamboat Sept. 18. She also is a parish minister of music in the Archdiocese of New Orleans.

Music, a magnet for faith

Musician uses happy tunes to connect Catholics to faith

NEW ORLEANS (CNS) — As the player of one of the country’s two working calliopes, Debbie Fagnano has a unique view from her perch atop the New Orleans steamboat Natchez.

Making people happy through the calliope’s joyful strains is her trade, and Fagnano, 54, is happy to oblige on the musical instrument fitted with steam whistles, played from a tiny keyboard.

When she is not playing the calliope, chances are she’s at the organ at Our Lady of Perpetual Help Church in Belle Chasse, playing for the Saturday vigil and Sunday morning Masses, and directing the parish’s youth and adult choirs in her role as minister of music.

“On Saturdays I go from the boat to church, and on Sundays I go from church to the boat,” she said. “I’m on the river seven days a week.”

Born and raised across the river from New York City in Fairview, N.J., Fagnano comes from an extended family of musicians. Her Italian-born grandfather was a classical violinist, guitarist and mandolin player; her mother sang in her school and church choirs; and her father moonlighted with his brothers as a trumpeter in the house band of a local restaurant.

“I don’t ever remember not knowing about music,” said Fagnano, who began formal piano lessons at 7. “I remember being barely able to sit on the bench and plucking out little tunes on the piano before I even started school.”

After earning her degree in music education from Jersey City State College and the University of Houston, Fagnano moved to New Orleans in 1988, smitten with a place she had discovered on countless vacations. She also was lured by the many musical opportunities spawned by the city’s hosting of the Republican National Convention that year.

“I loved the jazz. I loved the food. I would go to all the clubs and listen to all the music,” Fagnano recalled in an interview with the Clarion Herald, newspaper of the Archdiocese of New Orleans. “I used to sit in the airport on the way (back to New Jersey) and cry because I didn’t want to leave.”

In 1989, when illness forced the Natchez’s regular calliope player to leave, Fagnano auditioned for the spot.

A professional highlight was her dedication of an extended calliope concert to New Orleans Archbishop Gregory M. Aymond on Aug. 20, the day of his installation at St. Louis Cathedral.

When it comes to her music ministry, Fagnano said she believes the primary purpose of church music is to enhance the liturgy, not to entertain.

“Even the congregational hymns that I select should be appropriate to that day so the music becomes a very vital part of the liturgy,” Fagnano said.

At her parish church, Mass is more than “just showing up, sitting there for an hour and going home. We participate. Our church is a singing church,” Fagnano said.

New board for ancient order

COURTESY PHOTO

Pictured above are the elected officers of the first County Board of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, a Catholic-Irish organization, in North Carolina. They were installed in a special ceremony Sept. 24 at St. Mark's Episcopal parish hall in Huntersville.

The installation was performed by Bruce Thompson, the president for the North Carolina Ancient Order of Hibernians.

A County Board can be formed when there are two or more Ancient Order of Hibernians divisions located in a single county. The two divisions in Mecklenburg County are Sons of Erin division in Charlotte and the St. Brendan the Navigator division in Huntersville.

The new County Board consists of members from both divisions. The president, secretary, treasurer and marshal are selected from the Sons of Erin division. The vice president, financial secretary, standing committee chairman and sentinel are from the division of St. Brendan the Navigator.

The student council collected one can of food per student in conjunction with a fundraiser for a school "dress down" day and the middle school dance. Jeff Smith, maintenance supervisor at the school, delivered the truckload of food to Urban Ministry Sept. 21.

"Our teachers are the ones who reinforce the importance of stewardship to our children on a daily basis" said committee member Karen Lizotte.

The committee will host a similar event in October to honor the catechists of faith formation for middle school and high school. "This is a small way to show our teachers and catechists that we appreciate them," said Lizotte.

The Youth Stewards in Action Committee was formed in 2008 to bring parish and school youth leaders together to improve communication and to create a greater sense of parish-wide community among youth.

The committee meets monthly to highlight a stewardship topic which becomes the focus of the entire parish. The theme is intended to support catechesis in the parish and encourage youth to participate in related discussions and service opportunities. The October theme is Stewardship of Prayer.

AROUND THE DIOCESE

Passing on the Cup

Rules may differ but health safety is common concern

BY DAVID HAINS
DIRECTOR OF COMMUNICATION

CHARLOTTE — With the early outbreak of flu season, parishes around the Diocese of Charlotte are taking different approaches to prevent the spread of the viral illness that brings fever, sore throat and general misery.

Unlike the Diocese of Raleigh, which has banned handshaking during the sign of peace and the consumption of the precious blood of Christ in the Communion cup, parishes in the Diocese of Charlotte are allowed to decide for themselves which practices to follow.

At St. Eugene Church in Asheville, Father Ed Sheridan has asked parishioners not to be offended when someone does not choose to shake hands during Mass. In his weekly bulletin letter, Father Sheridan wrote, "We do not know the reason for their actions but I am sure it is for health reasons and not an unfriendly action. It is very important that we do join our hearts and minds in our prayers, not necessarily our hands. Again, use your good judgment and sensitivity."

The sign of peace, which usually includes handshakes between Mass attendees, is an optional part of the liturgy.

Next door to St. Eugene Church at Asheville Catholic School, a different set of rules is being followed at the weekly Mass. Children, who often carry more germs than adults, are not allowed to hold hands during the Lord's Prayer, exchange handshakes in the sign of peace or consume the precious blood of the cup.

Church teaching specifies that Christ is truly present in the consecrated host and that an individual receives the body, blood, soul and divinity of Christ when receiving Communion under only one species.

At St. Pius X Church in Greensboro, the use of a gymnasium during the construction of a new church has already curtailed the consumption of the precious blood by the laity at Mass.

Tracy Welliver, pastoral associate at St. Pius X Church, says that because of the flu parishioners have been asked to be "mindful and respectful of those around them who may not want to shake hands during the sign of peace."

At St. William Church in Murphy Father George Kloster, the pastor, is taking what he calls a total libertarian approach. "For us it is liturgy as usual," he said. Kloster is leaving decisions about shaking hands and sharing the cup up to parishioner's individual judgment. "If they don't want the cup, they don't have to take it. But if the (flu) situation were to change, we would adapt to whatever information we received from the diocese or the health department."

At St. Matthew Church in Charlotte, an announcement is read before all Masses that states, "St. Matthew has assumed a proactive role in securing the health and well-being of its faith community. To do so, parishioners are individually encouraged to take necessary precautions at their discretion."

Diocesan churches have exercised individual authority over hand shaking and the use of the communal cup during past flu seasons. Bishop Peter J. Jugis said he is continuing to monitor the situation throughout the diocese.

Catholic sports engender excellence

Annual Charlotte Catholic High School awards recognize achievements

BY HEATHER BELLEMORE
INTERIM EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — The outstanding achievements of three individuals and an entire team were honored Sept. 25 with the annual Sports Hall of Fame and Distinguished Alumnus awards at Charlotte Catholic High School (CCHS).

While players from Charlotte Catholic and Olympic high schools took a break at half time at Keffer stadium, the Charlotte Catholic High School Alumni Association honored the 1992 Boys' Varsity Soccer Team; Coach Ken Hazen; and Matt Kerry, class of 1991, for outstanding athletic achievements. Also recognized was Bill Whittaker, class of 1975, who was named Distinguished Alumnus for 2009.

Sports Hall of Fame

Sports Hall of Fame inductees were selected based upon their outstanding athletic achievements at CCHS.

The 1992 Varsity Soccer Team is the first soccer team in CCHS history to win a state championship. With a 26-0-0 season, this team was ranked 19th in the nation by USA Today.

Coach Ken Hazen started teaching and coaching basketball at the high school in 1976 and was named Varsity Men's Basketball Conference Coach of the Year for 1997 and 2000. Hazen has also served as the Varsity Men's Tennis Coach for 32 seasons and 19 consecutive conference championships. Hazen was named Charlotte Observer's Men's Tennis Coach of the Year for 2005 and 2008.

"There's such a sense of community," said Hazen. "The teams at Charlotte Catholic just grow, and the senior members look out for the younger, new members."

Matt Kerry was a three-sport athlete at CCHS, playing football, baseball and basketball. Kerry lettered three years in varsity football, four years in varsity baseball, and two years in varsity basketball.

When asked if his children, two boys aged seven and eight, would attend Charlotte Catholic one day, Kerry responded, "I hope so!"

Distinguished Alumni Award

The 2009 Distinguished Alumnus Award recipient, Bill Whittaker, class of 1975, was honored for excellence demonstrated through his endeavors and his representation of the ideals of CCHS.

After graduating CCHS, Whittaker began a career in the practice of law in 1988. His commitment to service ideals was formally recognized in 2003, when he was named the Mecklenburg County Bar Association Lawyer Referral Service "Attorney of the Year" for distinguished service.

Whittaker made service central to his personal life as well, exemplified by volunteer work with St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Charlotte, the Waxhaw-Weddington Rotary Club, Union County Red Cross, D.A.R.E., Matthews Chamber of Commerce, Matthews Athletic & Recreation Association and many other charitable organizations.

Whittaker contributed to Catholic leadership in the early 1990s through service as assistant leader for Chi Rho, a Catholic student organization at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte. He also serves the university as a current member of the UNC-Charlotte Athletic Association.

In 2000, Whittaker joined the UNC-Charlotte Alumni Association board of directors and spearheaded the establishment of their need-based Dr. Gregory Davis scholarship and endowment. He explained, "This is the first year of the program, which awarded around $10,000 in need-based scholarships."

"It's probably what I am most proud of," said Whittaker.

Looking back at his time at CCHS, Whittaker remembers annual student retreats as the highlights of his education. Despite typical teenager antics, Whittaker said the events were "excellent, spiritual and full of fun," and nurtured positive relationships among the students and mix of clergy and lay teachers.

Regarding the tight-knit community, Whittaker remarked, "There were only 72 (members) in our graduating class." He added, "We felt such a sense of camaraderie."

Protecting the vulnerable

Appreciation for the sanctity and dignity of each unique human life

Respect Life Sunday, this year celebrated on October 4th, is a day set aside for Catholics in the United States to reflect with gratitude on God's priceless gift of human life. It is also an occasion to examine how well we, as a nation and individually, are living up to our obligation to protect the rights of those who, due to age, dependency, poverty or other circumstances, are at risk of their very lives.

In the current debate over health care reform, it has become evident that a number of Americans believe that the lives and health of only some people are worth safeguarding, while other classes of people are viewed as not deserving the same protection. Such an attitude is deplorable, all the more so in the context of health care. Sanctioning discrimination in the quality of care given to different groups of people has no place in medicine, and directly contravenes the ethical norms under which Catholic hospitals and health care providers operate.

Protecting children

Unborn children remain the persons whose lives are most at risk in America: Over one million children each year die in abortion facilities. The Roe v. Wade decision in 1973 rendered states powerless to halt this killing. Thankfully Congress and most states acted to prevent public funding of abortions (with narrowly defined exceptions). Yet despite the opposition of 67% of Americans to taxpayer-funded abortion, all current health care proposals being considered by Congress would allow

Respect Life Sunday

or mandate abortion funding, either through premiums paid into government programs or out of federal revenues.

It bears repeating: Abortion — the direct, intentional killing of an unborn girl or boy — is not health care. Abortion robs an innocent child of his or her life, and robs mothers of their peace and happiness. For 25 years, the Project Rachel post-abortion ministry of the Catholic Church has helped women move beyond their grief and remorse after abortion, helping them find peace by accepting God's forgiveness and by forgiving themselves and others involved in the abortion decision. Abortion funding can only increase the number of dead and grieving.

Protecting immigrants

Unborn children are not the only human beings disfavored under current proposals. Many people insist that undocumented persons living and working in the United States should not be allowed in any new system to purchase health-care coverage, and that poor legal immigrants be denied coverage for the first five years they are in the United States. Do immigrants forfeit their humanity at the border? How can a just society deny basic health care to those living and working among us who need medical attention? It cannot and must not.

Death is not a solution

While most Americans agree that those who cannot afford health insurance should have access to health care, some commentators have gone so far as to suggest offsetting the cost of expanded coverage by curtailing the level of care now given to elderly Americans. Other pundits have suggested that treatment decisions should be based not on the needs of the elderly patient, but on the patient's allegedly low "quality of life" or the cost-effectiveness of treatment calculated over the patient's projected lifespan. Such calculations can ignore the inherent dignity of the person needing care, and undermine the therapeutic relationship between health professionals and their patients.

It should not be surprising that the neglect, and even the death, of some people are offered as a solution to rising health care costs. Population control advocates have long espoused aborting children in the developing world as a misguided means for reducing poverty.

Some environmentalists now claim that the most efficient way to curb global climate change is to make "family planning" more widely available in the developing world. As used by population control advocates, the innocuous term "family planning" includes abortifacient contraceptives, sterilization, and manual vacuum aspiration abortions.

Oregon, where health care for low-income patients is rationed by the state, has denied several patients the costly prescription drugs needed to prolong their lives, while reminding them that the assisted suicide option is conveniently offered under Oregon's health plan.

Many scientists justify the manipulation and killing of embryonic human beings in stem cell research, based on unsubstantiated hopes of finding new cures. Yet the facts increasingly show this approach to pose risks to patients, and to women who may be exploited to provide eggs for the research.

Death is not a solution to life's problems. Only those who are blind to the transcendent reality and meaning of human life could support killing human beings to mitigate economic, social or environmental problems.

Appreciating life

The antidote to such myopia is to recover an appreciation for the sanctity and dignity of each unique human being.

Since the advent of widespread contraception and abortion, a cultural hostility to children has grown. They are often depicted as costly encumbrances who interfere with a carefree adult life. No fewer than six recent books are dedicated to defending the childless-by-choice lifestyle — for selfish reasons, or to counter "overpopulation," a thoroughly discredited myth. In fact, if married couples were to have more children, Medicare and Social Security would not be hurtling toward bankruptcy. Since 1955, because of fewer children and longer life spans, the number of workers has declined relative to the number of beneficiaries, from 8.6 to only 3.1 workers paying benefits to support each beneficiary. Without substantially more young people to enter the work force as young adults, in 25 years, there will be only 2.1 workers supporting each beneficiary. Eliminating our young does not solve problems even on pragmatic grounds. It adds to them.

Children, and those who are dependent on us due to disability or age, offer us the opportunity to grow in patience, kindness, and love. They teach us that life is a shared gift, not an encumbrance. At the end of life, we will be judged on love alone. Meanwhile, in the midst of so many challenges to life, we look to "Christ Jesus our hope" (1 Timothy 1:1), who offers to all the world a share in his victory over death.

Standing for life on the front lines

The example of Jim Pouillon

The front lines are always dangerous. Standing up for a just cause in the face of injustice is uncomfortable at best and deadly at worst. Jim Pouillon knew that.

According to LifeNews.com, almost every weekday for more than 10 years in Owosso, Mich., Pouillon publicly witnessed to the humanity of unborn life by holding a large picture of an unborn baby. With his oxygen tank and leg braces, he prayerfully endured verbal insults and projectiles.

But on Sept. 11, 2009, he paid the ultimate price. While holding a picture of an unborn baby on a public sidewalk in front of Owosso High School, Jim Pouillon was shot to death.

Scant media coverage has kept

Making a Difference

TONY MAGLIANO
CNS COLUMNIST

most Americans in the dark concerning Pouillon's murder. But when an abortionist who makes his or her living killing innocent unborn babies is murdered, it's breaking news.

Killing is not the way of the nonviolent Jesus. Killing an abortionist is gravely immoral. But the killing of unborn babies is also gravely immoral — arguably more immoral.

There's a double standard here. Where are all the news stories about Pouillon's murder?

I have a firsthand sense of what's happening here. Nearly every Thursday I stand with a few men and women on a public sidewalk near an abortion mill in Baltimore. There we pray the rosary and hold large pictures of aborted babies.

From passing motorists we get everything from thumbs up to middle fingers.

We live in a culture that often hides the truth. So when people are presented with the truth — like the reality of what an aborted baby looks like — many react with anger.

But most of the passing motorists are not angry; they are indifferent. It's mostly indifference that keeps the barbaric practice of abortion legal.

Why is it so difficult to persuade

Catholics and other believers to join us on the front lines?

Yes, it's potentially dangerous. But genuine Christianity cannot be lived in a protective shell.

Father Frank Pavone, national director of Priests for Life, told me that "America will not reject abortion until America sees abortion."

Despite the tragic indifference of many, the seeds of pro-life activism are being planted in the consciences of many others who see the horrific pictures of aborted babies.

Jim Pouillon is a modern pro-life martyr. He shed his blood to help end the shedding of the blood of unborn babies.

Tertullian, an early church father, observed that during times of persecution the church's membership grew enormously. He wrote: "The blood of the martyrs is seed."

May Pouillon's death be a seed that inspires many to actively join pro-life efforts — even on the front lines!

Understanding the ‘Word made Flesh’

Participants grow in faith at Eucharistic Congress

Catholics from throughout the diocese and beyond came to St. Peter Church and the Charlotte Convention Center Sept. 25-26 by the thousands to nourish their faith in camaraderie with their fellow Catholics.

They had opportunities to grow closer to the risen Savior by praying and listening to inspiring music and speakers, each part of the program faithfully provided by the annual Eucharistic Congress.

“I look forward to listening to Immaculée Ilibagiza, the woman who found God in the slaughter of Rwanda,” said Hope Ziglar, parishioner of St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte.

“But I also want and need to grow closer to the Lord and improve my spiritual life,” she added.

The theme of this year’s Eucharistic Congress was “The Word Became Flesh and Made His Dwelling Among Us.”

“This means that God Almighty humbled himself to become a human being and lives with us,” said Joannie Newsome, parishioner of St. Mary Church in Sylva.

“He knows our triumphs and failures yet he still loves us, because he understands. Thus he forgives all of our failings — showing that he is, indeed, pure love,” said Newsome.

The speakers in all of the tracks — general, Hispanic, high school, middle school, and children — delivered profound messages to their audiences.

Some were impressed by a direct message to evangelize, as in the Holy Hour homily given by Bishop Felipe Estévez, auxiliary bishop for the archdiocese of Miami.

“Bishop Estévez said that we must continue to spread the word and bring more people into the church, something we can accomplish by showing pride in our Catholicity and the strength of our faith,” said Louis Bauer, parishioner of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.

Others found a strong message of unconditional forgiveness, as in the talk given by Immaculée Ilibagiza.

“(I learned that) our Lady only knows grace and mercy rather than justice,” said Joe Otranto, parishioner of St. Joseph Church in Asheboro.

“Now I will have a renewed devotion to our Lady in daily prayer, especially through devotion to the rosary and her Seven Sorrows,” he added.

Still others enjoyed the message of Father Leo Patalinghug in his talk titled “Grace Before Meals,” which expressed the importance of family meal times for the growth of children’s spirituality and the adhesiveness of family life.

Though participants ranged from the very young to the very old, all had the strong desire to walk with their Eucharistic Lord through the streets of Charlotte. They did it to honor the Lord, whom they love and through whom they increase their faith.

Czechs should resist relativism, consumerism

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI said he hoped that his recent trip to the Czech Republic would help the largely secular country rediscover its Christian roots and resist the evils of relativism and consumerism.

At his general audience in St. Peter’s Square Sept. 30, the pope had warm words for his religious, political and cultural hosts during the three-day trip that took him to Prague, Brno and Stara Boleslav.

Pope Benedict told the faithful gathered in the sunny piazza that his trip had been “both a pilgrimage and a mission.”

The Czech people are undergoing a difficult moment, he said, like the rest of Western Europe. The “long winter” of atheism under 40 years of communist rule has produced “the poisonous effects of a certain secularism and Western consumerism.”

To resist these tendencies, he said, young people should be encouraged to invest their time in charitable and educational activities and to imitate Christ.

Here is the text of the pope’s audience remarks in English.

My Apostolic Journey to the Czech Republic last weekend was both a pilgrimage and a mission. It was a pilgrimage on account of the many saints who bore witness to Christ in the Czech lands through their holy lives, and it was a mission because, at the present time, Europe needs to rediscover the joy and hope that come from following the Lord Jesus. I pray that our liturgical celebrations in Prague’s magnificent Cathedral, in Brno and in Stará Boleslav will have served to deepen the faith and enkindle the Christian commitment of the people of Central Europe, especially the young.

I am most grateful to the civil and ecclesiastical authorities in the Czech Republic who made me so welcome, especially to President Václav Klaus and Cardinal Miloslav Vlk. I was glad to have the opportunity to meet leaders of other Christian communities and to encourage them in the task of ecumenical dialogue. And it was a pleasure to come together with University Rectors and leading figures from the world of culture. I spoke with them of the need for scholarship to be rooted in truth, an integral truth that shuns the limitations of relativism and determinism.

I ask all of you to join me in praying that this visit may bear abundant spiritual fruit for the Czech people and for the unity and peace of the whole continent of Europe.

‘Birth Control Could Help Combat Climate Change’?

In case you missed the above headline of the Sept. 18 news story that originated in London, perhaps you may be interested to know more valuable information. As we enter this month dedicated to Respect for Life issues, let us examine this article in the light of our Catholic faith.

The article, which was circulated on the internet, states, “Giving contraceptives to people in developing countries could help fight climate change by slowing population growth, experts said.” The article also reports that, “More than 200 million women worldwide want contraceptives, but don’t have access to them, according to an editorial published in the British medical journal, Lancet.”

What is the net result of all this unfulfilled desire for contraceptives? The story reports that “76 million unintended pregnancies” occur every year.

The article continues, “If those women had access to free condoms or other birth control methods, that could slow rates of population growth, possibly easing the pressure on the environment, the editors say.”

Without further delay, let us list the assertions of this article that raise suspicion.

First, the piece begins with the assumption that man is responsible for climate change—a common, yet unproven hypothesis.

It also assumes that contraceptives are the answer to slowing population growth.

However, in reality contraceptives often increase sexual activity rather than curb it. Those who rely upon them presume that they offer disease protection and pregnancy prevention without fail and without consequence.

Yet contraceptives are dangerously unreliable and unpredictable. The only reliable aspect of contraceptives is that their use always leads to sin and spiritual death.

The news article also postulates a common and glaringly false assumption that man is created for the world, not the world for mankind.

In other words, one of the common misconceptions of our post-modern age is that man is created to serve the environment, reflective of an unreasonable infatuation with environmental health.

Indeed, the Book of Genesis reveals that man is given proper stewardship over creation by God, but this stewardship is a function of his dominion over creation. Mankind must care for creation, but he is not creation’s slave, he is its master.

Finally, and most heinously, this news story attempts to capitalize on the modern fascination with ecophilia (the love of the environment) in an attempt to halt more children from birth.

Sadly, more than a few Christians and even many who claim to be Catholic have already accepted the lie that contraceptives are good for relationships and marriage. At the same time these people endure the many deleterious side effects of contraceptive use, such as abuse, distrust, indifference, selfishness, and assorted medical problems associated with the contraceptive pill. Despite these facts, articles such as this news story still advance contraception as good for the environment.

As faithful Catholics, we should be able to identify and see through these subtle, yet unmistakably demonic attempts to thwart God’s plan of procreation and life. The fingerprints of the enemy are clearly imprinted on the page of this article.

Eucharist is central to faith, congress

The fifth annual Eucharistic Congress of the Diocese of Charlotte venerated the Blessed Sacrament and made it central to all activities Sept. 25-26. Adoration lasted through the night Friday and continued all day Saturday.

The pinnacle of the congress was the Holy Mass, emphasized in a letter Bishop Peter J. Jugis wrote in anticipation of the weekend's events. He said, "The celebration of the Mass is the center of the whole Christian life, as the General Instruction of the Roman Missal (n. 16) reminds us." Bishop Jugis added, "It is through our participation in the Eucharistic sacrifice that the Lord constantly enlivens us so that we can faithfully do his work in the midst of our secular society."

BELMONT — Lacy Dodd, a 33-year-old banking professional and mother of one, knows precisely where supporters and opponents of legal abortion can find common ground.

It's on nearly four acres donated by the Benedictine monks of Belmont Abbey in Belmont, N.C., where Room at the Inn, a Charlotte-based pregnancy resource center, hopes to build the nation's first campus-based maternity and after-care residence for pregnant college women.

Back in 1999, Dodd was a Notre Dame senior, pregnant and under pressure to have an abortion from the counselor at a local women's clinic and from her boyfriend, also a Notre Dame senior.

CATHOLIC CANONIZATION

Pope Benedict XVI announced that Jeanne Jugan, foundress of the Little Sisters of the Poor, and Blessed Damien de Veuster, a Belgian missionary priest famed for his work with leprosy patients in Hawaii, will both be canonized at the Vatican Oct. 11. Blessed Jeanne (left) is seen in an image provided by her order and Blessed Damien (right) is depicted in a mosaic by Karen Lucas at Immaculate Conception Church in Lihue, Hawaii.

Charity in action

Impact of new saints continues in United States

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The long path to official sainthood is drawing to a close in October for Blessed Damien de Veuster, a missionary priest famed for his work with leprosy patients in Hawaii.

Pope Benedict XVI will canonize him Oct. 11 along with four others, including Blessed Jeanne Jugan, foundress of the Little Sisters of the Poor.

Both Blessed Damien and Blessed Jeanne are important figures for U.S. Catholics, and reflect the pope's priority on the faith as charity in action, especially toward society's outcasts and forgotten.

Neither was born in the United States, but both continue to have a major impact there. Hundreds of U.S. pilgrims will be descending on Rome for the canonization liturgy in St. Peter's Square.

Blessed Damien, a Belgian-born member of the Congregation of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, is renowned for having spent the last 16 years of his life ministering to patients with Hansen's disease, or leprosy, on the island of Molokai in Hawaii. At that time, in the mid-19th century, lepers were considered outcasts and leprosy was an incurable disease.

Blessed Jeanne grew up in revolutionary France and formed a small prayer community. In 1839, at the age of 47, she brought home a sick and blind elderly widow, giving the woman her own bed. Eventually, caring for the abandoned elderly became the primary focus of her religious order, and remains so today for the approximately 2,700

Little Sisters of the Poor.

The two new saints were models of personal holiness and self-sacrifice, and epitomize the church's long record of service in health care. But in their own day they were not necessarily known as heroes.

Blessed Damien sailed for Hawaii in 1864, was ordained a priest and served there for eight years. When a priest was needed for the leprosy settlement on the island of Molokai in 1873, he volunteered. He found himself essentially alone as pastor, doctor, adviser and guardian to the approximately 800 residents suffering from the disease. Many hope he will be named the patron saint of those with HIV/AIDS and leprosy.

For Blessed Jeanne, recognition came long after her death — even in her own religious order. When she died in 1879 the younger members of her order didn't even know she was the foundress. Today she is known as the patron of the elderly, and is seen by many as introducing a unique model of health care delivery that has particular relevance in modern times of costly end-of-life care.

Blessed Jeanne and Blessed Damien seem to embody a favorite theme of Pope Benedict: that Christianity is not merely a "moral code" or a set of rules, but a religion that embodies love of God and neighbor. Although their causes have been under study by church authorities for decades, they are very much saints of this pontificate.

Catholic University president to step down in 2010

Father David O'Connell concludes 12 years

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Vincentian Father David O'Connell, president of The Catholic University of America, announced Oct. 2 that he notified the university's board of trustees he has decided to step down as president next August.

The priest, who is in his 12th year at the helm of the university, indicated he is considering several opportunities for the future but has made no specific commitments.

"That I have had the privilege of serving as the 14th president of The Catholic University of America is an experience that I shall treasure as long as I live," he wrote in his monthly newsletter to the university community.

"As I reflect upon my tenure and service at the helm of the national university of the Catholic Church in our country," he said, "I feel a profound sense of gratitude for what we are and have become and what we do — thanks to the dedication, commitment and hard work of so many people here — and for the many lives we have touched in so many ways over the years."

Detroit Archbishop Allen H. Vigneron, chairman of university's board of trustees, will chair the search process for finding a successor to Father O'Connell, and will be assisted by fellow trustee Paul Chiapparone of Palm Beach, Fla.

According to a university news release, the board hopes to have a new president in place by Sept. 1, 2010.

Aid tied to family planning is 'an abuse of power,' says papal nuncio

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican's chief representative to the United Nations said giving foreign development aid only if a country adopts family planning programs that promote artificial birth control is "an abuse of power."

Speaking at the recent United Nations meeting in New York, Archbishop Celestino Migliore, papal nuncio to the world body, said true development entails respecting human life.

However, in some parts of the world, "development aid seems to be tied rather to the recipient countries' willingness to adopt programs which discourage demographic growth of certain populations by methods and practices disrespectful of human dignity and rights," he said.

In general, it "has been proven to be a naive or cynical and fatal delusion" for leaders to think political, economic and social policies can be forged and managed without any ethical framework aimed at protecting the rights and dignity of all people, he said.

Meanwhile, Archbishop Silvano Tomasi, the Vatican's representative to U.N. agencies in Geneva, addressed the needs of the millions of refugees and displaced peoples around the world.

He said that people who have been forced to migrate "urgently need access to opportunities affording integral human development."

If host countries and donors invest in more educational and vocational development programs for forcibly displaced people, then they will be helping alleviate some of the problems and the "negative conditions that caused these and other populations to move in the first place," he said.

CHARLOTTE — Join Fr. Patrick Hoare for Encyclical Tuesdays in November from 7-9 p.m. in the education wing at St. John Neumann Church, 8451 Idlewild Rd., as he explores Pope Benedict's third encyclical, "Caritas in Veritate." This encyclical calls us to see the relationship between human and environmental ecologies while linking charity and truth to the pursuit of justice, the common good, and authentic human development. Materials will be provided for this series of workshops. To reserve a space, call (704) 535-4197.

CHARLOTTE — The 2009 Blanket Banquet will be held on the front steps of St. Peter Church, 507 S. Tryon St., Oct. 24 from 2 to 4 p.m. Catholics from various Charlotte area parishes are invited to help keep the homeless warm this winter by contributing extra blankets, sleeping bags, gently used coats and backpacks, as well as new undergarments and socks for both men and women. All are invited to come to the fellowship reception to distribute the items and share refreshments with brothers and sisters in need. For more information, call Linda Flynn at (704) 366-9889.

GASTONIA VICARIATE

GASTONIA — A statue of Our Lady of Fatima, which was made in Portugal, is available for weekly home visitations from St. Michael the Archangel Church, 708 St. Michael's Lane. The statue can be taken to your home for one week beginning on Saturday evening or Sunday morning and must be returned the following Saturday by 5 p.m. Families are encouraged to use their week as an opportunity to pray for the intercession of our Blessed Mother. For more information, contact Deacon Art or Rosemary Kingsley at (828) 713-4341.

GREENSBORO VICARIATE

GREENSBORO — A charismatic healing Mass at Our Lady of Grace Church, 2205 West Market St., will be held Oct. 17 from 1 to 3 p.m. The celebrant for the Mass will be Father Fidel Melo with guest speaker Richard Collins, OLG parishioner, and music provided by Freeway. Healing teams will be available for personal ministry after the Mass. This Mass is sponsored by the parish health ministry and the Flames of Fire prayer group. For more information, contact Ben D'Apollo at (336) 812-3730.

GREENSBORO — A public rosary crusade to honor Our Lady of Fatima and pray for our nation will take place every Saturday in October at the corner of Hwy. 68 and Skeet Club Rd. at 11:45 a.m. St. Louis de Montfort said, "Public prayer is far more powerful than private prayer to appease the anger of God and call down his mercy, and holy mother church, guided by the Holy Ghost, has always advocated public prayer in times of public tragedy and suffering." Parking is available in the Big Lots parking lot. For more information, contact Ann Keefe at (336) 434-4174.

HIGH POINT — A fall session of HOSEA (Hope of Seeing Everyone Again) will be held at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church, 4145 Johnson St., Wednesdays from 7:15 to 9 p.m. beginning Oct. 21 and running for six weeks. If you, or someone you know has been away from the Catholic Church but might want to come back, HOSEA is a small group setting where one can ask questions, get answers and find out what is new since they have been away. For information, call Jan Hitch at (336) 884-5097.

WINSTON-SALEM VICARIATE

WINSTON-SALEM — St. Leo the Great Church, 335 Springdale Ave., will be holding a free seminar on "How to Find the Hidden Job Market" Oct. 27. There is no charge for the seminar and dinner is included. This outreach effort is designed to meet the needs of the unemployed/under-employed throughout the Diocese of Charlotte. For more information, contact the church office at (336) 724-0561.

Is your parish or school sponsoring a free event open to the general public? Deadline for all submissions for the Diocesan Planner is 10 days prior to desired publication date. Submit in writing to kmmoore@charlottediocese.org or fax to (704) 370-3382.

Holy See urges 'nuclear-weapons-free zone' in Middle East

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A Vatican official called for the establishment of a "nuclear-free zone" in the Middle East and urged all countries to work toward total elimination of their nuclear arsenals.

Archbishop Dominique Mamberti, the Vatican's foreign affairs minister, released a statement Sept. 24 outlining the Vatican stance on nuclear disarmament. The U.N. Security Council held a summit the same day to discuss nuclear disarmament and nuclear nonproliferation.

"Nuclear-weapons-free zones are the best example of trust, confidence and affirmation that peace and security are possible without nuclear weapons," said Archbishop Mamberti. He strongly encouraged all countries with nuclear capabilities to adopt all the protocols of nuclear-free treaties and to "establish such a zone in the Middle East."

Under the treaties, nations agree to ban the development and use of nuclear weapons in a set location. The United States has not signed such a treaty. It has, however, signed the Non-Proliferation Treaty, which aims at limiting the spread of nuclear weapons.

The Security Council summit adopted a resolution to stop the spread of nuclear weapons, calling for tighter controls on nuclear materials and encouraging the enforcement of international treaties dealing with nuclear nonproliferation.

Archbishop Mamberti said that responding to the modern world's need for safety and security "demands courageous leadership in reducing nuclear arsenals to zero."

He said the adoption of the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty is of "highest importance," adding that the universal banning of explosions of nuclear components in the testing phase "would inhibit the development of nuclear weapons, contributing to nuclear disarmament."

The summit was held in conjunction with the Conference on Facilitating the Entry into Force of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty and preceded the 2010 Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty Review Conference, which aims to promote universal adherence to the treaty.

Synod synchronization

Synod calls Africans to justice, peace

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — "On a continent, parts of which live under the shadow of conflict and death, the church must sow seeds of life," said Cardinal Peter Turkson of Cape Coast, Ghana, as he opened the work of the second special Synod of Bishops for Africa Oct. 5.

Before the cardinal spoke to the synod assembly, Pope Benedict XVI opened the meeting with a spiritual reflection, calling the synod members to listen to the Holy Spirit and to recognize that every blessing and every challenge is a result of human beings' relationship with God.

"We become Christians only if our faith is transformed into charity," he said.

Pope Benedict asked the synod members to work to ensure that the love of God, which is offered to all men and women, is able to cross boundaries of ethnicity, tribe and social class in Africa.

Respect Life Sunday kicks off new program unplanned and crisis pregnancies.

The coincidence of the name St. Gabriel for the new project seemed a "natural connection" said Father Francis "Frank" O'Rourke, pastor of St. Gabriel Church.

"It was as if the Holy Spirit was leading us," said Mary Lou Powers, Respect Life Committee chair for St. Gabriel Church.

Father O'Rourke and Powers contacted Catholic Social Services to find a hands-on way to engage their parish in Respect Life month. The Gabriel Project name caught their attention and they decided to help launch the pilot program at the parish.

Gabriel, the archangel who brought news to Mary of her pregnancy with Jesus, is a logical naming choice for a program which organizes concrete support services for unplanned and crisis pregnancies. Parish members trained in providing compassionate, practical help are called Gabriel Angels.

Through Catholic Social Services, the program also provides trained counseling, assistance with natural family planning, adoption and infant foster care, medical care referrals, mother and baby assistance (such as diapers and layettes), and Rachel's Vineyard services for post abortion healing and reconciliation.

"There are so many aspects to becoming involved, so many opportunities to match up gifts and interests and 'plug in' to support women in need," said Father O'Rourke. "It is very important that we, as Catholic Christians who respect life, show mothers with unplanned or crisis pregnancies that they have the support of our parish, whatever their religious affiliation, in their time of need."

During all Masses for Respect Life Sunday, The Gabriel Project was introduced and parishioners were encouraged to visit sign-up tables. Answering questions at the tables were Catholic Social Services staff members Maggie Nadol, director of Respect Life; Geri King, director for the Charlotte Regional Office; and Jeannie Beall, director of adoptions and social work supervisor for the Charlotte Regional Office.

Colorful signboards prominently displayed The Gabriel Project artwork as parishioners signed up to become Gabriel Angels, offer prayers, and organize baby showers to collect items like maternity clothes, new car seats, mattresses, cribs, diapers, formula and baby clothes.

The parish has designated Oct. 24 as an inaugural Gabriel Angels training session, facilitated by Catholic Social Services.

Project. Parishioners also have plans for parish-wide service projects to collect additional items.

Support for the project has also spread to St. Luke Church in Mint Hill, whose book club held a September baby shower and collected several items.

The group read "Silent Tears" by Kay Pratt, who spoke to the group of her passion for working with children during her five years in China. Book club facilitator Marilyn Armstrong said the group felt inspired to do something for children in this country, so they contacted Catholic Social Services and learned of The Gabriel Project from Geri King. More than 20 ladies brought baby items which served as the first donations to the mother and baby assistance portion of The Gabriel Project.

"Although it was hard to pass up buying the adorable baby outfits, I remember never having enough onesies and wanting enough pacifiers to stash everywhere!" said Pam Cavallero, St. Luke book club member who opted to bring practical necessities.

Reflecting on the women who will benefit from The Gabriel Project, Cavallero said, "I cannot imagine the pressure and just plain fear a woman must experience facing a pregnancy and birth alone. Or what she must perceive as being alone."

Cavallero continued, "Our church teachings tell us to respect life, all life, and to me that includes the everyday life and spiritual life of these women facing this challenging situation.

"If we ask them to accept this new life as a gift, shouldn't we do everything we can to support them on their journeys?" added Cavallero.

"The Gabriel Project is a way that we can reach out to these women and let them know they are not alone. Ultimately, it is a way for us to 'live out our faith' and act upon our beliefs," she said. "We can all play a part in building the kingdom here on earth, one heart and one life at a time."

Planned center to care for pregnant college women

She never considered abortion, and with the help of supportive family and friends, is now the proud mother of a 9-year-old daughter, whose name she prefers not to make public.

Dodd told her story to Catholic News Service and to radio listeners on Christopher Closeup, the half-hour weekly radio interview produced by the Christophers, available online as a podcast at www.christophers.org/CloseupPodcast.

"The great unique thing about our project is that it's nonpartisan, it's an initiative that everyone can support," Dodd told CNS. "Pro-life or pro-choice, if we want women to feel that they have a choice, this is where we can all agree."

"The lack of resources is a huge cause of abortion," she added. "If women feel that they don't have the emotional resources, the financial resources, the educational resources" that they need to choose to give birth, "we can focus on giving them that choice."

When Dodd and her daughter moved to Charlotte, she said she "finally had some stability in (her) life" and "felt called to get involved with a pregnancy resource center." That led her to Room at the Inn, the only Catholic pregnancy resource and maternity after-care facility in Charlotte.

Prompted by studies that showed that most young women do not perceive college campuses as places where pregnant students can get support, even when such resources are actually available, and thanks to the monks' donation of the land in 2005, the Room at the Inn board began a $3 million capital campaign to build a residence that they hope will be a national model for other college campuses.

vocational schools in the region — will have two residential wings housing up to 15 mothers, 15 infants and eight toddlers, as well as a chapel, laundry, playroom, kitchen and family-style dining room. Staff members with social work backgrounds will be on duty 24 hours a day.

The capital campaign is about halfway to its $3 million goal, Dodd said, adding that she hopes it will be a model for other Catholic colleges nationwide, including her alma mater, Notre Dame.

She said she is encouraged by the decision of Holy Cross Father John Jenkins, president of the University of Notre Dame, to form a task force on supporting the choice for life in order to recommend ways that the university can support the sanctity of life.

"I hope this is an initiative that Father Jenkins' task force will consider, because it would meet the goals of the task force," Dodd said.

"This is a way that campus administrators can start walking the walk to help" pregnant women and parenting students, she added.

Office of Economic Opportunity to celebrate tenth anniversary

BY HEATHER BELLEMORE
INTERIM EDITOR

MURPHY — The Office of Economic Opportunity for Catholic Social Services in the Diocese of Charlotte will celebrate its tenth anniversary at the Bishop Begley Center in Murphy during the fourth annual Bishop Begley Conference on Appalachia Oct. 23-24.

This organization brings community and faith leaders together to build trust and share skills and scarce resources to address community needs. It operates based on the generosity of parishioners throughout the diocese who support Office of Economic Opportunity efforts with their contributions.

Monsignor Mauricio West, chancellor and vicar general of the Diocese of Charlotte, established the Office of Economic Opportunity in Murphy when Good Shepherd Home Health Care and Hospice closed. Msgr. West led community dialogue and planning efforts for more than a year before the Office of Economic Opportunity was launched Oct. 1999.

Catholic Charities USA honored the Office of Economic Opportunity with a family strengthening award in 2007. A variety of Catholic Charities agencies sent representatives from as far away as the Virgin Islands to Murphy to learn more about the Office of Economic Opportunity.

The strength and effectiveness of the Office of Economic Opportunity lies in its partnerships with other organizations, churches, and community leaders.

"It is truly an ecumenical effort and an example of networking at its best," said Father George Kloster, pastor of St. William Church, Murphy, and Immaculate Heart of Mary Mission, Hayesville.

Medical specialists address pro-life issues life issues. Hosted by Holy Angels Church, the conference included lectures by medical specialists in psychiatry, palliative care and fertility treatment.

Abortion and health

The conference convened with a presentation by psychiatrist Dr. Martha Shuping from Winston-Salem on "The Correlation Between Abortion and Mood-Altering Effects."

Shuping, an internationally recognized expert in post-abortion issues who has given medical testimony regarding the health effects of abortion to the Houses of Representatives of South Dakota and Maryland, explained how abortion is a huge risk factor for women's mental health.

"Women," Shuping said, "experience more stress from abortion than from rape." Focusing on psychiatric illness, she stated factors such as perceived coercion, existing mental illness, ambivalence about the abortion, a prior intention to have the baby, and adolescence all put women at higher risk for emotional side effects.

"Women who have had abortions experience anxiety, difficulty sleeping and a high rate of alcoholism and substance abuse, in addition to arthritis and heart disease," said Shuping.

"Women may also suffer from depression, causing them to drop out of school or to lose their jobs," she added.

Stem cell ethics

After a break for lunch, Greenville, SC palliative care specialist Dr. Mark O'Rourke, a former hospice medical director, addressed "Human Embryonic Stem Cell Ethics and Politics in 2009."

O'Rourke stated that human embryonic stem cell research is unjustifiable, mentioning that "the human embryo is a life, three to five days old."

While the Ten Commandments dictate "Thou shall not kill," the medical profession rejects utilitarian ethics, O'Rourke continued.

He expounded, "In fact, the medical profession goes out of its way to protect human life, rejecting the exploitation of organs from individuals on death row."

O'Rourke drew his talk to a close by stating, "since President Obama's executive order this year to support and conduct human embryonic stem cell research, extraordinary education is required on the unethical nature of the practice."

Fertility and medicine

Dr. Patrick Yeung, an expert in fertility awareness methods at the Duke Center for Minimally Invasive Gynecologic Surgery, concluded the day's event with the question: "What is Catholic medicine?"

Citing Pope Paul VI's well-known encyclical "Humanae Vitae," Yeung said, "The two ends of the marital embrace are babies and bonding, procreative and unitive."

Yeung added, "Good ethics is good medicine."

Yeung cited "The Medical and Surgical Practice of NaProTechnology" by Dr. Thomas Hilgers, a member of the Pontifical Academy for Life.

Natural procreative technology identifies the problems and cooperates with a woman's fertility, correcting the condition, maintaining the human ecology and sustaining the procreative potential.

Bishop issues flu precautions

BY DAVID HAINS
DIRECTOR OF COMMUNICATIONS

CHARLOTTE — Bishop Peter J. Jugis has issued flu season guidelines for pastors and parishioners. These guidelines will lead to minor changes in the celebration of the Mass.

The Diocese of Charlotte, with the rest of the country, is making adjustments to accommodate the early onset of the annual flu season and the presence of the H1N1 swine flu virus.

Guidelines from Bishop Jugis address hand-shaking, hand-holding, and drinking from the Communion chalice of the precious blood.

Priests received an email of the guidelines Oct. 2. The full text of the bishop's letter follows.

Dear Brothers and Sisters in Christ,

Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

As we enter into the flu season, I write to ask you to exercise special precautions during the celebration of the Mass in order to limit the spread of the flu virus.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention remind us that the influenza virus is spread when a person who has the flu coughs, sneezes, or speaks and spreads the virus into the air, and other people inhale the virus. The virus is also spread when a person touches a surface with flu viruses on it and then touches his or her nose or mouth. Adults may be contagious from one day before developing symptoms to up to seven days after getting sick. Children can be contagious for longer than seven days.

Those persons who are sick with the flu should exercise consideration for their fellow parishioners and remain home so as to prevent spread of the virus.

Those persons who suspect they have been exposed to the virus should refrain from holding hands during Mass. Since the instructions for the celebration of Mass do not envision holding hands during the Our Father, holding hands is not required. Those persons who suspect they have been exposed to the virus should also refrain from the handshake at the sign of peace, so as not to transmit the flu virus through hand-to-hand contact. Those persons whose health would be seriously compromised by contracting the flu virus should also refrain from such hand-to-hand contact.

Those persons who suspect they have been exposed to the virus should not drink from the chalice at the time of Holy Communion. Christ is received whole and entire in the consecrated Host and in the Precious Blood. As regards the reception of the Sacred Host, the communicant retains the right to receive either on the tongue or in the hand.

If pastoral need suggests it, pastors may suspend the practice of holding hands, and the handshake at the sign of peace, and drinking from the chalice.

If the priest decides to give Holy Communion by intinction, the communicant does not receive the Host in the hand, but only on the tongue. The communicant is not permitted to intinct the Sacred Host into the Precious Blood. The procedure to be used for intinction is found in the General Instruction of the Roman Missal, n. 287.

All those who distribute Holy Communion should wash their hands before Mass begins. As a further precaution they may clean their hands again by using an alcohol-based antibacterial solution before distributing Holy Communion. After distributing Holy Communion they should purify their fingers using an ablution cup, and then may proceed to use the alcohol-based anti-bacterial solution again.

I am grateful for your attention to these important matters. The Eucharist is the sacrament of the Paschal Mystery of the suffering, death and resurrection of Christ, and deserves our utmost care and reverence. May our participation in the celebration of the Eucharist help us grow in love as one family in Christ.

Sincerely yours in Christ,

+ Peter J. Jugis

KNIGHT OF HONOR

Special Olympian Rusty Corley (right), a fourth-degree Knight of Columbus, marches in with the honor guard last month during the opening day of the Miracle Field in High Point.

Knight to remember

Rusty Corley follows in his father's footsteps

BY JIMMY TOMLIN
HIGH POINT ENTERPRISE

HIGH POINT — Rusty Corley figures his dad, Fred, would have been proud.

Amid all the fanfare of opening day Saturday at the new High Point Miracle Field, an especially poignant story unfolded quietly during the opening ceremonies: Corley, a longtime Special Olympian, served in the Knights of Columbus Honor Guard — his first time for the distinction.

"It was a really neat experience," says Corley, 31, of High Point. "I'm sure (my father) would've been proud."

It may not seem like much, but don't miss the significance of the moment: On a field designed to let children with disabilities play baseball — something most kids take for granted — a young man with disabilities of his own served in the honor guard — something most Knights of Columbus probably take for granted.

"He was just beaming," said Deborah Weithofer, who attends Immaculate Heart of Mary Church with Corley.

Corley, who was adopted by Fred and Bea Corley, was especially close to his dad, who for many years was immersed in the Knights of Columbus, a Catholic fraternal service organization. The elder Corley was a fourth-degree Knight and served as Grand Knight, and in 1986 the Corley family was named the International Family of the Year for the Knights of Columbus.

Naturally, the younger Corley wanted to follow in his father's footsteps, so he, too, joined the Knights of Columbus. Like his father, he attained the level of fourth-degree Knight last October, a little over a year after his father's death. Once he became a fourth-degree Knight, he was eligible to serve in the honor guard, and he got that chance Saturday.

Corley wore a tuxedo donated by the wife of a former Knight, as well as regalia once worn by a Knight who lived in the Asheboro area. Weithofer altered the tuxedo for Corley and helped him with the regalia.

"We worked on it to get it ready, so he could be part of the honor guard for the Miracle Field," says Weithofer, whose husband, Frank, also was part of the honor guard.

The local Knights of Columbus have taken good care of Corley, especially since his father died. They provide transportation for him to get to and from meetings, and help him in other ways as well.

"Rusty has stayed very involved in the Knights of Columbus, and they've taken very good care of him, which I think is an honor to my dad," says Corley's sister, Erin Boger of Wallburg. "I think my dad would've been very proud of Rusty on Saturday."

Missionary Sister, 52, uses unusual background to help Poorest of the Poor in Haiti

Sr. Irene Clare Duval knew she wanted to be a nun since she was 8 years old, but it wasn't until she was 48 that she joined the Missionaries of the Poor, Sisters. During the four decades in between she served in the U.S. military, went to college and worked for the New York City police department as a drug chemist.

Though she still isn't sure why God told her to wait so long, she knows now that the things she learned while she was waiting help her serve the poor in Haiti better.

"I could ask why for the rest of my life," says Sr. Irene in something in between a Haitian and Brooklyn accent. "But the way I see it, God's timing is perfect and he had me go through what I have for a reason."

"Besides, I figure I'll live until about 112, so I have lots more life to give to God," the 52-year-old says with a broad smile.

Sr. Irene is known now as the dynamic Catholic sister who transformed the lives of hundreds of families in Viloux, a small, remote village in the mountains of southern Haiti. She began important social programs where none existed.

Sr. Irene was born in Haiti but moved with her family to New York when she was in sixth grade. In Haiti she had always attended Catholic school — where she first realized she wanted to be a nun — but in New York her parents could only afford to send her and her siblings to public school.

"I used to get beat up every day at school because I looked and talked different from everyone in my class," Sr. Irene says. "I quickly learned how to deal with bullies — a skill that still serves me well today."

After graduating high school, she considered joining a convent, but she was shy and says "it just didn't feel like the right time."

Instead she joined the U.S. army reserves and went to Pratt University in Brooklyn to study chemical engineering. After graduating, she made a pact with God, promising to join an order and help the poor after she paid off her student loans — a task that took more than 15 years. In the meantime, she worked for the City of New York's Department of Environmental Protection and then for the New York Police Department's drug testing lab.

"My classmates and coworkers always used to ask why I'd want to give up my great job and become a nun. They asked how I'd have money to live," Sr. Irene recalls. "I just smiled and told them that I had the ultimate sugar daddy — Jesus."

Finally, at age 48, Sr. Irene joined the Missionaries of the Poor Sisters. Just two years later she was sent to Haiti to begin the outreach work she had promised God she would do. And she kept her promise in a big way (see feature on opposite page).

She started a school feeding program that provides meals to 121 children, most of whom were going days without food before she arrived. She opened up the local government school to more children by hiring additional teachers and launched a dispensary, doling out medicine and care to families who had nowhere to turn when they got sick.

Sr. Irene is also planting spiritual seeds. She's begun a new order in the area and already has 53 vocations.

"Everything I've done in my life has come into play in my mission. I'm not working as an engineer, but it's like my studies — it all comes into play," Sr. Irene says. "People are always coming to me with some need. I'm able to help because of the varied experiences I've had. I think that was God's plan."

One thing Sr. Irene has learned over her life is the importance of prayer. She says it is especially helpful when she makes the trip to Viloux each week. She takes the tap-tap — an overcrowded public bus — then walks the last hour-and-a-half through rocky roads winding up the mountains.

"Prayer is my lifeline," she explains. "Over and over, I've seen how powerful prayer is."

Through her strong faith in God and rich life experiences Sr. Irene works diligently to help Haiti's poor, despite the challenges. But she wouldn't be able to do her important work for Christ without Cross International Catholic Outreach, a U.S.-based relief ministry that funds the bulk of her outreach programs. Without the support Cross provides, Sr. Irene would have never been able to help Viloux or its people, she says.

"Cross is committed to helping strong Catholic missionaries like Sr. Irene," says Jim Cavnar, Cross president. "One of the most important aspects of our work with the poor is supporting small ministries doing great things, ministries that would not be able to run without the support of our donors. We are thankful for the unique opportunity we have to help these ministries grow."

And that's good news for Sr. Irene, who has finally found her true calling in Haiti.

"God is joy, and where you find joy that's where God wants you to be," Sr. Irene says, smiling from ear to ear. "I'm so happy here — serving the poor of Haiti in God's name."

Cross Recognized, Endorsed by U.S. Catholic Bishops

As Cross International Catholic Outreach has continued to extend the range of its relief work to help the poor overseas, a growing number of Catholic bishops in the United States are taking notice and commending the organization for its efforts.

"We've had many endorsement letters come in the last year or so, and our staff is encouraged by the kind words and well wishes these bishops have shared," explained James Cavnar, president of Cross International Catholic Outreach. "It motivates us to want to push harder and do even more."

Most Reverend Gerald Barbarito shared: "Seeing Christ in the poor and extending assistance in His name is the very core of what we are about as Church. You are to be commended."

Cardinal Daniel DiNardo of was equally enthusiastic, saying: "Your ministry is a fine example of how the Church is called to respond to the needs of the poorest of the poor throughout the world by offering hope in the name of the entire Catholic Community. By standing in solidarity we witness Christ's love for all, as was expressed in the Holy Father's encyclical, 'Deus Caritas Est.'"

Most Reverend Tod Brown has a similar position, explaining: "As a universal Church, it is our duty to become aware of and support the missionary works of the church. I heartily endorse Cross International Catholic Outreach, its worthwhile mission and its dedicated preachers."

Most Reverend Curtis Gillory, singled out the ministry's good stewardship of funds, saying: "I realize the great assistance that Cross International Catholic Outreach provides for the poor at a very cost effective rate. I want to be supportive of Cross in whatever way we are able to do so."

Cavnar is inspired by these endorsements and the notes of encouragement coming in from other U.S. bishops, but he feels the praise should really be aimed at the thousands of American Catholics who contribute to Cross and make the ministry's work possible.

"None of what we do would be possible without the donations we receive from the men, women and children in parishes from across this country. Those gifts, large or small, are what give us the financial power to send the food, dig the wells for water, build the houses, deliver the medicines, open the schools — everything," Cavnar said. "I say, God bless those benefactors. God bless their generosity and their willingness to sacrifice for the benefit of others. Their commitment to helping the poor has made all of this possible."

His Eminence William Cardinal Keeler at a recent meeting with Pope Benedict XVI. Cardinal Keeler is now the official patron of Cross International Catholic Outreach.

Catholics Bring Light in Haiti's Darkest Hour

Despite overwhelming adversity, Catholic leaders are making a difference in the lives of Haiti's poor

Two-year-old Kiel's screams cut through the clear morning air, his eyes full of tears and red from crying. His sister Lysins, 5, makes silly faces, hoping for a smile — but gets only more cries.

"He's hungry," says Enita, 7, his other sister, as she rocks him in her arms. "We are all hungry."

Though their mother works as a maid, making the equivalent of $20 a month, her meager earnings are hardly enough to feed her eight children, especially now that food prices in Haiti have more than doubled in the last year.

Though Haiti has long carried the designation of the poorest country in the Western Hemisphere, its problems have intensified over the last year. Rising food prices have led to widespread hunger — several news reports told of Haitian's eating "dirt cookies" to survive. In April and mid July protests broke out against the staggering price of staple foods such as rice, some turning violent. Recently, the country was affected by four storms in less than a month, which killed at least 600 people. Widespread flooding from the hurricanes and tropical storms destroyed crops, intensifying the food crisis, and left hundreds of thousands of Haitians without homes.

But in what seems to be Haiti's darkest hour rays of light are shining through. A bevy of social outreach ministries led by strong Catholic missionaries are making a difference.

"Things are better now that sister is here," says 14-year-old Sanette Labossiere, who partakes in a parish-run feeding program at her school in Viloux, a small, remote village in the mountains of southern Haiti. "We eat every day now."

Sr. Irene Clare Duval, part of the Missionaries of the Poor Sisters, provides hot, nutritious meals to 121 children in Viloux through this school feeding program. The outreach is one of several she began for the people in the area after she arrived in Haiti over a year ago.

"I saw what needed to be done, and I did it," Sr. Irene says. "Malnutrition is a big problem here, like in the rest of Haiti."

Cross International Catholic Outreach, an aid organization that ministers to the poor by partnering with Catholic missionaries around the world, helped Sr. Irene start her outreach programs with cash grants raised through U.S. donors.

"Cross gave me the resources I needed to begin my work," she says. "Without their help, I would never have been able to meet the profound needs of these people."

Before Sr. Irene came to this remote village, which is about an hour's drive through rugged terrain from Haiti's main southern town Les Cayes, there were no teachers in the school, no medicine for the sick and most children would go days without a meal.

"These people had no one to help them," says Sr. Irene, who opened a dispensary from the Catholic mission in Viloux and now pays the salaries of three teachers at the local school. "If I don't, who will?"

That question is exactly what led Fr. Marc, a former U.S. Navy chaplain, to give up his career, move to Haiti and start an orphanage for street children in Les Cayes. He now cares for nearly 700 children, providing them with shelter, food and a chance at a new life.

"I sometimes wonder what all these children would do without this ministry," Fr. Marc says. "Anytime I get discouraged I just

In Haiti, many poor children depend on Catholic outreaches for "their daily bread." There is no other place for these families to turn for help.

remember that we are making a difference and that we are fulfilling God's commission to help the poor."

And theirs is help Haiti desperately needs, especially when it comes to health care. Haiti ranks 146th out of 177 countries in the UN's latest Human Development index. Study after study has shown that women and children bear the brunt of the country's health woes.

Haiti's maternal mortality ratio is 630 per 100,000 live births (compared to eight women in 100,000 in the US), and it has the highest rates of mortality for infants and children under 5 in the Americas, according to UNICEF. These death rates are so high because few pregnant women in Haiti have access to medical care while giving birth. They are either too far away from a hospital when they go into labor, or cannot afford it. This is compounded by the fact that there is one obstetrician for every 40,000 people.

Before the Haitian Health Foundation (HHF) began working in Jeremie, a large, rural town in Haiti's Grand Anse region, mother and child mortality rates soared. It was common for pregnant women in labor to bleed to death as they were transported in wicker chairs down the mountain on the way to the hospital. The lives of more than 200 women have been saved since HHF bought an ambulance to transport these women — theirs is the only emergency vehicle in the region.

"We're here because of the poor, to bring them what they couldn't otherwise get," says Sister Maryann Berard, a Franciscan nun and the administrator for HHF, a Catholic outreach organization running more than 100 programs to improve the health of Haiti's women and children. "The people who come to us keep us motivated. When you see people healthier and smiling it's worth it."

Though their faith in God and the progress they see in the people they help keep them going, these Catholic missionaries need help. Without the financial support of American Catholics and U.S.-based ministries they wouldn't have the resources to do their important work.

"Despite the heartaches and tremendous pressures these Catholic missionaries face every day, they obey God's calling to help the hurting people of Haiti with earnest compassion and without reservation," says Jim Cavnar, president of Cross, which supports Sr. Irene, Fr. Marc and HHF in their work for Christ. "We count it a privilege to be a partner with them in their holy work."

A living mosaic

Acclaimed Jesuit artist creates campus chapel mosaic

FAIRFIELD, Conn. (CNS) — In the late summer of 2008 acclaimed Jesuit artist Father Marko I. Rupnik arrived at Sacred Heart University in Fairfield with a team of 15 artists and craftspeople.

When they departed from the campus about two weeks later, they left a work of light, joy and beauty: large-scale mosaics in the university's new Chapel of the Holy Spirit.

The university formally dedicated the chapel this year, with Bishop William E. Lori of Bridgeport as principal celebrant of the recent rite of dedication.

Four years in the planning, the mosaics are the centerpiece of the $17 million chapel at the heart of the Sacred Heart campus. Composed of hundreds of thousands of pieces of stone, tile and glass, the mosaics depict the central themes of Christian belief — the Incarnation, Resurrection and Pentecost.

"By devoting such a visible, central location to the chapel, Sacred Heart makes a proud, strong statement about the role of faith in today's campus life, influencing how students learn, how they interact, and how they live on campus and in the world," Anthony Cerna, president of Sacred Heart University, said in an interview last year with the Fairfield County Catholic, Bridgeport's diocesan newspaper.

The chapel itself was designed by Sasaki Associates, an architectural firm that won first place in an international design competition for the 2008 Olympic Games in Beijing.

In all, the mosaics cover 2,690 square feet and represent the largest Rupnik installation in the United States.

The Slovenian-born Father Rupnik gained international attention when he was chosen by Pope John Paul II to restore the mosaics in the Redemptoris Mater chapel in the papal household.

Father Rupnik's work can also be seen at the Marian shrines in Lourdes, France, and Fatima, Portugal. His only other American work is in the Knights of Columbus Chapel in the fraternal organization's New Haven headquarters.

Father Rupnik, who has been credited with creating work that bridges Eastern and Western sensibilities, said that such a mosaic "is an act of remembering" that links faith communities of the past and present, and speaks to the power of faith and spirituality across generations.

"It affirms the ability of the senses to discover the spirit and bring you to a higher level toward the mystery of God," he said. "This act of observing and praying unites us with God through the mystery of his birth, sacrifice, suffering and death."

"The church is a living mosaic," concluded Father Rupnik, who unites art and prayer in his work and worship. "I like making things that are beautiful. The church has a special wisdom because Christ is living in history. Beauty can help reveal this truth."

Trust in God

Assurance that God's grace is poured out

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

There's a proverb I've often heard people cite when they have to confidently make a quick but potentially risky decision: "It's easier to ask for forgiveness than for permission." I admit that I've had to fall back on this maxim myself occasionally. It gives me a sense of confidence (or is it bravado?) when the deliberating has been done; it's time for action, and I know that I'll ultimately be accountable for the risk.

In the Gospel, when James and John approached Jesus, making the seemingly outrageous appeal to be seated at his right and his left hands, their request may have been delivered with a certain amount of bravado (thereby prompting indignation from the other 10 disciples). But Jesus did not dismiss them out of hand. Rather, he took advantage of a prime teaching opportunity.

The confidence to which the psalmist and the author of Hebrews refer is much more than bravado. I am reminded of the origins of the word "confidence" — coming from the Latin "cum fidere" — meaning "with trust." In this sense, one's confidence is placed in God whose throne is grace and whose love is kind and merciful. According to the psalmist, it is precisely when we place our trust in God that God's mercy is upon us.

Jesus qualified James' and John's request by making clear that a share in his glory comes only when one places one's self at the service of others. The world often views servitude as weakness.

But a disciple who places confidence in the Son of God — a "high priest" who has been "tested in every way" and can sympathize with weakness — has the assurance that God's grace is poured out because of trust.

QUESTIONS:

In what area of your life are you most in need of God's mercy and grace right now? What is the greatest obstacle to your being the kind of servant Jesus describes?

Boston priests debut movie-review TV series

Catholic reviews highlight classic, current films

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Everybody's a critic, so the saying goes.

Well, maybe not everybody, but two priests from the Archdiocese of Boston are trying their hand at a Siskel-and-Ebert-style movie-review TV show.

"Spotlight" debuts Oct. 5 on CatholicTV, run by the Boston Archdiocese. The priests, Father Chip Hines and Father Bill Kelly, will review classic films and current fare in theaters.

Father Kelly, who is director of the archdiocesan Office of Clergy Support, likes "arty" films, according to Father Hines, who spoke to Catholic News Service in a telephone interview from Wrentham, Mass., where he is pastor of St. Mary Parish.

For his part, Father Hines is a fan of American cinema.

He estimated he goes to the multiplex about once a week on average to take in a film. "I love going to the movies, and renting them too — renting the DVDs and poring over the extras," he said.

He has a subscription with a video mailing service in which the retailer sends him three flicks a week — and he sees all three.

"Some of them I like, some of them I don't, some of them I can't wait for," Father Hines told CNS. "I remember 'Lord of the Rings' (films) were so highly anticipated I couldn't wait to see them."

"I saw recently an independent movie, 'Five Minutes in Heaven' with Liam Neeson," said Father Hines.

"It's about reconciliation, really. A Protestant, played by Neeson, who killed an Irish Catholic in Northern Ireland in the '70s, and trying to reconcile with his brother," he said. "I'm big on reconciliation themes. I'm a priest, I should be."

"I think it's going to become a real fan favorite," said Brian Swift, who produces "Spotlight" for CatholicTV. "We're trying to get some fun programming on the station."

Starting in October, CatholicTV will air a new movie review show starring two Boston priests, Father Bill Kelly, left, and Father Chip Hines. The idea for the show came about when a fellow priest overheard them debating whether a movie star's recent performance was Oscar-worthy.

Young musicians for peace

Vatican hosts concert remembering WWII

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican hosted an unusual concert with an eye to encouraging future generations to turn to music rather than violence when faced with conflict between nations.

Titled "Youth Against War," the Oct. 8 concert aimed to promote the practice of dialogue and reciprocal respect as a means of avoiding future wars, said Cardinal Walter Kasper, president of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity.

The German cardinal said the 2009 date is significant because it marks the 20th anniversary of the peaceful fall of the Berlin Wall and the 70th anniversary of the Nazi invasion of Poland, which sparked World War II.

Young musicians from 10 countries performed music by Felix Mendelssohn and Gustav Mahler at the concert.

The importance of a constant effort by individuals and institutions to promote peace "is exactly what these musicians from all over the world are trying to show with the instruments available to them, that is their music and their enthusiasm," the cardinal said.

The cardinal pointed out that both Mahler, born in 1860 in what is now the Czech Republic, and Mendelssohn, born in Germany, were Jews who later were baptized.

Cardinal Kasper said the conversions need to be seen within their historical context, but people also must recognize that "the Nazis did not take into account these baptisms and so their music was not allowed."

Therefore, he said, "it is important that the music of these musicians is played in this concert for peace."

The initiative was supported by the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultations as well as by the German Embassy to Holy See.

The concert, held in the Santa Cecilia Auditorium near St. Peter's Basilica, included performances by German actor Klaus Maria Brandauer and South African mezzo-soprano Michelle Breedt. The orchestra was directed by Jochem Hochstenbach and Wolfgang Gonnenwein. The musicians who performed are part of a German project called InterRegionales JugendsinfonieOrchester.

Joining members of St. Matthew Church were delegates from St. Luke Church in Mint Hill, Holy Spirit Church in Denver and St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Charlotte. "Why Catholic?" is an adult faith formation process based on Scripture and the Catechism of the Catholic Church. Motyka conducted four area workshops for the Diocese of Charlotte. The others were held at Holy Cross Church in Kernersville, St. Elizabeth of the Hill Country Church in Boone and St. Barnabas Church in Arden.

Lucia Leahy, a senior at Charlotte Catholic High School and a member of St. Ann Church Troop 216, recently earned the Girl Scout Gold Award, the highest and most prestigious award in Girl Scouting.

Lucia earned her Gold Award by creating Running My Life, a program that focuses on good health, physical fitness, goal setting and self esteem.

Dore Academy, a K-12 college preparatory school devoted to the education of students with learning disabilities and ADHD, has adopted Running My Life as a club sport that will be offered to fifth- through eighth-grade girls as a regular part of the school program.

When asked about the experience, Lucia responded, "I hope that this program empowers each girl to continue to be physically fit, a leader in the community and ready to accept any challenge the future has in store. I feel proud to have created an effective program that the school can use to help girls grow for years to come."

This inaugural Crop Walk culminated the school's efforts to teach methods of assisting the hungry around the world and in Charlotte and raised $4,200 in donations for the national Crop Walk organization.

"I am so proud of our students," said Michele Snoke, assistant principal at St. Gabriel School. "They honestly want to give like Jesus did."

Memory of a prayer despite dementia

Growing old is especially hard when we are aware that we are losing even our memories. There is a sense of urgency. We want to pass our memories along to others so that these memories will live on for a while after our own minds have gone dark.

Recently I received a letter from a lady in my parish with progressive dementia. Let's call her Mary.

Every day Mary feels some bit of her mind slipping away. Even though she is still relatively young, she knows that she is losing her memory and it won't be long until she cannot recall even simple things.

Mary's anguish is compounded by the fact that she watched her husband die from Alzheimer's only a few years ago.

Over the years I have received thousands of letters from parishioners and readers. But few letters have touched and encouraged me like the one I received from Mary on the feast of St. John Vianney, the patron saint of our parish. I thought I should share it:

"Dear Father Daly,

"It is the feast of St. John Vianney (our parish patron), and I believe it's more than appropriate to tell you how much I appreciate all that you bring to the parish. At the same time, I want to share with you a prayer/poem that I wrote in my early teens and have used over the years as a Communion offering to our Savior. I do this because many times I have heard you describe your love for the Eucharist with words that articulate my own feelings and belief. Your homily a week or so ago exemplifies this.

Parish Diary

Communion Prayer

I have prepared my heart as a palace

For you, my King, to stay.

And when I receive you, sweet Jesus,

Reign in my heart through the day.

I have prepared you a throne of repentance.

With love I shall make you a crown.

With a heart full of prayer I shall praise you.

Love greater than yours can't be found.

"I pass this on with the hope that you might wish to keep my prayer alive after dementia precludes my ability to remember it. With heartfelt prayers for your intentions,

"Mary."

Mary does not have to worry. Her prayer will live on with me. Maybe others will pick it up too, so that it will become part of the collective memory of the church and be prayed by many minds.

Don't worry, Mary. The memory of your prayer is safe. It lives on already in the mind of one who cannot forget. It lives on in the mind of God, the eternal Word.

October: Month of the Holy Rosary

Power of prayer combats evil

On September 1, 1883, Pope Leo XIII promulgated an encyclical in which he announced that, "the rosary is an effective spiritual weapon against the evils afflicting society." Perhaps he was referring to the historical events 300 years prior that led to this Feast of Our Lady of the Rosary.

In the fall of 1571, a mighty Turkish fleet that was considered the most powerful navy in the world vastly overshadowed its opposing Christian force and endangered the very stability of Europe.

The faithful of Europe answered a call by Pope St. Pius V to pray the rosary for victory. On Oct. 7, 1571, the Lord demonstrated his strength in the midst of human weakness and the Catholic forces triumphed at Lepanto.

This victory was attributed not to human strength, but divine intervention: to faithful Catholics imploring divine assistance and protection through the holy rosary. The victory at the Battle of Lepanto proves what Pope Leo XIII would announce years later that, "the rosary is an effective spiritual weapon against the evils afflicting society."

A more recent pontiff, Pope John Paul II reiterated this crucial message in his encyclical "On the Most Holy Rosary" in 2002. In this letter he wrote that, "The church has always attributed particular efficacy to this prayer, entrusting to the rosary...the most difficult problems. At times when Christianity itself seemed under threat, its deliverance was attributed to the power of this prayer, and Our Lady of the Rosary was acclaimed as the one whose intercession brought salvation" (39).

If our Holy Father encouraged the faithful recitation of the Rosary to combat the evils that afflict our society today, what battles are particularly threatening?

Without hesitation, we can quickly conclude that what is most vulnerable to attack in our contemporary world is threefold: Christianity, family, and human life. This is summarized in one simple phrase: Christian family life.

The litany of evils that afflict Christian family life include such rampant evils as contraception and abortion, embryonic stem-cell research and human cloning, pre-marital cohabitation and divorce, pornography and homosexual unions, infidelity and abuse.

History provides ample evidence for the veracity of the rosary as a means of conquering evil and generating authentic devotion and holiness. To this end, Pope John Paul II made a sincere plea to rediscover the great benefits of praying the rosary, not merely individually, but especially in our families, saying that "The family that prays together stays together."

Father Buettner is pastor of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.

Living through job loss

Part one of a three-part series

It's a regular Monday morning, but you do notice that the nice, retired security guard has been replaced by two guerillas. Also, the parking lot seems unusually full this early on a Monday.

Thinking that your favorite security guard must be on vacation, you bound up the steps and notice a cart full of moving boxes as you open the door. Something feels funny, but you can't quite get a grip on why.

You dismiss this oddness as your mind races ahead to the to-do list and the day ahead.

You can't kick the feeling though that something must be going on, because there is no cube talk. That big meeting you were preparing for all weekend...cancelled. Eerie silence seems to be everywhere. Then you see the note from your boss: See me as soon as you get in — important!

Before you can even turn on your computer, he is at your door. He doesn't look very happy, and on the way to his office you wonder what you did. "Come in and sit down, while I close the door." Looking straight at you, he mentions that the company has been hit hard by the recession. "A number of positions are being eliminated and for that reason we are terminating you."

After the word termination, everything goes blank. You hear the words but you can't comprehend them. In one sentence your professional identity is gone. It feels like you have just been hit in the gut with a baseball bat. Next, he tells you that you must exit the building, and a security officer is standing by to escort you to your car.

Like a common criminal you are escorted to your office, grab a few personal things and your keys, and are guided out of the building. Blinded by the sun, you remember your sunglasses are upstairs in your office. You turn back and remember that your ID badge has been disabled.

Finding your car, you fumble for the keys and get in. Thoughts explode... "Now what? How do I tell my family? What about the kids? How will I ever find another job?"

With the unemployment rate at a 26-year high, this unfortunate scene could happen to you. For me, it happened four times. Each time the scenario was different but the emotional and financial impact the same. So where do you go from here?

Judgment must match the speed of news

The birth of a grandchild is a joyous event for the whole family.

Despite my resolve to resist the temptation to go on and on about my own newborn grandchild, the circumstances of her arrival did provoke some thoughts on the stewardship of communication.

She was born in Shanghai, China, where her parents are both educators.

Within 15 minutes of her birth, the news was communicated by cell phone from China to the United States. Photos were sent to all grandparents, siblings and new uncles and aunts.

Compare that to the birth of our first child.

The father-to-be sat in a hospital waiting room when a nurse announced a son might be seen in a half-hour or so.

The new father pumped some quarters into the payphone to pass the news. Two days later, prints of photos taken through the nursery window were sent by mail to grandparents and others.

Days and hours in family communication have become minutes and seconds. The same is true for news of the world.

As the speed of transmission of news increases exponentially, it becomes more important that judgment increases at the same speed.

Back in the day when fathers sat in hospital waiting rooms, news organizations, both print and broadcast, functioned with an established quality-control process.

A mantra among wire services used to be "get it first and get it right." A reporter would gather information and check facts. The city editor would challenge, pass the story on to the copy desk that checked grammar and style.

The process also provided a filter. Eccentrics who called the city desk with their latest "news" about a UFO on their front lawn were given a polite dismissal.

There was also a bar to entry. The cost of a printing plant, of a television station limited the number of people involved.

Today, anyone, for a few hundred dollars, can easily buy a computer, hook up the Internet and promulgate a spaceship from Venus or a conspiracy at the highest level of government.

The stewardship of communication, however, recognizes that information is acted upon sometimes to the detriment of truth, a point not lost on Pope Benedict XVI.

The mass media are not morally "neutral," he wrote in his most recent encyclical, "Caritas in Veritate" ("Charity in Truth"). They are often subordinated to "economic interests intent on dominating the market" and to attempts to "impose cultural models that serve ideological and political agendas."

Oh, about that temptation I mentioned earlier: Remember a reading in the nuptial Mass which prayed for the blessing to see our children and our children's children? Ever think they would be so darn cute?

Saintly pharmacist-priest shining example, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI held up the "luminous figure" of a 16th-century saint as an example of the missionary spirit every Christian should adopt.

St. John Leonardi, an Italian pharmacist-priest, also stands as an excellent example for clergy in the current Year for Priests, the pope said at his weekly general audience Oct. 7.

Pope Benedict told pilgrims gathered in a sunny St. Peter's Square that it was the evangelical zeal of St. John Leonardi that helped establish the Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith, the precursor to the current Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples.

The saint "worked with great realism and zeal to promote holiness and the reform of society," the pope said. This dedication led him to help found the church's missionary arm, now the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples.

St. John Leonardi died in Rome in 1609 as he was ministering to people stricken by an epidemic. He was canonized in 1938 and made the patron saint of pharmacists in 2006.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

This week marks the four hundredth anniversary of the death of Saint John Leonardi, the founder of the Clerks Regular of the Mother of God and a priest whose missionary zeal found expression in the establishment of the congregation of Propaganda Fide. Saint John was born near Lucca, and after training as a pharmacist, became a priest committed to offering "the medicine of God" to the men and women of his time.

At a period of great reform and renewal in the life of the Church, he made the crucified Christ the centre of his preaching and the criterion of all his activity. John understood that all true reform is born of fidelity to Christ and love for the Church. It was love for Christ which inspired his efforts to catechize the young, to promote missionary activity and to renew Christian life and practice. Saint John was convinced that Christ is the true measure of man, and so he worked with great realism and zeal to promote holiness and the reform of society.

During this Year for Priests, may the figure of this great missionary inspire priests and laity alike to "start anew from Christ" and embrace their vocation with passionate enthusiasm.

Love of large families

Hispanic heritage exemplifies Catholic family values

A retired lawyer friend laments that his Catholic education from kindergarten through college never taught him that the Spaniards were the first to plant the Catholic Church on lands now in the United States.

For him, a non-Hispanic, as well as for me, National Hispanic Heritage Month, celebrated Sept. 15-Oct. 15, is not just about recent immigrants but about the very foundation of the faith in the U.S.

The Spaniards permanently established the church in St. Augustine, in what is now Florida, in 1565, 42 years before the settlement of Jamestown by the English and more than half a century before the Pilgrims landed on Plymouth Rock.

Juan de Onate's expedition brought Catholicism to New Mexico in 1598. From Florida across the Southeast to Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, California and up the west coast to Washington's Olympic peninsula, Spanish missionaries were the first evangelists.

Yet, Hispanic heritage, specifically the love of large families, also has something to say about the future.

In the next few decades, the world's population will undergo a steep decline. Europe will lose 100 million people in the first half of the 21st century. The mainstream population in the U.S. will also diminish.

So-called underdeveloped nations will also see their numbers go down. Demographers have not found the causes.

For now, the Catholic Church in this country will continue to grow because of the influx of immigrants and the large families of its Hispanic members. A declining population will have devastating economic consequences. That is one reason why immigrants, including the undocumented, are an asset rather than a liability.

It has not been long since having large families was cherished by many cultures in the United States.

Steve Reichert, a friend who served as a Maryknoll lay missionary, comes from a Missouri family of 16 children. I am from a family of 10.

Today, however, many see having children as inconvenient, or worse, as a drag on the "good life." Others fear not being able to support and educate them adequately.

Still others cling to the false vision that an exploding population will overwhelm the resources of the planet.

In families like mine and the Reicherts, parents felt that God would provide, and their faith was not misplaced. My parents paid for only one college education, that of one daughter, but nine of their children graduated from college.

We are not exceptional. Uncle Alfonso and Aunt Dora Sandoval had 12 children before he was killed at the age of 45 while working for the Union Pacific Railroad in Wyoming in 1970.

She was left with the seemingly insurmountable burden of feeding and educating them. Charlie, the fifth youngest, said: "We had to clean house, put food on the table; it was not easy. Sometimes we had no money."

Only Irene and Katie graduated from college, both with master's degrees in social work. But the others did just fine.

Charlie owns two restaurants in Las Vegas, N.M. Rita, a professional artist, owns with her husband a janitorial service in Santa Fe. John runs two service stations in Albuquerque.

All the others, some of whom graduated only from the eighth grade, became skilled in art, cooking, carpentry, construction and other trades that provide a good living. Dora, now 81, says, "All of my children turned out to be very smart. I can hardly believe it."

Having a large family calls for sacrifice and a generosity of spirit worth recovering, as is the faith of our parents that the job is not theirs alone.

God does provide, often in ways that we would never imagine, if we make the effort and trust him.

Catholics respond to international disasters

JAKARTA, Indonesia (CNS) — In a week of natural disasters in Asia and the South Pacific, Catholics gathered to pray for the victims, and Catholic aid agencies helped the survivors.

In Indonesia, two earthquakes hit within two days.

In the South Pacific, more than 170 people died after an earthquake triggered tsunamis Sept. 29.

In the Philippines, nearly 300 people died in and around Manila from Typhoon Ketsana and Typhoon Parma left at least 16 people dead.

And in southern India, torrential rains caused floods and mudslides, claiming more than 200 lives and displacing nearly 750,000 people.

Much of the aid in all these countries was being coordinated by Caritas, the Catholic Church's network of charitable aid agencies, although religious orders, lay communities and organizations, and Catholics at the parish level were doing what they could to help the victims.

On Oct. 5, the Indonesian government announced that more than 1,000 people had died in the earthquakes and, in Padang, they abandoned the search for the remaining 1,000 missing. The same day, UNICEF announced it was erecting classroom tents, and more than 70,000 children in Padang returned to class that day.

CRS spokeswoman Laura Sheahan said the agency, part of the Caritas network, was providing emergency shelter for 5,500 families in 23 villages in West Sumatra province, where Padang is located. CRS initially pledged a minimum of $400,000 in aid to the survivors. It was working with partner agencies to get shelter, hygiene and tool kits to quake victims.

The Indonesian branch of the Sant'Egidio Community, an international lay Catholic association, was collecting clothing and supplies.

In Samoa, the local branch of Caritas collaborated with the National Disaster Team and the Red Cross to coordinate the tsunami response.

Many residents of Samoa, American Samoa and Tonga live along the coasts, and church officials were among those who helped lead residents to higher ground, then assist them with shelter.

In New Zealand, where Samoans form the largest Pacific ethnic group, parishes around the country held prayer services for victims and their families and friends.

A spokeswoman for the New Zealand Catholic bishops' conference said its Caritas agency expected to join the wider Caritas network in Oceania to help provide relief for the tsunami victims, and Caritas officials in Australia said the same.

Luc Picard, CRS country representative in Manila, told Catholic News Service Sept. 28 that Ketsana was being called "the Katrina of the Philippines." CRS and Development and Peace, the Canadian Catholic bishops' international aid agency, were working with Caritas in the Philippines and Vietnam to help victims of the flooding.

The Knights of Columbus also pledged aid to help the typhoon victims.

The Indian government said Oct. 5 that more than 270 people had been killed by flooding in Karnataka and Andhra Pradesh states.

Jimmy Mathew, Karnataka regional manager for Caritas India, said staffers would work with CRS to devise a joint strategy for flood victims. He said the region had not experienced such flooding for 50 years.

Miguel Diaz, the new U.S. ambassador to the Vatican, accompanied by his wife Marian, right, arrives for the canonization Mass of five new saints in St. Peter's Basilica at the Vatican Oct. 11. Diaz led the delegation appointed by Obama to represent the United States at the canonization as part of his duties to build bridges between the U.S. administration and the Holy See.

'Obama-era' and the Vatican Ambassador Diaz seeks common ground

ROME (CNS) — The new U.S. ambassador to the Vatican, Miguel Diaz, said he is convinced there is wide potential for cooperation between the Vatican and the administration of President Barack Obama, particularly in areas of intercultural and interreligious dialogue.

To kick things off, the U.S. embassy to the Holy See and Caritas Internationalis co-sponsored an international conference in Rome on pediatric HIV/AIDS in mid-October. Diaz said he has already begun exploring additional collaborative possibilities with other Vatican agencies.

"As ambassador, I know there are areas where the Holy See and the United States are not in complete agreement. But I seek to be a bridge-builder, and to underscore that we can work together in multiple areas," Diaz said in an interview with Catholic News Service Oct. 7.

The ambassador said he was heartened when the pope, in a welcoming speech, expressed his confidence that U.S.-Vatican relations would continue to be marked by cooperation in promoting human rights and human dignity.

The Oct. 14-16 conference on pediatric HIV/AIDS featured key Vatican participants as well as medical experts and church workers in the field.

"I think this is precisely an example that shows that, while there may not be total agreement on all points regarding a specific issue, there are possibilities for people of good will to come together for the sake of, in this case, children," Diaz said.

In his speech to the new ambassador, Pope Benedict underlined the church's teaching on respect for life, from the moment of conception to natural death — a teaching that has relevance in the current debate over health care reform in the United States.

Diaz, a Catholic theologian, said the health care debate touched on very important issues. But he cautioned against assuming that he would be entering into that debate on a diplomatic level, or acting as a spokesperson for the church's positions.

"There are a number of domestic issues that are very important, but I think my role as U.S. ambassador is to represent the United States on the level of policy," Diaz said. "When differences emerge relative to those policies, then it is my role to engage in the kind of bridge-building that is necessary in diplomacy."

Diaz said that as ambassador he naturally would give primary attention to what the Vatican's senior diplomats, like Cardinal Bertone, have to say about policy questions. But he said he would not ignore the voices of other Vatican officials, a few of whom have been sharply critical of the Obama administration.

"I think it's important that we listen to those perspectives," he said.

Asked what has impressed him most during his short time in Rome and at the Vatican, Diaz said he has been touched most by the hospitality he has been shown at every turn.

"I guess I've really experienced the 'catholicity,' to use a theological term, and the good will of the people I've encountered," he said.

USCCB congratulates Obama on Nobel Peace Prize

Says U.S. president 'changed the international conversation'

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Cardinal Francis E. George of Chicago, president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, congratulated U.S. President Barack Obama on receiving the Nobel Peace Prize Oct. 9.

"As he has graciously said, much of the work of realizing a more peaceful and just world for all persons and nations remains to be done; but the prize was given because, as president of the United States, he has already changed the international conversation," Cardinal George said in a statement released by the USCCB Oct. 12.

"The rich diversity of United States society is now more surely anchored in a national unity that is better able to foster the peace we all are challenged to pursue. Our prayer is that almighty God will bless the president and his family," he added.

In remarks at the White House the day the prize was announced, Obama said he was "surprised and deeply humbled" by the honor.

"Let me be clear: I do not view it as a recognition of my own accomplishments, but rather as an affirmation of American leadership on behalf of aspirations held by people in all nations," he said.

The Norwegian Nobel Committee announced the U.S. president was chosen "for his extraordinary efforts to strengthen international diplomacy and cooperation between peoples."

"Only very rarely has a person to the same extent as Obama captured the world's attention and given its people hope for a better future," it said Oct. 9.

Bishops call on Catholics to be main agents of change in Africa

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — African Catholics must become the main forces to ending the continent's wars, promoting reconciliation, fighting corruption, safeguarding the family and protecting Africa's natural resources, said members of the special Synod of Bishops for Africa.

In the first week of the Oct. 4-25 synod, members of the assembly listened to almost 200 speeches on ways the church can be a force for reconciliation, justice and peace on the continent.

The need to overcome lingering ethnic tensions was a predominant theme of the assembly, followed by concern for the family, the importance of protecting the environment, a recognition of the dignity and contributions of women, and the need for dialogue with the continent's Muslim communities.

Bishops denounced the exploitation of tribal differences by politicians and by multinational corporations seeking control of minerals and oil. But many bishops also urged an examination of conscience by Catholics, saying they have not always acted like members of one family.

Another major theme in synod speeches was the importance of the family in African culture. Bishops warned that families are threatened by wars, disease and ideas about divorce, abortion, sexuality and homosexuality imported by Western media or promoted by Western organizations promising aid in exchange for a forum for spreading their views on family life and sexuality.

Archbishop Marcel Madila Basanguka of Kananga, Congo, told the synod that the traditional family is Africa's main force for peace and reconciliation but it is under almost constant attack.

Archbishop Buti Tlhagale of Johannesburg, South Africa, said that Africa's traditional cultural values "are threatened by the new global ethic which aggressively seeks to persuade African governments and communities to accept new and different meanings of the concepts of family, marriage and human sexuality."

On a cultural level, "Africa faces a second wave of colonization, both subtle and ruthless at the same time," he said.

A Tanzanian prelate also asked the bishops to reconsider their often too accepting approach to blessing the marriages of couples who do not belong to the same church.

Bishop Almachius Rweyongeza of Kayunga said that too often the result is family tensions over the religious education of children or the total neglect of religious education in order to keep peace in the family.

"Mixed marriages can easily be like building faith on sand, whereby it will be hard to produce fruits of love, reconciliation, justice and peace," the bishop said.

As in other parts of the world, the majority of parish members and active participants in Africa are women and their rights and needs also were repeated topics of concern at the synod.

Archbishop Telesphore Mpundu of Lusaka, Zambia, told the synod that "the dignity of women, their giftedness to humanity (and) their potential massively huge contribution to the church" are not recognized, utilized or "sufficiently celebrated."

Several North African bishops urged the synod to replace fear of the Muslim community with real efforts to understand and learn from Islam and to collaborate with Muslim leaders to promote development and peace on the continent.

"We all know that fear is a bad counselor," Bishop Maroun Lahham of Tunis, Tunisia, told the synod.

HUNTERSVILLE — A Health Fair will take place at St. Mark Church, 14740 Stumptown Rd., Oct. 24 from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Approximately 20 organizations will be present giving information of the services and resources they have available for the community. A celebration of saints

Tapestries depicting new saints are displayed on the facade of St. Peter's Basilica as Pope Benedict XVI leads the Angelus prayer following a canonization ceremony at the Vatican Oct. 11. Depicted in the tapestries are St. Zygmunt Felinski and St. Damien de Veuster.

Pope canonizes five models of Christian love

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Calling them "shining examples" of Christian love, Pope Benedict XVI proclaimed five new saints, including Father Damien de Veuster, the 19th-century Belgian missionary who ministered to people with leprosy in Hawaii before dying of the disease.

At a Mass Oct. 11 overflowing with pilgrims from around the world, the pope also canonized Sister Jeanne Jugan, a French nun whose Little Sisters of the Poor continue to assist the elderly in the United States and more than 30 other countries.

The pope pronounced a solemn decree of canonization and proclaimed them models of holiness for the whole church.

The other new saints included a Pole and two Spaniards: St. Zygmunt Felinski, intercessor for all who are persecuted; St. Francisco Coll Guitart, famed for his evangelical preaching; and St. Rafael Arnaiz Baron, a great mystic.

Greetings from Granada

Father Sergio Hernandez, pastor of Our Lady of Mercy Church in Granada, Nicaragua (right) stands with students at Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro Sept. 17. The two parishes have adopted a "sister" relationship and pray for each other daily.

Father Hernandez thanked the students for funds they raised to pay tuition for two students in Nicaragua and the gently used clothes they collected and sent to children at the sister parish (below). He asked Our Lady of Grace School students to continue to keep his parish in their prayers and encouraged them to learn Spanish and visit Nicaragua.

The Sowers of Seed conference is a collaborative catechist formation program organized by the Central Region Leadership Team in the Diocese of Charlotte. The team made several presentations in both English and Spanish to more than 60 participants about the six modules (classes) required to be commissioned as a catechist.

Korean catechists

COURTESY PHOTO

Father Jaehee Lee, pastor of St. John Lee Korean Church in Charlotte, commissioned 25 of his parishioners as catechists at the church Oct. 11. The ceremony took place after only six weeks of an intensive training program organized by area faith formation leaders and Cris Villapando, diocesan director of programs for faith formation.

This is the first community in the Diocese of Charlotte to produce so many commissioned catechists in such short span of time. This is especially remarkable for this parish that has only 150 registered households.

In order for a catechist to be commissioned, the individual has to complete six modules, which include the call to be a catechist, skills and theory, sacraments, sacred scripture, the creed, and morality. Each module lasts around two hours.

As the only Catholic Church of approximately 13 Korean churches in the area, this community is well aware of its mission to evangelize and catechize.

Charlotte Catholics respond to Philippine ambassador addressed the 350 participants of the Filipino American Community of the Carolinas during a gala Oct. 11 to describe the dire situation on the ground and the need for help.

The speeches were intended to stir up support for community efforts to assist flood and landslide victims through social outreach groups, church groups and private donors.

The majority of the people who met with Ambassador Gaa were Catholics known for their service work, like Wally Penilla, who coordinates members of St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte to serve the homeless shelter of uptown Charlotte.

Several of those present had already initiated fundraising efforts to benefit the disaster survivors in the Philippines. Steve Mirman coordinated a raffle with the Filipino American Community of the Carolinas that raised $1,000. An informal gathering of Filipinos last week at the Asian Chamber Library raised $2,000.

"One benefit of community fundraising is zero expense for administration, unlike government funding, which can only do so much," said Cris Villapando, director of programs for faith formation in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"A major distinction I see between calamity recovery in the U.S. and the Philippines is this: the U.S. has insurance companies softening the blow on victims; the majority of people in the Philippines do not have insurance and (are) totally dependent on people's compassion," said Villapando.

Citing the recent comparison of the Typhoon Ketsana to Hurricane Katrina, Villapando pointed out that while rainfall from Katrina in New Orleans was 10 inches, Typhoon Ketsana hit Manila with 18.5 inches of rain in 24 hours.

"The majority of people in the Philippines do not have insurance and (are) totally dependent on people's compassion."

— Cris Villapando

Typhoons Ketsana and Parma struck within days of each other early this month. Ambassador Gaa said the devastation wrought by the back-to-back typhoons displaced 750,000 people and killed more than 500.

He added that the total of 4 million people directly affected by the typhoons does not count "silent" casualties that are now brought about by disease, hunger, and exposure to the elements.

Ambassador Gaa's urgent request for disaster relief to the Charlotteans is the latest challenge in a varied and distinguished diplomatic career.

He served as Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary (AEP) of the Republic of the Philippines to the People's Republic of China from 2003 until 2006.

He has served in various capacities in the Department of Foreign Affairs, Manila, and has represented the Philippines in various United Nations conferences, as well as multilateral and regional meetings, seminars and training.

As a result of the plea delivered by Ambassador Gaa, the more than $4,000 raised six months ago for a Philippine home-building project is being re-directed to benefit Filipino disaster victims. Golf tournaments are also being planned for disaster aid fundraising.

Strategic planning meetings to be held in October include a plea to the participants of the Rosary Fiesta, an annual celebration attended by the six Charlotte-area Rosary groups, held Oct. 17.

New flooding in Philippines Catholic Relief Services assessing needs

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A new wave of flooding, brought on by the second tropical storm to hit the Philippines within 10 days, has left thousands of people homeless and at least 18 villages underwater, Catholic Relief Services officials reported.

Flooding in the provinces of Pangasinan and Benguet, about 120 miles from the capital Manila, began Oct. 8 after one dam collapsed and officials released water to save another dam from being breached as Parma, downgraded to a tropical depression, continued its onslaught of the island nation.

Pat Johns, director of emergency operations for CRS in the Philippines, told Catholic News Service by phone Oct. 9 that the region underwater was already saturated after Typhoon Ketsana swept through the country Sept. 26, dumping more than a month's worth of rain in 12 hours.

Johns was planning to visit the region Oct. 10 with representatives of Caritas in the Philippines to assess the extent of the flooding and determine exactly how many people were forced to flee when waters rose rapidly after the dam along the Agno River failed. CRS, the U.S. bishops' international relief and development agency, is part of the Caritas Internationalis charitable network.

Philippine authorities said 60 percent of Pangasinan was flooded, and more than 1 million people were forced to flee to higher ground. In addition to the displaced people, government emergency management officials reported hundreds of people died in landslides caused by downpours from Parma as the storm lingered off the northeastern coast.

"We've talked to our diocesan counterparts and it sounds like it's pretty devastating," Johns said. "You've got people who are up on their rooftops because of the flooding that has occurred. They're just waiting for people to reach them."

"This is a new area (for flooding)," he added. "This area was not an area we were too worried about until that last 24 hours."

Debbie DeVoe, regional information officer for CRS in Manila, told CNS that flooding reached the second story of buildings in the Urdaneta Diocese. In the nearby Alaminos Diocese, she was aware of at least 100 families who were forced to leave the coastal area.

In the Lingayen-Dagupan Archdiocese, DeVoe reported, at least 18 towns had water that reached the rooftops of homes.

"At least 20 houses, riverside houses, were washed away by water (released) from the San Roque Dam," she said.

Since Ketsana hit the country Sept. 26, CRS and Caritas in the Philippines have aided more than 30,000 people around Manila, she said. "I think we're already inundated by need," she said.

Seven questions for Charlotte's chief of police

Faith keeps Chief Monroe balanced, grounded

CHIEF, from page 1

Charlotte. In an interview with The Catholic News & Herald he talked about his faith and the role it plays in his profession. His answers have been edited for brevity.

Have you always been Catholic?

I'm a convert. It has been about 15 years. My wife was Catholic. I took the CCD (Confraternity of Christian Doctrine) classes prior to getting married and our kids were brought up Catholic. I was Baptist.

At some point (while living) in D.C., I had a priest that was one of our (police) chaplains. I just had so much admiration and respect for Father Sal. I opted to learn more about the Catholic faith through him.

How does your faith contribute to your role as Charlotte Mecklenburg Police Chief?

I think it helps to balance things. It helps me know that it is never about me. It is never based on what is in Rodney Monroe's best interest, but more so the people that I serve — the citizens of Charlotte as well as the men and women of the organization. My faith helps keep that grounded in me.

Did you always want to be a police officer?

Since I was a little kid — I never wanted to be the robber, never wanted to be the bad guy. I always wanted to be the good guy, always wanted to be the cop.

Since moving to Charlotte in 2008 you have found your parish home at Our Lady of Consolation Church. What do you like most about your parish community?

In Richmond we belonged to a parish that was very upbeat, very diverse and had Gospel singing. It had to have Gospel singing. Our Lady of Consolation just fit that wonderfully.

During one of his sermons at this year's Revival of the Spirit, guest revivalist Father Maurice Nutt mentioned that you were a close friend. How did the two of you become friends?

I met him probably about six years ago. He has been in the law enforcement field. We just hit it off. He's just a great person that really understands some of the workings of law enforcement and somebody that I can relate to quite easily.

Do you have a spiritual mentor or someone who has influenced you greatly when it comes to your faith?

Father Nutt. He has been somebody that I can just pick up the phone and talk to. He calls me periodically, just to check up on me.

How do you spend your free time?

Golf. That's my biggest release. I can spend hours at a driving range or playing golf. It just gives you time to be by yourself and it takes so much concentration that it takes your mind off of most things.

Saintly skit

COURTESY PHOTO

Members of the parish youth group of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte portray St. Vincent at sea with the ship's crew during a skit presented in honor of the feast day of St. Vincent de Paul Sept. 27.

Events began with a procession of a statue of the saint through the church by Knights of Columbus. Later that evening, a small crowd of parishioners gathered in the Msgr. Pharr Activity Center for a pot luck supper followed by a showing of the award-winning movie "Monsieur Vincent."

The youth group skit depicted the highlights of the life of the holy French priest. In just two weeks, members of the youth group wrote the skit and completed casting and rehearsals.

The scene when St. Vincent de Paul was attacked by pirates amused attendees, but also touched them through the portrayal of the heroic and humble life of the great saint. This event was so successful that youth organizer Ruben Tamayo declared: "Next year we are going to do it again but with music, as an opera!"

Secular Franciscans renew vows of daily conversion like Christ in this life, we may share his glory in the life to come."

Local Capuchins Father Nick Mormando, Father Salvas (known in the parish as Brother John) and Brother Michael Molloy renewed their vows first.

Then the Secular Franciscans of St. Francis of the Hills Fraternity renewed their permanent commitments to the Gospel life. It was the first renewal for Diane Salkewicz and Gregory Savold, who had made permanent professions only six weeks before.

The renewal of commitment repeats the promises made at profession, including the declaration "In my secular state, I promise to live all the days of my life the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ in the Secular Franciscan Order by observing its rule of life."

"That was exciting," Savold said. "I've been to the Transitus before, but now I was really a player."

He continued, "It was very emotionally moving and uplifting, especially when Brother John stood up and talked about renewing our commitment."

"It was so emotional," said Salkewicz. "I said it with such joy. I have no more doubts. I don't fear any more. I know this is what I'm called to do."

Discovering a new path

Savold, 77, began his quest to give more of his life to the church after the death of his wife, Joan, several years ago.

When talking with Randy Hair, a member of St. Francis of the Hills, he learned of the Secular Franciscan Order. Savold attended several monthly meetings and decided to begin formation.

Salkewicz, 62, began her journey toward the Secular Franciscan Order nine years ago when she began detaching herself from possessions.

For both Savold and Salkewicz, the lives of St. Francis and St. Clare were important influences. Savold was impressed that upon hearing St. Francis preach, 18-year old St. Clare left her family of nobility to embrace St. Francis' life of poverty.

"Clare lived a life of caring for others, even before she entered the convent," Salkewicz said. "She was so (far) ahead in her thinking."

The work of St. Francis came alive for both Salkewicz and Savold as they watched the play "Il Poverello," written by Father Salvas and performed for several years at Immaculate Conception Church.

Savold became involved in the annual production and even played Pope Innocent III one year.

He was drawn to St. Francis' decisions, such as his embrace of poverty and care for the poor, and his determination to continue his way of life despite obstacles.

Living radical interior change

"I thought (the Secular Franciscan Order) would be a way to live a more spiritual life," Salkewicz said. "I never knew it was about conversion."

Article seven of the Secular Franciscan Order rule says, in part, "Let them conform their thoughts and deeds to those of Christ by means of that radical interior change which the Gospel itself calls 'conversion.' Human frailty makes it necessary that this conversion be carried out daily."

Indeed, Salkewicz has surrendered her time and her will. "I really understand what daily conversion is now," she said.

While in initial formation, she started caring for her mother and her mother-in-law, who had begun to suffer from dementia. Salkewicz fell and sustained a concussion. A detached and torn retina required surgery and months of painful convalescence.

Salkewicz's doctor said that her other retina had begun to tear and she would probably need surgery on Aug. 22, the date of her profession. Distressed, Salkewicz began to pray. Her prayers were joined by members from multiple groups in the Secular Franciscan Order. A re-evaluation

Feast day of St. Francis of Assisi

Father Paul Dechant, an oblate of St. Francis de Sales and pastor of Holy Cross Church in Kernersville, blessed animals on the feast day of St. Francis of Assisi Oct. 4. The ceremony was held outdoors at a statue of Mary on the grounds of Holy Cross Church.

Approximately 125 parishioners brought dogs of all sizes, two horses, and one very small boa constrictor. Father Dechant's dog Shadow exemplified great behavior and remained in the spot designated by the pastor throughout the entire service.

The animals were first blessed as a group, after which they received individual blessings. Father Dechant carried a bowl of pet food with him for the individual blessings.

of Salkewicz's eye determined that she did not need immediate surgery, so she was able to proceed with her formation.

A community of faith

Like other members, Salkewicz participated in monthly fraternity meetings, helped with the fraternity apostolate, prepared for and attended monthly formation sessions required for those not yet "professed," and maintained her prayer life while taking care of her family and work responsibilities.

Profession, a step on the journey, takes place after a recommendation by the formation director and the fraternity council's approval.

For Savold, a former engineer, going through most of formation without knowing the exact profession date was challenging.

"I lived all my life with tic marks on a page," he said. "Target dates were very important."

In their individual journeys, Salkewicz and Savold found the fraternity's support invaluable, "the way all the fraternity members help each other," as Salkewicz said.

"I could not have done it without the help of the fraternity."

When her challenges became especially difficult, she said fellow candidates told her, "We're not going through this without you."

Salkewicz said, "I was sustained by fraternal love and prayer."

That supportive, fraternal relationship is "irreplaceable," said Savold.

Salkewicz also credits her husband's support: "He never let me down. He has been there every step of the way — enthusiastically."

"I want to live this life fully," she said. "It's who I am. It's not a big change for me to be 'professed.' I've been living this life for four years."

Since starting with the Secular Franciscan Order, Savold said his life has simplified.

"If I don't use something, or haven't used it in a year, it's gone. I think twice before I buy," he said.

He reads the Bible more often, said he's "lost" if he doesn't pray the Liturgy of the Hours, and looks at nature with more reverence.

Savold is a member of the Knights of Columbus and volunteers at free clinics and a few other places, but if there's a conflict, such as where to spend time, the Secular Franciscan Order is his choice.

"That's my life," he said. "The Secular Franciscan Order is above and beyond anything else, other than family."

Group speaks on abortion from personal experience

College students gather for pro-life information

The event was hosted by the regional Silent No More Awareness group Oct. 14.

"College students are still the number one group for abortions across the country," said Katherine Hearn, a Silent No More regional co-founder. "So it's amazing the number of students stopping by."

"It's a blessing from God," added Kristen Giesler, student at UNC-Charlotte and president of the Students for Life organization that sponsored the table.

Andrea Hines, parishioner of St. Matthew Church in Charlotte and regional coordinator for the Silent No More Awareness Campaign, remarked that those who support pro-life issues on college campuses are not usually so obvious.

The Silent No More group holds gatherings like these in different cities to educate the public about the devastation abortion brings to men, women, and families, said Hines.

"People say thank you for giving your witness," she said. "They don't realize the aftermath of the physical and emotional destruction left by an abortion."

Hines listed infertility, scars, placenta previa, miscarriage, and premature deliveries in future pregnancies as common problems. She also said that alcoholism, drug addiction, promiscuity and higher suicide rates are all part of documented consequences for women who undergo abortions.

"It affects every part of life," said Hines, noting that the list of consequences does not stop with the abortion of a child's life.

Gesturing to the group gathered around the table, Hearn added, "We want to give out information on alternatives to abortion and information leading to healing and reconciliation."

"What we want these students to know," she continued, "is that there is help, hope and a safe place" for women considering abortions.

Hines gave away a button reading "I regret lost fatherhood" to a student who said his girlfriend had an abortion when they were in high school, and included information on Rachel's Vineyard, a program promoting healing after abortion.

"One young man took information for his girlfriend, who thinks she is pregnant," said Hines.

"We've had different people coming up all day," she said. "But reaching even just one person makes it all worth it."

SACRED ART

Kimi Chun, daughter-in-law of artist Peggy Chun, stands in the Peggy Chun Gallery in Honolulu with one of the late artist's last works, "Father Damien of Molokai," created in collaboration with Catholic school students.

Hawaiians offer pope painting of Damien by paralyzed artist

HONOLULU (CNS) — A large and colorful painting, made by a paralyzed artist working with Catholic school students and depicting Blessed Damien de Veuster, arrived in Rome where students and teachers presented it to the pope at his Oct. 14 general audience.

On Oct. 11 Pope Benedict XVI canonized the Belgian-born missionary priest along with four others.

The 8-foot-by-4-foot "Father Damien of Molokai" was one of the final artistic efforts of Hawaiian painter Peggy Chun, who died last November of amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, or ALS, commonly known as Lou Gehrig's disease. Chun had wanted to do a large painting of Blessed Damien since 2002. But when ALS slowly paralyzed her body, it didn't seem possible.

To see her vision realized, Chun got the help of students at Holy Trinity School in Kuliouou in 2007. "They just got it," said Kimi Chun, Chun's daughter-in-law, of the students. "You could tell this project helped them feel so connected to her."

After her total paralysis, Peggy Chun could only move her eyes and used them to point at different letters and numbers on a "spell board" to form words and sentences. In that way she dictated color formulas to the Holy Trinity youngsters who painted 50,000 half-inch paper squares, mosaic pieces for the portrait.

When most of the pieces were painted, a Polish artist and friend of Chun, Magdalena Hawajska, stepped in, following Chun's carefully detailed instructions.

The piece incorporates Hawajska's restoration of Chun's watercolor painting "Molokai" blended with an interpretation of Vincent van Gogh's "Starry Night" that lightens into a blazing sunrise.

Father Damien is depicted holding an outstretched hand, an imprint of Peggy Chun's own hand, and he is surrounded by dozens of other handprints. The entire sky and parts of the Molokai coastline are formed from the students' mosaic pieces.

"It was almost like Peggy went into Madga's body and took it over," Kimi Chun told the Hawaii Catholic Herald, newspaper of the Honolulu Diocese.

"Father Damien of Molokai" was unveiled at the Hawaii state capitol March 14, 2008.

Before she died, Peggy Chun asked that the completed artwork be given to Pope Benedict XVI during Blessed Damien's canonization events in Rome. Kimi Chun said her mother-in-law was known for her generosity and would give away everything from a painting to her own scarf if someone told her they liked it.

"She was such a giver," she said. "It just feels so right for the painting to be given as a gift."

Anticipating Advent; A hunger to see the face of Jesus

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Pretty soon retailers will leapfrog over Halloween and Thanksgiving and add the familiar red and green of Christmas decorations. For Catholics, it's just a reminder of the approach of the season of Advent, the season that sharpens our hunger for the coming of our Lord Jesus in the form of a child.

That hunger, for me, is the fascinating part of this weekend's Gospel reading. The blind man Bartimaeus cries out as Jesus passes by and is hushed by those around him, who rebuke him and tell him to be silent. But he persists, so great is his hunger.

Jesus stops and has Bartimaeus brought to him from among the crowd. The blind man had been shouting to him, "Jesus, son of David, have pity on me." Once he is before him, Jesus asks this man a rather remarkable question: "What do you want for me to do for you?"

Bartimaeus' reply is just as remarkable: "Master, I want to see." He didn't ask for sight simply to make his life better, but in order to see the one he had already identified as the son of David, correctly describing Jesus' lineage as a proof that he was the Messiah. Jesus tells him in response, "Go your way; your faith has saved you."

Scripture tells us Bartimaeus immediately "received his sight and followed him on the way."

Advent is a time of hunger and a time to renew and re-form our faith with our sense of Jesus present in his world. Thousands in my own diocese are beginning the "Why Catholic?" program with the first six-week season corresponding, roughly, with the season of Advent. They will seek the face of Jesus in the Scriptures and teachings of the church, through the Catechism of the Catholic Church, and in the workings of God in their own lives and the lives of the body of Christ represented in the people in their small study groups.

Others will seek the face of Jesus through serving the poor, or by intensifying their love for their spouses and children, or by increasing their time in Scripture study and prayer.

May we all take courage from the example of Bartimaeus, remembering the generous response of Jesus to all those who seek him in faith.

Questions:

Have you made a plan for spiritual renewal for Advent? If you haven't, what local programs of study, service or worship might help you in personally seeking the face of Jesus?

U.S. geneticists named to Vatican sciences academy

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI has named two prominent U.S. geneticists as members of the Pontifical Academy of Sciences.

Dr. Francis Collins, director of the National Institutes of Health, and Dr. Edward De Robertis, a professor of biological chemistry at the school of medicine of the University of California at Los Angeles, are the newly appointed members.

The Vatican announced their appointments to the pontifical academy Oct. 10.

Dr. Francis Collins

Collins, 59, is the former director of the NIH National Human Genome Research Institute, which made a complete map of the human genome under his leadership.

Collins' research led to the discoveries of a series of important genes, including the gene responsible for cystic fibrosis, and he also isolated genes linked to other diseases, the Vatican said.

Collins, who had been regularly invited to speak at conferences of the Pontifical Academy of Sciences, has long urged scientists not to divorce their work from their spirituality.

He won a Christopher Award in 2007 for his book, "The Language of God: A Scientist Presents Evidence for Belief."

After leaving the genome project in August 2008, Collins, who has said he became a Christian at age 27, founded the BioLogos Foundation in Washington, which says in its mission statement: "We believe that faith and science both lead to truth about God and creation."

Dr. Edward De Robertis

De Robertis, 62, isolated the first gene responsible for controlling the development of vertebrates while he was a professor of cellular biology at the University of Basel, Switzerland.

The Vatican said De Robertis' research in development-controlling genes in the embryos of vertebrates led to the discovery that the molecular mechanisms for embryonic patterning are similar in all animal embryos.

"Some fundamental tool kit creates the form and patterning of the embryo across the animal kingdom," De Robertis has explained.

The Vatican said his discoveries have spearheaded the creation of a new scientific field called evolutionary developmental biology. So-called "evo-devo" compares the developmental processes of different plants and animals so the ancestral relationship between organisms can be determined.

The Pontifical Academy of Sciences, which includes several Nobel Prize winners among its members, advises the Vatican on scientific issues.

This 16th-century illustration by Gregor Reisch, showing a teacher holding an armillary sphere used to point to objects visible in the sky, is displayed in the "Astrum 2009" exhibit at the Vatican Museums Oct. 13.

Italy's celestial studies stars in Vatican Museums' exhibit

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican and Italian observatories have teamed up to display for the first time numerous precious instruments and books documenting the birth and development of stargazing in Italy.

The Vatican Observatory, the Italian National Institute of Astrophysics and the Vatican Museums have pooled their collections of antique telescopes, astrolabes, celestial globes and manuscripts, such as Galileo Galilei's original handwritten notes detailing his observations of the moon. Many of the 130 items in the exhibit have never been displayed publicly.

The exhibit, called "Astrum 2009," runs at the Vatican Museums from Oct. 16 to Jan. 16, 2010, and commemorates the International Year of Astronomy.

The United Nations declared the special year to mark the 400th anniversary of Galileo's first use of the telescope to observe the cosmos.

The exhibit's curator, Ileana Chinnici, told journalists during a Vatican press conference Oct. 13 that Italy's unique patrimony of astronomical instruments is the richest in the world.

Popes and the divided Italian states all supported their own observatories and amassed a large number of historical instruments and valuable documentation, she said.

Some of the unique and valuable objects on display include Galileo's handwritten notes and his publication "Starry Messenger" from 1610, both of which detailed how he perfected the telescope to magnify distant objects 30 times the size they appear to the naked eye.

There is also a replica of one of Galileo's telescopes created by Massachusetts-based craftspeople Jim and Rhonda Morris. The original is in the Institute and Museum of the History of Science in Florence, Italy.

Also on display is the arithmometer, one of the first commercial calculating machines. Created in 1882, it helped scientists do complex additions, subtractions, multiplications and divisions as well as extract square roots.

A few sections of the 130-piece exhibit are dedicated to the Vatican's history of astronomical research, including its participation in the 19th-century international "Carte du Ciel" (Map of Heaven) project to catalog and make a map of the stars.

Also on display for the first time are photographs of a papal expedition to Russia in 1887 to witness and document a total solar eclipse. Three Italian priests made the trip, which proved unsuccessful due to poor weather and viewing conditions.

Missing from the exhibit is any mention of the church's troubled history and dealings with Galileo.

The Italian scientist was condemned for suspected heresy in 1633 for maintaining that the earth revolved around the sun. He was "rehabilitated" in 1992 by a special Vatican commission established by Pope John Paul II.

The church has made significant overtures in recent decades to show that faith and science do not conflict.

Galileo opened up a brand new way of doing science, which wasn't accepted immediately, said Cardinal Giovanni Lajolo, president of the commission governing Vatican City in a written introduction to the exhibit's catalog.

These groundbreaking scientific discoveries help people better understand God's creation, he wrote, and the exhibit shows how science "is an inescapable part" of the human spirit and the whole human experience.

1924 - 2009 Benedictine Father John A. Oetgen

Belmont Abbey monk and priest remembered for humor, intellect

BELMONT — Benedictine Father John Oetgen, a monk and priest of Belmont Abbey, died peacefully Oct. 10.

He was in the sixty-fifth year of his monastic profession, and the fifty-eighth year of his priestly ministry. He was born in Savannah, Ga., on Aug. 6, 1924, the son of H. Glenn Oetgen and Helen McCormick Oetgen, and was given the name Anthony. He grew up in Sacred Heart Parish and attended Benedictine Military School in Savannah, both of which were staffed at the time by the monks of Belmont Abbey.

From there, it was a natural transition to Belmont Abbey Junior College. In the course of his college studies, he was admitted to the novitiate for Belmont Abbey, receiving the name John. He made his novitiate at St. Vincent Archabbey and celebrated his first profession of vows in 1944. He was solemnly professed in 1947 and ordained to the priesthood in his home parish of Sacred Heart in 1951.

His education included studies at the Belmont Abbey Seminary with further studies in Rome, St. Benet's Hall at Oxford University and the University of North Carolina. In recognition of his academic and scholarly interests, he was named a Lifetime Fellow of the American Benedictine Academy in 1998.

Father Oetgen was tall, in both stature and importance at Belmont Abbey. He was esteemed and admired by his confreres, colleagues and students alike for his lively sense of humor, keen intellect and broad range of interests.

He served as a trusted and beloved mentor to generations of Abbey students. In the monastic community he was consistently elected to the Senior Council, and represented the community as delegate to numerous sessions of the General Chapter.

In the college, he is perhaps most affectionately remembered for initiating countless students into the richness of Shakespeare and the unique world of Southern Literature, and for serving as director, performer and patron to the Abbey Players.

In addition to teaching English and Speech, Father Oetgen was chaplain at St. Leo School, 1951-1952, and assistant dean of students, 1955-1956. He completed several terms on the board of trustees, and led the college as its president, 1960-1964. In recognition of his significant achievements, Belmont Abbey College awarded Father Oetgen the Doctor of Humane Letters degree in 2006.

One of Father Oetgen's most important gifts to Belmont Abbey was a love of beauty. His affinity for the beauty of Benedictine monastic life and literature overflowed in his painting, gardening and friendships. Countless trees and the colorful flowers of his garden will keep him in mind for years to come.

Father Oetgen is survived by the monks of Belmont Abbey, by his sister, Sister Pauline Oetgen, C.S.J. and by his niece and three nephews. His body was welcomed home to the abbey basilica Oct. 12. The Mass of Resurrection was celebrated with the monastic community, the Most Reverend Peter Jugis, Bishop of Charlotte, the Most Reverend William Curlin, Bishop Emeritus of Charlotte, priests of the diocese, the Sisters of Mercy, the Belmont Abbey College Community, and numerous alumni and friends. His body now rests with the monks in the abbey cemetery.

Addressing Belmont Abbey College's Class of '06 at their commencement exercises, Father Oetgen challenged them not only to seek excellence and satisfaction in their lives and careers, but also to want to be holy, to be saints. He told them, "Our wanting must be serious enough to understand that drawing close to Christ means drawing close, embracing the individual cross of our life." Always the consummate teacher, Father Oetgen, in the final months of his illness, fulfilled by example the words of his instruction.

The monks of Belmont Abbey said, "We trust that, having shared by patience in the sufferings of Christ, Father Oetgen now shares also in his glory, and we commend our dear confrere to you for the customary suffrages for the deceased monks of our congregation."

New Oktoberfest brings together Hendersonville parish

BY KATHLEEN HEALY SCHMIEDER
CORRESPONDENT

HENDERSONVILLE — A swirl of music, games, and dancing signaled the arrival of the first annual Oktoberfest Carnival of Immaculata School in Hendersonville Oct. 9. The fun-filled event brought together the parish and school community and filled the auditorium and parking lot.

Tammy McCurdy, PTO president and coordinator of the event, helped plan the inaugural fall festival around the Hendersonville Apple Festival, held at the beginning of the school year.

"We wanted to do a carnival to welcome the kids back into school and (create) something that would be fun for everyone (and) help build the relationship between the parish and school," said McCurdy.

The aroma of traditional German bratwurst, sauerkraut and potato salad set the Oktoberfest mood. Children who attended enjoyed a carnival menu of cotton candy, popcorn and hot dogs. Immaculata School was transformed into an Oktoberfest celebration with a full array of games and activities both indoors and out, including a cake walk, sale items for all ages, and music, food and fun provided by the school PTO.

As the school erupted with fun and laughter, parishioners, school children, parents, friends and family enjoyed the atmosphere and became one community, just as organizers had hoped.

Proceeds from the event will be used to add new technology to the classrooms with the PTO hoping to raise enough funds to buy two Smart Boards. These boards will provide a white board with projector for use in the classrooms. The new equipment will enable presentations to be given to children without moving equipment between classrooms, freeing up time to focus on the lessons.

"With everything usually coming at the end of the school year, we felt this fundraiser would be less stressful for the parents and exciting and fun for the kids as well," noted McCurdy.

"The whole PTO and the teachers have come together," she continued. "It has been a team effort!"

The team's work was well rewarded with the large turnout for a night of fun for everyone with good food and wonderful fellowship.

The man who fed the world

Norman Borlaug, who died at age 95 in mid-September, has been hailed in print since his death as "the man who fed the world," "the man who defused the 'population bomb'" and "arguably, the greatest American of the 20th century."

Borlaug is said to have saved more lives than anyone who has ever lived.

He grew up on a farm and received his early education in a one-room schoolhouse in Cresco, Iowa. As a boy, he wondered why plants and grass grew better in some places than others. His boyhood curiosity led him eventually to pursue graduate studies in plant science and a career that helped teach the world how to feed itself.

Borlaug's contribution came by way of the power of intellect. He developed disease-resistant varieties of wheat and was responsible for major productivity advances in plant breeding. His work led to stunning increases in food production in Latin America and Asia, thus averting mass famines in the 1960s and 1970s. Because of him, food-deficit nations like Mexico and India became self-sufficient in producing cereal grains.

He won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1970. In conferring that award, the Nobel committee expressed the hope that the provision of bread for a hungry world would also help to assure world peace.

To the extent that we live in a world that is broken by unshared bread, the connection between bread and peace was surely worthy of recognition. That link needs to be remembered now by scientists and statesmen alike, as does the link between the life of the mind and the solution of other major problems confronting humankind.

Tomorrow's research scientists and political leaders are sitting in elementary school classrooms today. Someone has to encourage them to cultivate a sense of wonder, apply themselves faithfully to their schoolwork and commit themselves to the task of engaging their intellects with the major problems of their times.

I'd love to see "borlaug" become a verb that means connecting intellectual curiosity with a commitment to the common good. If we're lucky, young people will "borlaug" their way to academic achievement. "Borlauging" might come to mean an exercise of creative imagination in purposeful engagement with challenging problems.

There will, I hope, be research centers and institutes around the country named after him, perhaps at the University of Minnesota where he studied or at Texas A&M University, where he worked until rather recently.

I hope even more that Borlaug's spirit of inquiry and service will find its way into the psyche of many young Americans, the area between their brain and heart. From there, great things can emerge that will provide a lasting tribute to this great man.

We literally cannot afford to forget Norman Borlaug. And we have to find a way to motivate our young to want to be like him.

What it means to be completely pro-life

What does it mean to be pro-life?

This is an essential question for anyone seeking to live a genuinely Catholic Christian experience. And there is no better time to ask it than during October, Respect Life Month.

Certainly, being pro-life means striving for the protection of every unborn human being. In the United States, where more than 3,500 unborn babies are murdered every single day, one cannot possibly claim to be pro-life without earnestly praying and working for an end to abortion. Nearly every Catholic knows this.

But there is much more to being pro-life.

Catholic social teaching insists that faithful daughters and sons of the church must also deeply concern themselves with humanity's many miseries and the myriad threats to life after birth.

The world's bishops at the Second Vatican Council solemnly declared: "The joys and the hopes, the griefs and the anxieties of the men of this age, especially those who are poor or in any way afflicted, these too are the joys and hopes, the griefs and anxieties of the followers of Christ."

The church's social doctrine challenges us to see the big picture of human suffering and to do everything possible to alleviate it.

In the Gospel of Matthew, Jesus warns us that our very salvation depends on how well we respond to those who are hungry, thirsty, strangers, naked, sick and imprisoned.

Jesus didn't say feeding the hungry is more important than welcoming the stranger, or that giving drink to the thirsty is greater than caring for the sick.

No, instead our Lord commanded us to compassionately respond to human suffering in all the ways it presents itself. But many Catholics concern themselves only with one life issue, while largely ignoring the rest. They claim their cause trumps all the rest.

Some work solely to end abortion,

Making a Difference

TONY
MAGLIANO
— CNS COLUMNIST

while others strive to end war. There are those devoted to abolishing capital punishment and those laboring to end hunger. Being committed to any one of these issues, while commendable to a point, is simply not enough.

This narrow perspective is only partially pro-life; it falls far short of a comprehensive respect for life.

In the encyclical "Evangelium Vitae" ("The Gospel of Life"), Pope John Paul II wrote, "As disciples of Jesus, we are called to become neighbors to everyone (see Lk 10:29-37) and to show special favor to those who are poorest, most alone and most in need. In helping the hungry, the thirsty, the foreigner, the naked, the sick, the imprisoned — as well as the child in the womb and the old person who is suffering or near death — we have the opportunity to serve Jesus. ..."

"Where life is involved, the service of charity must be profoundly consistent. It cannot tolerate bias and discrimination, for human life is sacred and inviolable at every stage and in every situation. ..."

"We need then to 'show care' for all life and for the life of everyone" (No. 87).

Not just the unborn, not just the victims of war, not just the hungry, not just the poor, not just the sick, not just the undocumented, not just the sweatshop workers, not just the death-row inmates and not just the homeless, but every suffering human being deserves our help.

This is what it means to be completely pro-life!

Concerning climate change

I was deeply disappointed in Father Matthew Buettner's seeming dismissal of the ecological crisis ("Birth Control could help combat climate change?" on page 14 of the Oct. 2 issue). I would invite Father Buettner and every Catholic to read Pope John Paul II's writings on the environment, especially "The Ecological Crisis." Many American bishops collaborated on another timely document entitled "The Columbia River." The Vatican takes a strong stance on the plight of the environment and I believe we all have a duty to do the same!

Pondering the meaning of hospitality

"Hospitality is the act of the recklessly generous heart."

This great quote from Benedictine Sister Joan Chittister is my meditation for the week. Every word seems like a little gift to be unwrapped, and each word has a tag with my name on it.

Hospitality, in the narrow sense of welcoming people into my home, has sometimes been challenging. Oh, I love to entertain, have a friend drop by for coffee or spend the night.

But I also jealously guard my privacy and my quiet time. I've never been tempted, for instance, to host a foreign student for the year. I like my boundaries.

In the first days of my marriage, my tiny newlywed home in Anchorage seemed to be a central way station as friends journeyed in and out of Alaska.

We were all young and poor, adventuresome and fairly itinerant. Initially, it was great fun with dear friends. Yet the stream of visitors became overwhelming, and I chafed at the sleeping bags piled on the floor and the late-night calls from the airport.

I silently and very guiltily began to subscribe to the adage common to Alaskans: "Fish and guests go bad in three days." No doubt our relatives thought the same thing as my family arrived with our phalanx of suitcases.

Now my friends are all settled and their visits are indeed rare and worth savoring. And as my kids grew older, those summer trips grew fewer — and shorter. Our parents grew too old to visit and other relatives adopted a "been there, done that" attitude toward the big-ticket price of another foray into the 49th state. When a relative arrives now, it's an uncommon treat.

Of course, let's expand hospitality: Hospitality clearly does not just involve our homes. I cultivate hospitality at church, at work or even at the supermarket. I extend hospitality when I comfort the sick, reach out to the frightened, visit the prisoner, make my child feel loved.

But then there's that word "recklessly." According to what Sister Joan posted, hospitality is the act of a recklessly generous heart.

When I've questioned my generosity, whether with my time, my checkbook or my home, I don't think "reckless" was ever part of the test.

For the Journey

But, honestly, wasn't that the kind of generosity Jesus had? The image of Christ to which I often return is of Jesus making the decision to go up to Jerusalem a final time even though he knew the danger that awaited him. Now that's reckless!

And then there's that word "heart." Who had more heart than Jesus, giving when it seemed crazy to give?

The words in Sister Joan's post push up against my boundaries, my orderliness, my caution. They're good fodder for prayer this week.

Medieval abbot example of love, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The ability of a 12th-century French abbot to unite love of God and neighbor with pragmatism in everyday life is a worthy quality for Christians today to strive for, Pope Benedict XVI said.

At his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square Oct. 14, Pope Benedict once again employed the example of an exceptional figure from the past to illustrate universal traits that contemporary Christians should cultivate.

Peter the Venerable was born around 1094 in Auvergne, France, and died in his abbey on Christmas Day, 1156.

"He's a model for both monks and Christians of our time, which is characterized by frenetic rhythms and examples of intolerance, incommunicability, division and conflict," the pope said.

The pope said Peter was open not only to his own neighbors but also to other faiths, especially Judaism and Islam, and he stood out from his contemporaries by studying Islam from original sources and commissioning their translation.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Our catechesis today considers an outstanding churchman of the early twelfth century, Peter the Venerable, abbot of Cluny. Despite his pressing responsibilities and frequent travels in the service of the Church, Peter maintained a contemplative spirit, deep inner tranquility, rigorous asceticism and a capacity for warm friendships. His ability to combine love of God with sincere love of neighbor found expression in a lively sense of the Church. He urged all the members of Christ's Body to be concerned for the trials and difficulties of the universal Church, and he expressed an interest in those outside the Church, specifically Jews and Muslims, in ways which were remarkable for his day.

Prayer stood at the heart of Peter's theology and spirituality, which were nourished by the monastic liturgy and meditation on the mysteries of Christ's life. At Cluny he introduced the feast of the Transfiguration and composed its prayers, centered on the contemplation of the glorious face of Christ.

By his ability to combine prayer and contemplation with love of neighbor and a commitment to the renewal of society, Peter the Venerable reflected the Benedictine ideal and serves as an example to Christians today in their efforts to live holy and integrated lives in our often stressful society.

Surfing the emotional wave

Part two of a three-part series

For me, the hardest part of unemployment was the runaway emotional roller coaster. The highs were much higher and the lows much lower. It felt like I had been swamped by an emotional wave. Here is how the emotional wave works:

First, you get the news that you've been terminated. The sudden change in your life casts you adrift in a turbulent ocean.

As you tumble from wave to wave, you experience shock and denial, fear and panic, anger, bargaining, depression, and temporary acceptance.

Just when you think you've reached the trough of the wave, you begin to climb back up to the crest.

The cycle continues until you learn to positively channel, rather than avoid, your real feelings.

Once you're able to confront and manage your emotional wave you can navigate your way through the stormy waters and eventually safely reach the shore.

Along with emotional issues, you are likely to encounter physical and behavioral symptoms of job-loss trauma. For example, many people report eating and sleeping disorders, forgetfulness, aching limbs, headaches, repetitive dreams, endless chattering, irritability, and hyperactivity while unemployed.

There's often some interplay between the emotional, physical, and behavioral symptoms of job loss. For example, recurring nightmares could heighten depression, or fear and panic might cause headaches or perspiring. While the actual physical and behavioral manifestations of unemployment vary widely from one person to another, the emotional wave typically unfolds in the context of at least some of these symptoms.

Physical symptoms include loss of appetite, forgetfulness, problems falling asleep, lack of concentration, anxiety attacks and migraine headaches. Behavioral symptoms include dizziness, heart palpitations, aching limbs, repetitive dreams, irritability and hyperactivity.

Once you understand the emotional wave you can predict how it might shape the weeks ahead of you and prepare yourself to deal effectively with each emotional stage, as you encounter it.

The first time I lost my job, I thought I could do it on my own. The second time, I mailed out 500 resumes, got 50 responses and five interviews. So far so good.

Unfortunately, none of the five interviews panned out. Guess what? I didn't get a job and had to endure the shame, humiliation and anger that arrives with each rejection letter.

I was tapped out. With no savings and time running out, I went to Mass. I can remember looking at the tabernacle and praying: "Dear Lord, I have been out here trying to find a job alone and without your help. I'm tired Lord and my world is caving in. If you will help me Lord, I promise to never forget what it was like to be unemployed."

It didn't happen all at once, and there was no thunder or lightning moment. Instead, small things began to happen. Little by little, I realized that it was time to take my hands off the steering wheel of life, and let God do the driving.

Archbishop Chaput rejects cardinal's upbeat appraisal of Obama speech

ROME (CNS)—Archbishop Charles J. Chaput of Denver has taken issue with a retired Vatican official's positive assessment of President Barack Obama's speech last May at the University of Notre Dame.

In an essay published by the Italian newspaper Il Foglio Oct. 6, Archbishop Chaput said Swiss Cardinal Georges Cottier, the papal theologian under Pope John Paul II, had been overly generous in his appraisal of the president's words.

In his speech, Obama expressed commitment to reducing the number of abortions and guaranteeing conscientious objection rights for health workers. Cardinal Cottier said in July that the president had moved in the direction of finding "common ground" with the church, and that "his words go in the direction of diminishing the evil."

Archbishop Chaput, noting that many U.S. bishops had objected to the president's appearance at the Indiana university, suggested that Cardinal Cottier might have deferred to the judgment of local pastors.

"Regrettably and unintentionally, Cardinal Cottier's articulate essay undervalues the gravity of what happened at Notre Dame. It also overvalues the consonance of President Obama's thinking with Catholic teaching," Archbishop Chaput wrote. The English text of his article was published on the Web site of Il Foglio.

Archbishop Chaput said Obama's views on vital bioethical issues, including abortion, "differ sharply from Catholic teaching." While many have pointed to Obama's sympathy to the church's social teaching, the archbishop said, "there is no 'social justice' if the youngest and weakest among us can be legally killed."

He said the strong opposition by many U.S. bishops to Notre Dame's hosting and honoring the president was based not on partisan politics but on "serious issues of Catholic belief, identity and witness — triggered by Mr. Obama's views — which Cardinal Cottier, writing from outside the American context, may have misunderstood."

Archbishop Chaput added that the president's search for "common ground" with the church, praised by Cardinal Cottier, is not necessarily a good thing.

"So-called 'common ground' abortion policies may actually attack the common good because they imply a false unity," he said. "The common good is never served by tolerance for killing the weak — beginning with the unborn."

Archbishop Chaput praises Belmont Abbey College for defending 'right to be Catholic'

BELMONT (CNA). — Catholic lay leadership is essential in public life and can accomplish much that Catholic bishops cannot do, Archbishop of Denver Charles J. Chaput has said. His Thursday speech at an awards banquet praised Belmont Abbey College for standing up for its "right to be Catholic," while also warning that evil will certainly triumph if it is left unopposed.

"There may be many times when a bishop or group of bishops needs to speak out publicly about the moral consequences of a public issue. But the main form of Catholic leadership in wider society — in the nation's political, economic and social life — needs to be done by you, the Catholic lay faithful," he said.

The archbishop's remarks came in his acceptance speech for the Envoy of the Year Award bestowed by Belmont Abbey College's Envoy Institute.

Archbishop Chaput emphasized the need to form Catholic lay leaders who know and love the teachings of the church and faithfully live them out.

"But once those lay leaders exist, clergy cannot and should not interfere with the leadership that rightly belongs, by baptism, to their vocation as lay apostles," he explained.

The archbishop's remarks touched upon topics such as the nature of the state, the nature of Catholics' Christian faith and the nature of the lay vocation.

He also reflected on patriotism, calling it a virtue for Christians.

"Love for the best qualities in our homeland is a noble thing. This is why military service and public office are not just socially useful vocations, but — at their best — great and honorable ones," the archbishop continued.

While Jesus' words about the distinction between "the things that are Caesar's" and "the things that are God's" acknowledges that Caesar, the state, has rights, these words also show that Caesar is not a god and has no rights over the things that are God's.

"And ultimately, everything important about human life belongs not to Caesar, but to God: our intellect, our talents, our free will; the people we love; the beauty and goodness in the world; our soul, our moral integrity, our hope for eternal life. These are the things that matter. These are the things worth fighting for. And none of them comes from the state."

Invoking the example of American Founding Father Charles Carroll, who suffered forms of anti-Catholic bigotry, he said that religious prejudice faced now has a different appearance.

"Caesar wears a different suit. He has great media handlers. He bullies religion while he claims to respect it. He talks piously about the law and equality and tolerance and fairness. But he still confuses himself with God — and he still violates the rights of Catholic believers and institutions by intruding himself where he has no right to be."

The archbishop then referred to Belmont Abbey College's dispute with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which reversed itself and declared that the Catholic college's refusal to cover contraceptives is discriminatory against women.

"It's one of the great ironies of the moment that tiny Belmont Abbey would have the courage to challenge Caesar over its right to be faithfully Catholic in its policies, while so many other American Catholics seem eager to give Caesar honors."

"If you stand up to evil, you may lose. But if you don't stand up, you will lose," the archbishop continued, crediting Belmont Abbey for its defense of its "right to be Catholic."

He urged Catholic citizens to demand modesty of political leaders and to show love to others not in feeling alone but in deeds.

"Working to defend the sanctity of human persons and the dignity of the human family is an obligation of Christian love. Therefore, the church can't be silent in public life and be faithful to Jesus Christ at the same time," he added.

"Our God is a God of justice; a God who does not abandon his people and who rewards courage in the face of evil. So have courage, serve the truth, love the church, take confidence in the Lord, and stand up to witness for your faith," Archbishop Chaput's speech concluded. "We've got nothing to lose. We have everything to gain."

Bishop Curlin honored by Order of Malta

CHARLOTTE — As a long-time chaplain for an ancient order dedicated to serving the poor and the sick, Bishop William G. Curlin has led by example.

Bishop Curlin, Bishop Emeritus of Charlotte, will be presented with the Cross Pro Piis Meritis, an award given to clergy who have performed outstanding service on behalf of the Order of Malta, in Washington, D.C. Oct. 24.

Bishop Curlin was recommended for the award by the Federal association in Washington, D.C., one of three associations of the Order in the United States, and was approved and awarded the recognition by the Sovereign Council of the Order headquartered in Rome.

Officially known as the Sovereign Military Hospitaller Order of St. John of Jerusalem, of Rhodes and of Malta, the Order of Malta was established to care for pilgrims during the Crusades. Today it is an active lay Catholic religious order and a worldwide humanitarian network. The members, called knights and dames, commit to live as defenders of the Catholic faith and to perform works of mercy.

There are about 13,000 members worldwide, with 3,000 in the United States — divided into the American, Western and Federal associations.

Bishop Curlin has been a chaplain for the order for the past 21 years and established a chapter of the Order of Malta in the Diocese of Charlotte in 1995.

CATHOLIC WAR HERO

U.S. Army chaplain Father Emil Joseph Kapaun is pictured offering Mass in this undated photo. He has an open case for sainthood and is being considered for the U.S. military's Medal of Honor.

Father Kapaun, Korean War hero, recommended for Medal of Honor

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Father Emil Kapaun, the U.S. Army chaplain who saved the lives of dozens of soldiers and died as a prisoner of war in North Korea in 1951, should receive the Medal of Honor, the Army's top official determined prior to leaving his post in September.

Father Kapaun, a priest of the Diocese of Wichita, Kan., was deserving of the honor because of his actions to protect and inspire soldiers, wrote former Secretary of the Army Preston M. Geren III in a letter to Rep. Todd Tiahrt, R-Kan. Geren left his position Sept. 21 when a new secretary was sworn in.

A canonization cause for Father Kapaun formally opened June 29, 2008, with a Mass at St. John Nepomucene Church in his hometown of Pilsen. Church officials in Kansas and elsewhere had been collecting documentation to support the sainthood cause for years prior to its official opening. Archbishop Edwin F. O'Brien of Baltimore started the process in 1993 when, as head of the U.S. military archdiocese, he called for Father Kapaun to receive the title servant of God.

"After giving this request careful, personal consideration, I have determined that Chaplain Kapaun's actions in combat operations and as a prisoner of war in Korea warrant award of the Medal of Honor," Geren said in the letter.

As far back as 2001, Tiahrt had asked then-Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld to review Father Kapaun's record.

That record shows the 35-year-old chaplain could have fallen back to safer ground when he and his men were overrun during battle. He chose to stay and was captured along with dozens of soldiers.

Father Kapaun died of starvation and pneumonia May 23, 1951, in the prison in Pyoktong, North Korea. Former prisoners of war said that during his captivity Father Kapaun defied the intimidating Chinese camp guards by praying with captive soldiers, sharing food rations with injured comrades and urging them to resist relentless interrogation.

Some of those held captive with Father Kapaun had petitioned the Army for years to award the medal.

Congress and President Barack Obama must approve the recommendation before the medal can be awarded.

U.S.-Caritas calls for justice in health care

ROME (CNS) — A conference on creating partnerships between government and faith-based organizations to fight HIV and AIDS, particularly among children, turned into something of a rally for a more just global distribution of wealth, health and technology.

Sponsored by the U.S. Embassy to the Holy See and Caritas Internationalis, the Oct. 14-16 conference brought together dozens of Catholic religious and lay organizations providing care to people with AIDS, along with representatives from governments, the United Nations and some of the world's largest pharmaceutical houses.

The fact that "800 children in Africa die every day from AIDS-related illnesses" is "a terrible tragedy, but it is also a scandal," said Lesley-Anne Knight, secretary-general of Caritas Internationalis, the Vatican-based umbrella organization for Catholic charities.

It is a scandal "because we can do something about it," Knight said. Reliable tests exist for knowing whether a pregnant woman is HIV-positive, therapies exist for drastically reducing her chances of transmitting the virus to her baby and tests exist for determining if an infant has the virus and needs treatment, she said.

But in the poorer countries of the world, too many mothers go untested and too few children receive special pediatric AIDS drugs if they get any treatment at all, she said.

A partnership between the U.S. government and Catholic organizations is essential, said Miguel H. Diaz, the U.S. ambassador to the Vatican, since "the United States is the largest donor of global aid (and) the church is the world's largest aid-delivery organization."

Pope establishes structure for Episcopalians uniting with Rome

Details forthcoming on how diocesan churches will receive new members

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI has established a special structure for Anglicans/Episcopalians who want to be in full communion with the Roman Catholic Church while preserving aspects of their Anglican spiritual and liturgical heritage, said U.S. Cardinal William J. Levada.

Anglicans are members of The Church of England that split from the Roman Catholic Church when King Henry VIII declared himself the head of the church in England in the 16th century. In the United States The Church of England was renamed the Episcopal Church after the American Revolutionary War.

The cardinal, prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, said a new apostolic constitution would establish "personal ordinariates" — similar to dioceses — to oversee the pastoral care of those who want to bring elements of their Anglican identity into the Catholic Church with them.

Anglican priests who are married and desire to serve as priests can be ordained Catholic priests, although married Anglican bishops will not be able to function as Catholic bishops in keeping with the longstanding Catholic and Orthodox tradition of ordaining only unmarried clergy as bishops, Cardinal Levada said.

The cardinal announced the new arrangement during a press conference Oct. 20 at the Vatican. He said the pope's apostolic constitution and norms for implementing were undergoing final revisions and would be published in a couple of weeks.

In North Carolina the three Episcopal dioceses are headquartered in Raleigh, Asheville and Wilmington. Diocesan websites report membership of 71,000 people.

By comparison the state's two Catholic dioceses of Charlotte and Raleigh report registered membership of 349,000 Catholics.

In establishing the new jurisdictions, Pope Benedict is responding to "many requests" submitted by individual Anglicans and Anglican groups — including "20 to 30 bishops" — asking to enter into full communion with the Catholic Church, the cardinal said.

At the same time, Cardinal Levada explained, the new provision does not weaken the commitment of the Vatican to promoting Christian unity, but is a recognition that many Anglicans share the Catholic faith and that Anglicans have a spiritual and liturgical life worth preserving.

"It has always been the principal aim — the principal aim — to achieve the full, visible unity" of the Catholic Church and Anglican Communion, the cardinal said.

But given recent changes within many Anglican provinces with the ordination of women priests and bishops, and the acceptance of homosexuality in some areas, the prospect of full unity "seemed to recede," he said.

The church recognizes and welcomes those Anglicans who fully share the Catholic faith, agree with the Catholic doctrine that only men can be ordained priests and recognize the role of the bishop of Rome — the pope — as the sign and guarantor of church unity, he said.

Cardinal Francis George, president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said the church in America "stands ready to collaborate" with the Vatican in implementing a new provision to receive Anglicans into the Catholic Church.

Cardinal Levada said the norms for admitting Episcopalians into the Catholic Church will be published by the Vatican, "in the next couple of weeks."

David Hains diocesan Director of Communication contributed to this story.

GASTONIA VICARIATE

GASTONIA — St. Michael the Archangel Church, 708 St. Michael's Lane, will host Father Scott Daniels from Priests For Life Oct. 24-25. Father Daniels will be the celebrant and homilist for the 5 p.m. Saturday and 7:30 and 10 a.m. Sunday Masses. He will also speak between the two Sunday Masses (8:45 to 9:45 a.m.) in the Parish Center. A pot luck lunch followed by a talk to the youth and adults concerning chastity and modesty will take place at 11:30 a.m. Sunday. Parishioners are also invited to join Father Daniels for prayer outside the abortion facility at 3220 Latrobe Dr., Charlotte, Oct. 24. We will meet at the church at 8 a.m. and return at 1 p.m. For information, contact Deacon Art or Rosemary Kingsley at (828) 713-4341.

GREENSBORO VICARIATE

GREENSBORO — A public rosary crusade to honor Our Lady of Fatima and pray for our nation will take place every Saturday in October at the corner of Hwy. 68 and Skeet Club Rd. at 11:45 a.m. St. Louis de Montfort said, "Public prayer is far more powerful than private prayer to appease the anger of God and call down his mercy, and holy mother church, guided by the Holy Ghost, has always advocated public prayer in times of public tragedy and suffering." Parking is available in the Big Lots parking lot. For more information, contact Ann Keefe at (336) 434-4174.

HIGH POINT — A fall session of HOSEA (Hope of Seeing Everyone Again) will be held at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church, 4145 Johnson St., Wednesdays from 7:15 to 9 p.m. beginning Oct. 21 and running for six weeks. If you or someone you know has been away from the Catholic Church but might want to come back, HOSEA is a small group setting where one can ask questions, get answers and find out what is new since they have been away. For information, call Jan Hitch at (336) 884-5097.

GREENSBORO — Laure Hoffman from LifeSteward Ministries will speak on the topic, "What's Going On Outside the Church with Abstinence, Abortion & Crisis Pregnancy," at the Oct. 25th session of CoffeeTalk at St. Pius X Church, 2210 North Elm St., at 10:15 a.m. For more information, call the church office at (336) 272-4681.

This year the Red Mass coincided with the Catholic Church's yearly celebration of Respect Life Sunday. The principal celebrant, Anchorage Archbishop Roger L. Leaders, lawmakers and judges, he said, must work to protect those blessings for the good of all humankind.

DIOCESAN REQUIREMENTS FOR REPORTING MINISTRY-RELATED SEXUAL ABUSE OF A MINOR

1. Any individual having actual knowledge of or reasonable cause to suspect an incident of ministry-related sexual abuse is to immediately report the incident to the Chancery.
2. The Chancery will then report the incident to the proper civil authorities. The individual reporting the incident to the Chancery will be notified of the particulars regarding the Chancery's filing of the incident with civil authorities.
3. This reporting requirement is not intended to supersede the right of an individual to make a report to civil authority, but is to ensure proper, complete and timely reporting. Should an individual choose to make a report to civil authority, a report is still to be made to the Chancery.

Sister RoseMary Boessen, R.S.M., receives the Lumen Christi award, the nation's highest honor for a missionary, from Father Jack Wall in Twin Falls, Idaho Oct. 7. The Most Reverend Michael Patrick Driscoll, Bishop of the Diocese of Boise, looks on. Sister RoseMary is a missionary in an isolated region of southern Idaho.

Nation's highest honor for missionary given to champion of poor in rural america

CHICAGO (CNS)—Catholic Church Extension Society has named Sister RoseMary Boessen, R.S.M., of the Diocese of Boise the recipient of the 2009 Lumen Christi Award, the nation's highest honor given annually to a missionary, in recognition of her exceptional service to the poor and isolated in southern Idaho.

For 32 years, the Lumen Christi Award, Latin for "Light of Christ," has been presented annually to an individual serving in one of America's mission dioceses to better the lives of those in need. In addition to the award, the recipient receives $25,000, as does the recipient's diocese.

Nominated for the 2009 award by Bishop Michael Driscoll of the Diocese of Boise, Sister RoseMary, of Twin Falls, ID, has dedicated her life to the people of southern Idaho, developing religious education programs, establishing a group foster home for teenage girls, ministering to prisoners, and supporting and empowering the growing Hispanic population in the area.

In 1993, Sr. RoseMary founded La Posada, a nonprofit organization that assists Hispanics living in the diocese. In 2008 alone, La Posada programs served 3,000 people.

"On behalf of all of our donors who give so generously to Catholic Extension, we are deeply honored to name Sister RoseMary the 2009 Lumen Christi Award recipient in recognition of the innovation and creativity she has brought to the challenge of meeting the needs of many with few resources," said Father Jack Wall, president of Catholic Extension. "The Lumen Christi Award is one way Catholic Extension fulfills its mission to enable countless men and women like Sister RoseMary to live Christ's command to, 'Go out and bring good news to the poor.'"

Lumen Christi Award nominations are accepted from bishops of more than 80 mission dioceses that receive support from Catholic Extension. This year, 36 individuals were nominated, and the recipient was selected by a panel of judges comprised of church leaders, Catholic Extension donors and past recipients that included: Mr. Arturo Chavez, Mexican American Catholic College; Sunny Chico, Extension donor; Dr. Carol Cottrill, 2008 Lumen Christi Award Recipient; Bishop Joseph Howze, First Bishop of Biloxi; Lawrence Hyde, Extension donor; Peter Maren, Extension donor; Bob Newhart, actor and Extension donor.

Sister RoseMary was selected among many nominees in appreciation for the nearly 40 years she has tirelessly devoted to serving southern Idaho.

"Time and again, and with very little support, Sister RoseMary has built effective, lasting ministries that serve the marginalized, the poorest of the poor," said Chris Plunkett, Lumen Christi Award regional judge. "I noted the tremendously high esteem that so many have for her, and was particularly impressed by the ripple effect that her example has had in her community."

For more than 50 years, Sr. RoseMary has served as a Sister of Mercy, an international order of Roman Catholic women religious who have taken vows to serve those experiencing poverty, sickness and lack of education.

A celebration and Mass to honor Sr. RoseMary was held in Twin Falls Oct. 7.

About Catholic Church Extension Society

For more than 100 years, the Chicago-based Catholic Church Extension Society has supported Catholic missions in the U.S. by funding church construction, religious education and seminary formation, campus and outreach ministries, evangelization, and salaries for missionaries. Catholic Extension is the leading supporter of Catholic missions in the U.S. and has distributed more than $450 million over its history.

A seed of hope

World Mission Day funds serve universal church

BY FATHER MARK LAWLOR
GUEST COLUMNIST

Through the centuries, the faith has been proclaimed to people throughout the world. In his message for this year's World Mission Sunday, Pope Benedict XVI noted that the universal Church knows neither borders nor frontiers and is aware of her responsibility to proclaim the Gospel to the world.

Our Holy Father explained that it is the duty of the Church, called to be a seed of hope, to continue Christ's service in the world and to strive to transform the world through the proclamation of the Gospel of love.

Ultimately, our missionary efforts are directed to the salvation of souls, but Pope Benedict acknowledged real material needs and encouraged financial support for the missions.

A means for missions

I was recently appointed by Bishop Peter J. Jugis as the new diocesan director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith after my good friend and brother priest, Monsignor Anthony Kovacic, concluded 14 years of service in this office.

Since my appointment, I have received requests for mission appeals from dioceses, religious orders, agencies and ministries throughout the world.

As we receive many more requests than we can accommodate, one of my tasks as diocesan director will be to evaluate these requests and recommend to the diocese which mission appeals will be accepted for 2010 and which parishes should host the appeals.

In 2008, 46 parishes responded to the Missionary Cooperative Plan and donated over $240,000. Approximately half of our parishes will be asked to host a mission appeal next year.

Enthusiastic support

I have seen that there is a missionary spirit in our diocese. Several parishes have supported missions in other parts of the world and many priests and lay persons have been on mission trips.

In our parish, St. Vincent de Paul in Charlotte, we have supported the missions in the jungle region of Peru for the last three years as a 'Sister Parish Project.'

We also recently supported the construction of a home for mothers and children that is a ministry of the Missionaries of the Poor in Jamaica. I know that many parishes regularly support mission projects.

I humbly ask the parishioners of the diocese to be generous to the Missionary Cooperative Appeals in your parish and to support the ongoing mission of the Church.

Even in the midst of a recession, we have much for which to be thankful. There are areas in the world where resources are very limited. There remains a great need for evangelists, missionaries and catechists — in foreign missions as well as here in home missions.

Supporting the missions unites us with our brothers and sisters throughout the Church. We have a shared mission. Pope Benedict wrote that: "Christ is the answer to a troubled world as His Gospel message brings hope and can change one's life for the better."

Father Lawlor is the pastor of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte.

Proud member of St. James Church

Bishop Curlin honored

MALTA, from page 1

"The work Bishop Curlin has done to develop the order in the Diocese of Charlotte has not been a single act, but a significant commitment on his part over a number of years," said Jackie Gallagher, a member of the Committee on Awards and Decorations for the Order of Malta.

Starting from scratch

When Bishop Curlin was installed Bishop of Charlotte in 1994, there were two members of the order living in Charlotte — Harry Grim, who was a member of the Western association, and Chuck Grace, who was a member of the American association.

Bishop Curlin met with Grim and Grace and asked them to transfer to the Federal association and to help him begin building a chapter in Charlotte.

"With their help and inspiration the order has grown here beautifully," said Bishop Curlin.

The chapter now has more than 30 knights and dames of the Federal association with several applicants in place for 2009 and 2010.

As chaplain of the Charlotte chapter, Bishop Curlin celebrates Mass for the knights and dames every first Friday, as well as on the feast of St. John the Baptist and Christmas. He also serves as a spiritual director for members of the order.

"Retirement has freed me from administrative work so I can devote my time totally to spiritual work."

"Bishop Curlin's activities with the order flow from his own personal love for the sick and the poor," said Gallagher.

"He always has paid special attention to those marginalized by society, helping to establish soup kitchens, a home for battered women and children, and with Mother Teresa's support, a home for those dying of AIDS," said Gallagher. "He has served as chaplain to the AIDS victims and helped them face death with the love of Christ in their souls."

A special devotion

One of the order's principal works is taking groups of sick and disabled people on an annual pilgrimage to Lourdes, France. Knights and dames in the Diocese of Charlotte are faithful participants in this pilgrimage and Bishop Curlin has made the pilgrimage for the past 17 years.

Members of the Order of Malta "recognize that by actively serving the poor and the sick they are serving Christ," said Bishop Curlin. "They must make a commitment to engage actively in these works of charity and love. The pilgrimage to Lourdes is one of the ways in which they very actively serve those who are physically ill."

The church has recognized as miracles 67 cures attributed to Mary's intercession at Lourdes, but pilgrims believe many more undocumented miracles have also occurred.

Each year, more than 5 million pilgrims bathe in or drink the spring water at Lourdes in search of a miraculous cure, but there is more to be gained than just physical healing.

"The main healing is spiritual — a deepening of your faith and an understanding of how to accept suffering as the passion of Jesus in one's life," said Bishop Curlin.

Continuing service

Bishop Curlin retired as Bishop of Charlotte in 2002, but has continued to provide ministerial support in the diocese and beyond.

He helps pastors in the diocese by celebrating Masses at parishes when there is a need and, like all priests, he stays busy administering the sacraments.

"Retirement has freed me from administrative work so I can devote my time totally to spiritual work," he said.

"It is a blessing to be able to visit the sick and offer help and comfort to their families," said Bishop Curlin.

Bishop Curlin is also in high demand as a retreat director for priests, religious and lay people across the United States.

"Anyone who knows Bishop Curlin comes to consider him a friend," said Gallagher. "He lives his own life by following the advice he gives all of us in the order, and that is to 'allow the Jesus in us to see the Jesus in others,'" she said.

"That's what Mother Teresa said," added Bishop Curlin. "When you rise up in the morning God wakes up in you; and through you, Jesus reveals his presence to others."

"Everyone makes that commitment through baptism," said Bishop Curlin. "Through baptism you actually have become the presence of Christ in this world."

Christ's mission called source, strength of church's care for migrants

MALVERN, Pa. (CNS) — Those who care for migrants and refugees are not motivated “simply by good will or a commitment to justice,” but by the fact that the Son of God was “a stranger in a foreign land” and reached out to the marginalized, Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia said in an Oct. 8 homily.

Christ's mission “is the source and strength of our work on behalf of forced migrants and refugees, asylees and immigrants, and victims of human trafficking,” the cardinal said.

In his public ministry, Christ “sought out the marginalized and those who were on the outskirts,” Cardinal Rigali said. “And he went even further: He suffered, died and was buried. He went down among the dead to seek out the lost and he rose again victorious.”

The cardinal gave the homily during a Mass in Malvern, in the Philadelphia Archdiocese, that was celebrated during a regional convening of Justice for Immigrants: A Journey of Hope, the U.S. bishops' campaign for comprehensive immigration reform.

The campaign's goals are to educate the public and Catholic community about migration and immigrants; create political will for positive immigration reform; work for enactment of legislative and administrative reforms based on the bishops' principles; and organize Catholic networks to help qualified immigrants obtain the benefits of reform.

Cardinal Rigali said the church's mission to migrants and refugees anticipates the time described in the Gospel of Matthew when Christ “comes in his glory” and “all the nations will be assembled before him.”

“Our gathering here this morning and your work every day anticipate that gathering of the nations, that unity of the peoples, that assembly of all the citizens of the world,” he said.

“There will be no walls or fences, no camps or detention centers, no raids or human smuggling, no dishonesty or violence, no exploitation by employers, and no downtrodden classes or unrecognized status,” he continued. “And from that vantage point, the Lord Jesus will call together, gather into an even greater unity, those who ... have fed the hungry, given drink to the thirsty, welcomed the stranger, clothed the naked and visited the imprisoned.”

The church's welcoming of the stranger and those in need “is more than polite manners or proper etiquette,” he said, because “Jesus calls us to love those who suffer” and he “abides with those who are suffering.”

Cardinal Rigali continued: “When we care for victims of human trafficking, when we assist refugees in resettlement, when we advance the work of children's services, when we uphold the human dignity and human rights of those who are undocumented, when we offer haven and protection to those seeking asylum, when we offer safe passage, respect and opportunities to immigrants, we also welcome the Lord Jesus.”

“Our moral status as a nation, as citizens and as believers is founded immediately on our ability to welcome and care for the weakest among us.”

— Cardinal Rigali

He said that “the work of organizing, advocacy, communication and Catholic moral teaching in social justice is our response to the voice of Jesus.”

“Our moral status as a nation, as citizens and as believers is founded immediately on our ability to welcome and care for the weakest among us,” he added.

He said it was no accident that the author of the day's reading from the Book of Deuteronomy used “the alien, the orphan, the widow” four times.

“In fact,” he said, “the laws of worship of the Deuteronomical Code are closely aligned with caring for the poor and acting with justice. The ancient pilgrimage feasts of the Israelites required the participation of the poor for validity as worship.”

Cardinal Rigali also referred to what Pope Benedict XVI said about migration in his social encyclical, “Caritas in Veritate” (“Charity in Truth”), released in June. He said the pope emphasized that international collaboration and cooperation are essential to human migration policies.

He quoted from the 2002 joint pastoral letter of the Mexican and U.S. bishops, “Strangers No Longer: Together on the Journey of Hope”: “Conversion of mind and heart leads to communion expressed through hospitality on the part of receiving communities and a sense of belonging and welcome on the part of those in the communities where migrants are arriving.”

The cardinal affirmed the church's work on behalf of “migrants and refugees, immigrants and those who seek asylum, and to victims of human trafficking and children who are orphaned, displaced and suffering.”

“We seek to secure adequate medical care and nutrition, to advance education and the recognition of rights, to provide resettlement and regularization,” he said. “As we offer these works of charity and justice in their various forms, the Lord Jesus recognizes them and sends the Holy Spirit so that our work may help advance and deepen the unity of the children of God.”

CONFRONT GLOBAL POVERTY INITIATIVE

A homeless child stands in front of a pot and a make-shift hut in late March in Nosybe, Madagascar. The U.S. Bishops and Catholic Relief Services say more than 250,000 Catholics are praying for those in poverty as well as advocating for policies that will address the bleak situation. The goal of the initiative is to reach one million Catholics.

Global poverty initiative reaches more than 250,000 U.S. Catholics

WASHINGTON (CNS) — More than 250,000 Catholics have been reached through the Catholics Confront Global Poverty initiative, a joint effort by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and Catholic Relief Services to address the root causes of global poverty through education and advocacy.

In less than seven months, the initiative has reached one quarter of its goal to mobilize one million Catholics, according to a recent announcement from the USCCB and CRS, the U.S. bishops' overseas relief and development agency.

The initiative calls on Catholics to learn about and share the stories of those struggling to rise above extreme poverty, to pray for the world's poorest people and to approach policymakers on the issue as advocates for the poor worldwide.

“The global financial crisis is having a devastating impact on people here and the poor around the world, and the progress that has been made could be wiped out for decades to come,” Ken Hackett, CRS president, said in a statement. “In a world where an estimated 1.4 billion people live in extreme poverty, the message of the church is clear. As Catholics, we are called to help our brothers and sisters in need.”

Catholics Confront Global Poverty was launched in February 2009 in response to Pope Benedict XVI's 2009 message for the World Day of Peace, titled “Fighting Poverty to Build Peace.”

Through his encyclical, “Caritas in Veritate” (“Charity in Truth”), the pope reiterated his plea for richer nations to stand with people living in poverty and take action, especially in light of the global financial crisis.

“Through support for economically poor countries by means of financial plans inspired by solidarity ... not only can true economic growth be generated, but a contribution can be made toward sustaining the productive capacities of rich countries that risk being compromised by the crisis,” he said in the encyclical.

As of mid-September, the USCCB and CRS said, more than 250,000 Catholics — in parishes, in schools and universities, and in communities of men and women religious — have been connected to grass-roots efforts to raise awareness of global poverty.

Participants in the initiative are involved in social networking, presentations and prayers, and many have sent messages to and visited with their elected officials on legislative measures to fight global poverty.

The USCCB and CRS said grass-roots advocacy by Catholics who objected to cuts in the 2010 State Foreign Operations Appropriations bill helped protect funding for anti-poverty initiatives.

“This is a great example of how our advocacy work benefits those we serve overseas while at the same time providing opportunities for Catholics to act on their faith and join the work of CRS,” Hackett said.

The initiative asks Catholics to take action on issues such as improving and increasing U.S. international assistance; strengthening international peacekeeping and peace-building initiatives; reforming global trade and agriculture policies; ensuring that poorer countries' natural resources are used in ways that protect the environment; promoting comprehensive immigration reform; and addressing global climate change.

International award for Greensboro church associate at St. Pius X Church, made a presentation to the conference that described the stewardship activities and the results achieved at the parish since it first adopted stewardship in 1986. "In the early days the parish was involved in a lot of different stewardship activities but we didn't use that terminology," said Welliver.

St. Pius X Church traces its stewardship roots to community outreach such as the support of Dolan Manor, a 57-unit low income HUD-subsidized housing complex built on parish property. Their involvement grew 10 years ago when a partnership was forged between the parish and a community in the mountains of Manazo, Peru. Over the years 125 parishioners have traveled to the South American community and have helped to advance health care in the community, funded the first village telephone system and provided funding to rebuild a church.

Welliver says the stewardship message is delivered through everything from brochures to prayer cards to sermons. Ninety percent of the messages emphasize the gifts of time and talent while only 10 percent focus on treasure. The 12-member stewardship commission also organizes an annual ministry day, as well as a day of reflection that is open to all parishioners of St. Pius X Church.

Monsignor Anthony Marcaccio, pastor of St. Pius X Church stated, "Over the years we have moved from seeing stewardship as a program or a way of getting people to volunteer toward a vision of stewardship as a way of life. Through our stewardship, we embrace the imperative of the mission of the church - 'to go and teach all the nations the Good News.' Our stewardship is the concrete means to live the consistent mandate of Christ, His great Mandatum

- to serve. Far more than volunteering we are seeing stewardship as accepting the responsibility that comes with the freedom of being the children of God."

Of receiving the award, Msgr. Marcaccio stated, "In this Year For Priests, I thank God for the unmerited grace and privilege that is mine to serve and shepherd this parish family as it answers its baptismal call and grows to full stature in Christ."

The parish credits stewardship with significant growth in several areas. Mass attendance has increased by 24 percent over the past five years, a number that exceeds the 18 percent overall growth of the parish.

Ministry involvement among parishioners has grown as well. Currently 50 percent of St. Pius X Church's 4,200 registered members are involved in 85 ministries.

Although giving, or treasure, is less emphasized, the parish has seen offertory giving rise by nearly 60 percent over the last nine years. St. Pius X Church is also the first parish in the diocese to exceed a million dollars in its endowment, primarily through a focus on planned giving.

Jim Kelley, diocesan director of development and president of the ICSC board said, "When stewardship is practiced in a parish community, the lives of the individual members are transformed as well as the parish community itself."

The Murphy award is named for the late Archbishop Thomas J. Murphy of Seattle who championed the concept of stewardship throughout his priestly ministry. Archbishop Murphy died in 1994. The award was created by the ICSC in 1997.

For parishes that are considering approaching their ministerial and volunteer activities through stewardship, Welliver has some advice: "You don't have to start everything at once," he says. "You are never going to be truly ready, so it is best to follow the advice of the Nike slogan and 'Just Do It.'"

Different faiths construct common goal

Interfaith community builds Habitat home

BY KATHLEEN HEALY SCHMEIDER
CORRESPONDENT

In addition to building homes, Asheville Area Habitat for Humanity (AAHH) has helped to build ties among area churches for the eleven years interfaith houses have been under construction.

"This project is in partnership among the churches in the area," said Betsy Warren, House Sponsor Coordinator. "In this day and age where everybody talks about hate and violence across faiths worldwide, the interfaith house has people from different denominations come together and work together to build a house for a family in need. It becomes a peace-making initiative."

The 2009 Interfaith House for AAHH is located in Enka. Members from area churches united in their efforts to build the 884-square-foot home. Baha'i Faith Center; Congregation Beth HaTephila; Beth Israel Synagogue; First Christian Church of Asheville; First Congregational Church; Jubilee! Community; Inc.; the parishes of St. Eugene Church, St. Barnabas Church, the Basilica of St. Lawrence, St. Margaret Mary Church; Unitarian Universalist Church of Asheville and Unity Center of Fletcher/Mills River are not only giving their time and talents to the project through volunteers, but also have committed to working toward raising $25,000 toward funding of the project.

In addition to the dedication of the workers on this house, new residents will be doubly rewarded since the Asheville Area Habitat organization tithes house-for-house. Funding is provided to build a home in another country for every home that is built in Buncombe County. Countries currently receiving these funds include Guatemala, Mozambique, Egypt, Vietnam and Bangladesh.

The house in Enka, begun in August of this year, is nearing completion and is expected to be finished by December. At this time, painting has been completed, interior trim work is underway, and the home is ready for cabinet installation.

"Other Habitat affiliates and Habitat International expressed disbelief that we could have so many different faiths work together on a house," said Warren. "Now the other affiliates from across the country call and ask us how we do it."

Through commitment to community and to God, these churches build homes for those who need their help. Catholic churches in the Asheville area bring the tenets of faith into action alongside others who seek to serve God and humanity.

Jubilee in Asheville

Jerusalem was followed by altar servers, priests and bishops.

Always beautiful, the basilica was resplendent with flowers on the pews, beneath the Stations of the Cross, on the altar and communion rails. Some were spread on gold cloths marking the red and gold colors of the basilica.

In his homily, Bishop Peter J. Jugis noted that James Cardinal Gibbons proclaimed at the church's consecration in 1920 that, "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, today, and forever." The bishop stated that the basilica still inspires us today and that Jesus Christ is the one who says to each of us, "Come follow me."

Bishop Jugis said the church's stained glass windows proclaim the presence of Jesus Christ even when no one is in the building. "Everything in this church speaks to us of Jesus Christ," the bishop said. "The risen Christ presides over this assembly and reigns supreme over this parish family. Every Mass brings you into communion with Christ Himself in Holy Communion."

After the Mass, Father Wilbur Thomas, pastor of St. Lawrence Church, read a letter from Archbishop Pietro Sambi, Papal Nuncio to the United States for Pope Benedict XVI, conferring his Apostolic Blessing on the people of the parish.

Concelebrating the Mass with Bishop Jugis was Bishop Emeritus Joseph Howze of the Diocese of Biloxi, Mississippi. Bishop Howze was pastor of St. Anthony's church in Asheville and became pastor of St. Lawrence when the two churches merged. He also celebrated the Sunday noon Mass and spoke to the congregation, his voice amazingly strong at the age of 86.

Also concelebrating were: Abbott Placid Solari of Belmont Abbey; Msgr. David Brockman, representing Bishop Michael Burbidge of the Diocese of Raleigh; Msgr. John J. McSweeney, former pastor; Father Morris Boyd, parochial vicar of St. Lawrence Church; Father Larry LoMonaco, pastor of St. John the Baptist Church in Waynesville; Father John Pagel, former pastor of St. Joan of Arc Church; and Father Frank Seabo, former parochial vicar of the basilica. Deacon Richard Voegel assisted at Mass.

After Saturday's celebratory Mass, clergy, parishioners, visitors, Asheville civic leaders and residents attended a reception at the Haywood Hotel in downtown Asheville.

Bishop Jugis delivers the solemn blessing at the end of the Centennial Jubilee Mass at the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville.

CONNECTING CHRISTIANS

Cardinal Walter Kasper, president of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, presents his book on ecumenical dialogue during a press conference at the Vatican Oct. 15. The book, titled "Harvesting the Fruits: Basic Aspects of Christian Faith in Ecumenical Dialogue," covers 40 years of dialogue with mainline Protestant churches.

Ecumenical quality control

Cardinal reviews 40 years of dialogue

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — When Cardinal Walter Kasper, the Vatican's chief ecumenist, tried to harvest the fruits of 40 years of dialogue with the mainline Protestant churches, he did it by the piece, not the bushel.

The result is a 207-page book, "Harvesting the Fruits: Basic Aspects of Christian Faith in Ecumenical Dialogue," which celebrates abundant growth in understanding among Christians, but with a sharp sense of quality control.

The book bears the cardinal's name as author, although others had a hand in the project: former and current members of the cardinal's Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, the cardinal-members of the council and theologians from other Christian communities.

Four decades of official Catholic dialogues with the Anglican Communion, the Lutheran World Federation, the World Methodist Council and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches have led to recognition of a strong shared faith in Jesus Christ and the Trinity, the content of the creed and baptism, the book said.

It highlighted a "fresh and renewed understanding of the relation between Scripture and tradition" and the almost miraculous agreements with Lutherans and Methodists on justification — how people are made righteous in the eyes of God — which was the key dispute of the Protestant Reformation.

But it acknowledged serious differences in understanding and in practice regarding the meaning of ordination and who can be ordained, the question of authority in the church and who exercises it, and how Christian communities can determine what constitutes an authentic interpretation of Scripture.

In addition, the book acknowledges that while many of the historic disputes that kept Christians divided have been overcome, differences over new ethical problems — particularly concerning human sexuality — are moving some of the churches further apart and even creating new divisions within individual Christian communities.

The cardinal, his staff and representatives of the Catholic Church's four dialogue partners will gather in February to study the book as the basis for a discussion on "the future of Western ecumenism," Cardinal Kasper said.

Presenting the book at the Vatican, Cardinal Kasper said that even the people working on it were "positively surprised at how much has been accomplished in these years. It is a very rich harvest that overcomes the polemics and the great historical problems of the Reformation."

Saints among us

Extraordinary faith in ordinary lives

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Emmett Starnes was never canonized. But I'm fairly certain he lives among the communion of saints.

The Gospel reading for the feast of All Saints offers Jesus' beatitudes: an approach to life that assures trials ... but promises ultimate happiness in the presence of God. It is the life of courageous, faithful obedience to God, that has been shown to us by all the saints.

Including Emmett Starnes.

Emmett was a coal miner in Kentucky in the 1930s, a young widower with four school-age children. I learned his story from his daughter, Pauline, now 88.

Her father, who supervised other miners, knew firsthand the hardship they suffered along with their families. He was keenly aware of exploitation by their employers through unfair labor practices, poor wages and an unhealthy, unsafe work environment.

When a miners union came to the area, Emmett began attending the meetings. Here was a man who "hungred and thirsted for righteousness," in the words of the beatitudes. For years he and several fellow miners fought for unionization, "but every time they tried to get together they got shot at," Pauline said.

When local miners went on strike, her father's adversaries promised violence. "They said they were going to kidnap his kids. They threatened to kill us," she remembered.

"We stayed scared," Pauline recalled. "They were after my daddy. I know one time he came home with a bullet hole in his hat."

While the company prevailed, Emmett persisted in his efforts to organize the workers at great personal risk, and even had to move his family to a neighboring town.

But one night as he drove home from an organizing meeting, someone shot out Emmett's tires, causing him to wreck his car. He died a short time later as a result.

Emmett never witnessed the righteous end for which he lived and died. But Jesus promised, "Blessed are they who are persecuted for the sake of righteousness, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

Jesus offers us hope in the resurrection. Our Catholic tradition says that means joining the communion of saints — those faithful ones who stood fast for the kingdom of God. Our call is to live in a way worthy of standing with Emmett and those "blessed" who have gone before us.

Questions:

Who have you known personally who is a model of courageous faithfulness? What can you do to become more closely bound with the communion of saints?

Sell the Vatican?

Nigerian archbishop calls the idea 'stupid'

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Sell the Vatican to help the poor?

U.S. comedian Sarah Silverman might think it's a great idea, but a Nigerian archbishop called the suggestion offensive and "stupid."

Africans from poor countries admire the Vatican, and have no desire to dismantle it, Archbishop John Olorunfemi Onaiyekan of Abuja told reporters at a briefing on the Synod of Bishops for Africa Oct. 16.

"The few poor people who come here have never said, 'Oh, why don't you sell this and give us money for food.' They always say, 'What a beautiful place.' They admire it ... maybe because man does not live by bread alone," the archbishop said.

"I think the joke is not only offensive, but in bad taste and stupid. What they should be asking is: What is the Vatican doing about poverty in the world?" he said.

Silverman, in a recent video monologue laced with profanity, jokingly called on Pope Benedict XVI to "move out of your house that is a city" and use the proceeds to feed the hungry. Among those denouncing the comedian was the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, which called the video "another assault on Catholicism."

Archbishop Onaiyekan said the public might have misperceptions about the pope's living quarters. The Vatican is not the pope's "mansion," but a set of office buildings, he said. As for the papal apartment, he has seen it and it's "very straightforward and simple," he said.

He said the question of economic justice has come up in a more serious way at the African synod.

"Poverty in the world has to be dealt with by justice. There are other big buildings that need to be moved and sold — all those big structures, all those unjust financial and economic structures in the world. Those are the things to move, so that the poor can survive," he said.

EWTN foundress Mother Angelica and Deacon Steltemeier receive papal honors

IRONDALE, Ala. (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI has awarded the Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice Cross to Mother Mary Angelica, founder of the Eternal Word Television Network, and Deacon Bill Steltemeier, chairman of EWTN's board of governors, for distinguished service to the church.

The cross, whose name is Latin for "for the church and the pope," is the highest papal honor that can be conferred on laypeople and clergy.

Bishop Robert J. Baker of Birmingham presented the awards Oct. 4 in a brief ceremony following Benediction at the Shrine of the Most Blessed Sacrament in Hanceville.

"By giving awards, the church is not saying people or institutions are perfect, but we are saying that Mother Angelica, through this network, has made a significant contribution to the new evangelization heralded and promoted by recent popes," Bishop Baker said in his homily. "Mother Angelica's effort has been at the vanguard of the new evangelization and has had a great impact on our world."

The bishop said Deacon Steltemeier had "perpetuated this global Catholic apostolate as chairman of the board, and until recently, as chief executive officer."

"He is still helping EWTN carry out its mission to join with the Holy Father and the magisterium in sharing the light of the faith in every possible part of the world," he added.

Michael P. Warsaw, EWTN president and CEO, said the honor "acknowledges the tremendous faith, hard work and incredible sacrifices that each of them has made throughout the years in founding and building up the network."

It also is "a clear sign of the importance of the network's mission for the church and the pope," Warsaw added in a statement.

Mother Angelica, an 86-year-old member of the Poor Clares of Perpetual Adoration, founded Our Lady of the Angels Monastery in Irondale in 1961 and began EWTN in 1981 in a garage on the monastery property. The network now is available in more than 150 million television households in more than 140 countries and territories.

Deacon Steltemeier, 80, was an attorney in Nashville, Tenn., who left his law practice to join Mother Angelica with her fledgling television network. He served as EWTN's president for many years.

Because of ill health, Mother Angelica received the award in her private quarters rather than at the public ceremony.

Documentary leads to retreats, parish missions on forgiveness

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Paulist Father Frank Desiderio sensed something was happening at the very first public screening last year of his documentary feature on forgiveness, "The Big Question."

"People started crying," he recalled. "You know that stunned silence when people watch the end of a film? Then people started telling us stories. Sometimes it was a family story, sometimes it was a war story, sometimes it was a crime story, but it was about forgiveness that needed to happen."

Still, it seemed impractical to have a priest offering the sacrament of reconciliation outside each theater at the end of every showing of "The Big Question."

Father Desiderio, a priest for 27 years, has responded with parish forgiveness retreats and missions that can last part of one day or stretch out to three or even four days.

In September, the priest resigned as president and executive producer of Paulist Productions, a post he had held since 2000, to develop the retreats and missions.

"Forgiveness is mandated for the Christian," the priest told Catholic News Service in an Oct. 8 telephone interview from Los Angeles.

"In Matthew's Gospel after Jesus teaches the Lord's Prayer, he immediately follows that up with, 'If you don't forgive from your heart then God's not going to forgive you,'" he said.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Wanting proof for the miracles of Jesus

A classroom full of Catholic high school students took turns challenging their religion teacher. They wanted some kind of proof that Jesus really performed the miracles attributed to him.

The teacher explained that the apostles were firsthand witnesses of the extraordinary events in Jesus' life.

We read their accounts and make an act of faith in the trustworthiness of their testimony. Jesus performed dozens of miracles to support his divinity: healing the sick, restoring sight to the blind, bringing people back to life, changing water into wine, walking on the water, calming a storm at sea.

His greatest miracle was his own resurrection from the dead.

Skeptics and atheists go so far as to say that there is not a shred of evidence in the entire universe for the existence of the supernatural. They demand empirical evidence before they will believe anything.

Believers know that the entire universe did not just appear out of nowhere, that something doesn't come from nothing. Faith in God as a benign creator is not an irrational act; it is based on deductive reasoning, for example, the way Sherlock Holmes solved his murder mysteries. Through revelation we know that God created our wonderful universe out of love.

Doubt is basically a refusal to believe this, unless scientific evidence can prove it. Doubt is a flat refusal to accept supernatural truths.

It is not the same as an intellectual difficulty. All the difficulties in the world do not add up to a single doubt.

A difficulty is a feeling of unease as we try to comprehend the mystery behind a doctrine. For instance, we believe in the Trinity, but we cannot

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST

figure out how three can equal one. Everyone has difficulty trying to explain how Jesus Christ is both God and man, but believers accept the teaching as an imponderable mystery.

Accepting mysteries can be difficult, but it is not unreasonable. Jesus revealed these mysteries to us. Belief in Jesus is more than an act of accepting the historical facts about his life. It is primarily an act of the will, prompted by grace. We accept Jesus as our personal Lord and savior.

Once we do this, we banish all lingering doubts.

Remember when the apostle Thomas said he wouldn't believe that Jesus rose from the dead unless he could put his finger into the Lord's nail marks and put his hand into Christ's side? Once Thomas did that, he believed fully.

Later Jesus said to Thomas, "Have you come to believe because you have seen me? Blessed are those who have not seen and have believed" (Jn 20:29).

Faith is a gift, the benefits of which are immeasurable. The will to believe is a grace, which can be accepted or rejected.

Take the leap of faith with a prayer as simple as this: Father I accept the gift of your love with deep humility and gratitude. Help me to overcome my doubts. I trust you as my Lord and my God.

Preparing for ultimate humiliation

Part three of a three-part series

Little by little, I realized that it was time to take my hands off the steering wheel of life, and let God do the driving.

After mailing 500 resumes, with 50 responses, and five interviews, I thought I would surely land a job. But six months into my job search, I realized that it was time to prepare for the ultimate humiliation.

I had to "bite the bullet" and make plans to meet Monsignor Joseph Showfety and tell him that we had to pull my daughter out of Saint Leo's Catholic School.

The phone seemed to have turned into a 5,000 pound elephant. Calling the church office required every bit of effort I had left. The meeting with Monsignor Showfety was scheduled with ample time for me to worry about the shame and humiliation of having to admit that I was jobless.

Much to my surprise, I was welcomed into Monsignor's office. "Here it comes," I thought while I searched for words.

I thought about how ashamed my parents had to be. While he was alive, my father had never lost a job. I could hear him say: "Work hard, do the right thing, do whatever it takes, get a good job and you will be there for as long as you work."

Finally the words tumbled out, and I waited for the lecture that was sure to come next.

Monsignor stunned me with his response. He said, "Under no circumstance will I allow you to pull your child out of our school."

"But," I stammered, "we don't have enough savings to cover the expense."

He said, "I believe in you, and know you will get a job. Trust in God and you will see."

It was like a ton of bricks had been lifted off of my shoulders. First, I stopped at the church and gave thanks. You can imagine the joy our family experienced. It was a bright spot in six months of dismal failure.

What happened next was unbelievable. In the span of four days, I got three calls from different divisions of the same corporation I had just left. Ultimately, I would return to work without a pay cut and with family benefits intact and retirement bridged. Like Monsignor suggested, I turned my trust over to our Lord, and my life was forever changed.

A lesson from defeatist obituaries

The first Monday of November is yet another way that Catholics are able to show our way to the world -- by celebrating death.

This is indeed countercultural.

In today's climate, death is a situation to escape, a topic to be avoided.

All Souls' Day is more than a piety: It is the public recognition that we not only accept death but welcome it as the inevitable end of our earthly pilgrimage.

Current culture does not agree. Consider the language used in obituaries:

"Valiant three-year battle with cancer."

"Lost her courageous battle with cancer."

This language makes the deceased seem like losers. If they had been stronger, the doctors better, the surgery successful, they would have lived.

The incessant attempt by human beings to achieve longevity, if not immortality, has been the topic of legend and amusement for centuries.

There have been attempts to send human remains into outer space to await a better time to return to earth.

Such explorations do harm by advancing the concept that the human body is but one more machine.

A quest for immortality, with science on its side, reduces the body to a machine, wonderfully designed by God, but still in need of upgrading by humankind.

The human person, however, is created by God as body and soul, and for this reason has a dignity that cannot be changed by anyone.

Death is inevitable, not to be feared by those who have faith in the purpose of creation and the goodness of its Creator.

Among that one day's defeatist obituaries, one stood out for containing this thought: "He courageously won his three-year battle with esophageal cancer as his soul soared triumphantly to its heavenly home."

It is good we have a commemoration of the departed and the opportunity to reflect upon our own inevitable end.

Mickey Paluch, a force for strengthening vocations

Working far from home in a place I never imagined I would be, I wonder how I got here. I also think about the people who made this happen. Were it not for their influence, I probably would not be a priest today, living in Washington, thousands of miles from my home.

On Oct. 8, Margaret (Mickey) Paluch died. She was the driving force behind the J.S. Paluch Co. publishing house. Having known her personally and experienced her work in supporting and strengthening vocations to religious life, I am left wondering how many of us who were touched by her have been changed ever so little or are in another place because of her devotion.

For decades, I attended the J.S. Paluch annual vocation directors' meeting in Chicago, which presented outstanding speakers on religious life and the church. Each year Mickey would mount the podium, pledging to us her undying support and that of J.S. Paluch. The support went far beyond hosting the annual meeting. It reached out to thousands throughout this country who work in church ministry.

Mickey's death further causes me to wonder about the repetition of that support. Why was the meeting annually and not every other year? Why the continual stream of grants? Why the constant involvement in the church? Why were she and J.S. Paluch so persistent?

In addressing the meaning of the rosary, Father Romano Guardini raises a similar question: Why do we pray the Hail Mary repeatedly?

He writes, "Is it not an element of all life? What else is the beating of the heart but repetition? Always the same contraction and expansion — and yet it makes the blood circulate through the body. They are the order in which growth progresses, the inner kernel develops and the form is revealed. All life realizes itself in the rhythm of external conditions and internal accomplishment."

Father Guardini's insight leaves us wondering how much movement of the heart and the subsequent spiritual growth it generates were the result of the repeated efforts of Mickey Paluch?

Mickey's passing leaves us pondering death and its aftermath. Now that her work is completed, is she enjoying the peace of God we all hope to experience?

My guess is she is still plugging religious life with God and our heavenly saints. She had a delightful twinkle in her eyes when sharing herself with us. Behind that twinkle was an unending, loving spirit for religious life — a spirit that never dies but lives on in those of us who were blessed to experience it.

Saint from Middle Ages found answers to life with prayer

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) -- The life and writings of a 12th-century abbot remind Christians that questions about the meaning of life and God cannot be answered without prayer and contemplation, Pope Benedict XVI said.

St. Bernard of Clairvaux, who led the important Cistercian monastery in Clairvaux, France, from 1115 until his death in 1153, put the love of God and Jesus Christ at the center of his numerous writings, the pope said at his weekly general audience Oct. 21.

"St. Bernard reminds us that, without deep faith in God that is strengthened by prayer, contemplation and an intimate relationship with the Lord, our reflections on the divine mysteries risk becoming merely intellectual exercises and lose their credibility," Pope Benedict said to the faithful gathered in a sunny, windy St. Peter's Square.

Because his praises of Jesus "flowed like honey," the pope said, he earned the moniker "Dr. Mellifluus."

Along with St. Bernard, the pope said, "we must recognize that it's easier for man to seek and find God with prayer than with discussions."

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks.

In our continuing catechesis on the theologians of the Middle Ages, we now turn to one of the most outstanding, Saint Bernard of Clairvaux. Bernard combined the austerity of the Cistercian monastic renewal with intense activity in the service of the Church in his time. Because of his great learning and deep spirituality he is venerated as a Doctor of the Church, and is often called "the last of the Fathers".

Together with his theological writings and homilies, including the celebrated Sermons on the Song of Songs, Bernard maintained a vast correspondence, developed warm friendships with his contemporaries, defended sound doctrine, and combated heresy and outbreaks of antisemitism. His spirituality was profoundly Christ-centered and contemplative, and his celebration of the sweetness of Christ's name won him the title of Doctor mellifluus.

Bernard is also known for his fervent devotion to our Lady and his insight into her intimate sharing in the sacrifice of her Son. May Bernard's example of a faith nourished by prayer, study and contemplation, lead us closer "to Jesus through Mary" and grant us that wisdom which finds joyful fulfillment in the knowledge of the saints in heaven.

Teacher, mentor, friend Father John Oetgen, O.S.B.

This week marked the passing of my dear friend Father John Oetgen, O.S.B. who died recently after a battle with cancer. He was 85.

Father John was one of my closest and dearest friends. I first met him while I was a student at Belmont Abbey College. He taught public speaking, which was a required part of the curriculum. With my big mouth I figured this class would be a cinch.

Then I met Father John, a mountain of a man who stood well over 6'4" tall, and dressed in the flowing black habit of a Benedictine monk. There he stood in the front of the class addressing us with his deep booming voice, complete with a Savannah drawl. A fleet admiral would envy Father John's commanding presence.

It was in this class that I lost any fear of speaking in front of any size audience. Thanks to him, as a professional speaker and entertainer, I can now speak in front of six or 6000, it doesn't matter. I studied public speaking at the foot of the master.

Later I was to have Father John for southern literature, "Grit Lit," as it was affectionately known among all the Yankee students at Belmont Abbey. It was there that I garnered affection for southern writers that would help me write as a southerner.

First and foremost, Father John was a teacher and mentor. Later however, Father John was the first person I called when I felt moved to convert to Catholicism.

He is a man with whom I shared many warm visits these years since I graduated. I also visited with him after learning he had terminal cancer.

Father John took this in the same stride he took all things. He was prepared to meet Christ as few men I've ever known. He continued to attend Mass and kept his place with his brother monks until almost the very end. With the end of his mortal life at hand Father John was happy and content.

At his funeral at Belmont Abbey, it was standing room only. As I participated in the Mass I was confident that Father John was with our Lord. But still I had the abiding emptiness of knowing the void his departure for a heavenly home would have on all of us who knew and loved him so well.

Then Abbot Placid Solari, O.S.B., at the end of Mass, cheered us up by telling several classic Father John stories that focused on his deep sense of humor. One of these I'm obliged to tell here.

It was in 1953 when Father John had occasion to be in Rome with Father James Solari, Abbot Placid's older brother, who was then also a monk at Belmont Abbey. Both men found themselves dining one night at a restaurant where they were surrounded by people from around the world, all speaking different languages neither man understood. So Fathers John and James made up their own language. These two men of God sat smack dab in the middle of a restaurant talking in homemade gibberish.

This went on for a while until they were overheard by a philologist; that's a feller who studies languages. And brother was he perplexed. He hadn't ever heard anything like it so he went over and asked what language it was they were speaking.

"Cherokee," said Father John.

Only Father John could've pulled that one off. And we will miss him.

Priests in contemporary society

Clergy, seminarians reflect on priesthood at Year for Priests seminar

By CHAZ MUTH
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Nearly 300 clergy and seminarians took time to reflect on the priest's role in contemporary society during a two-day symposium at The Catholic University of America in Washington marking Pope Benedict XVI's designated Year for Priests.

"The Holy Father tells us that we participate in the work of redemption," said Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl of Washington. "That is what a priest does. He brings the Eucharist into the midst of the community, but he also brings the sacramental ministry of the church into the midst of the believing community."

In a homily during the Oct. 6-7 symposium's morning prayers, Archbishop Wuerl stressed that it was incumbent on priests that they use all potential resources "to make Christ visibly and effectively present in the community."

When he announced the special Year for Priests, Pope Benedict said he hoped it would help priests "grow toward spiritual perfection" and value the need to be effective ministers and help the faithful "appreciate more fully the great gift of grace which the priesthood is."

The pope opened the Year for Priests June 19, 2009, which coincided with the 150th anniversary of the death of St. John Vianney, known as the universal patron of priests.

The symposium on "Ministerial Priesthood in the Third Millennium: Faithfulness of Christ, Faithfulness of Priests" was co-sponsored by Catholic University's School of Theology and Religious Studies and by Theological College, the national seminary of the school.

The audience of mostly clergy and seminarians listened to talks about topics ranging from the Catholic faith's spirit of ecumenism to the need for clergy to employ creative techniques in evangelization. Speakers included several priests and Washington Auxiliary Bishop Martin D. Holley.

It's vital for pastors to use new technologies to reach out beyond their parishes and into the community, said Vincentian Father Vincent O'Malley, pastor of St. Joseph Church in Emmitsburg, Md.

In addition to hosting a weekly radio program, Father O'Malley posts his homilies on the parish Web site, and he told the audience that they attract an average of 800 readers each week, a number larger than the people who attend church services each week.

"I'm very concerned about the unchurched, who are not hearing the Good News of Jesus Christ," he said.

With the unchurched outnumbering the churchgoing population in the U.S., Father O'Malley said it's even more important that priests become "creative to be present to the people in our communities, (and) the unchurched."

It has become one of the most challenging tasks of the priest to reach out beyond the confines of the parish, said Father Walter G. Lewis, pastor of St. Mary Church in Richmond, Va.

Social network sites such as Facebook and Twitter are tools that can be employed in evangelization efforts, and it's vital for priests to keep up with modern technologies to remain relevant in contemporary culture, Father Lewis said.

"I also encourage our priests to go out to popular places in the community so that we are meeting people where they are," Father O'Malley said. "If we're out there in these places, we can assure the people that God loves them and that we would love to see them back in church."

Jonathan Vanegas, 26, an Ecuadorian seminarian from Redemptoris Mater Seminary in Hyattsville, Md., said the symposium would inspire him in his formation to become a presence in his community so that more people will discover the richness faith adds to their lives.

"It is always good to come to listen, to have an open mind for everything in general," Vanegas said with a thick Ecuadorian accent. It's a discovery of "how to live this gift of God," he told Catholic News Service.

Vincentian Father David M. O'Connell, Catholic University president, said the event, believed to be the only academic pastoral symposium organized in the U.S. so far to mark the Year for Priests, upholds the school's long tradition of contributing to the formation of priests and their education after ordination in areas like philosophy, social work, education, theology and canon law.

"It is fitting in this coming year ... that the university joins with the church throughout the world in making the importance of the priest's role and mission in the church and in contemporary society ever more clearly perceived," Father O'Connell told those in attendance.
